Melursus (me-lēr'sus), n. [NL., irreg. < L. mel, honey, + ursus, bear.] An Indian genus of Ursida, characterized by the shaggy hide, protrusile lips, and fewer and smaller teeth than those of Ursus; honey-bears or sloth-bears. M. labiatus is the aswail (which see). Prochilus is a synonym.

melvie (mel'vi), v. t.; pret. and pp. melvied, ppr. melvying. [A dial. var. of *meal*¹, v., < ME. mele,

< AS. melu (melu), meal: see meal.] To soil with meal. [Scotch.]

Sma' need has he to say a grace,
Or melvie his braw clathing.

Burns, Holy Fair.

Melyridæ (me-lir'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Melyris + -idæ.] A family of malacodermatous beetles, corresponding to Latreille's Melyridæ, typified by the genus Melyris.

Melyridæ (me-lir'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Melyris.] In Latreille's classification, the third tribe of Malacodermi, or soft pentamerous beetles. The palpi are generally filiform and short; the mandibles notched; the antennæ mostly serrated, in some males pectinated; the joints of the tarsi entire; and the unguis undentate or furnished with a membranous appendage. These beetles are mostly very agile, and are found upon flowers. Malachius, Dasytes, Zygia, Peleophorus, and Diglobicerus are named as leading genera.

Melyris (me-lir'is), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1775); origin obscure.] The typical genus of Melyridæ. These insects are ordinarily found upon flowers; they are generally of small size and very gaily colored. Most of them are natives of Africa.

mem. An abbreviation of memorandum, placed before a note of something to be remembered.

member (mem'bēr), n. [ME. membre, < OF. (and F.) membre = Sp. miembro = Pg. It. membro, < L. membrum, a limb, member of the body, a part, portion, or division.] 1. An integral part of an animal body having a distinct function; a vital organ; particularly, in common use, one of the limbs or extremities, as a leg, an arm, or a wing.

Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things. Jas. iii. 5.

Where I was wont to feed you with my blood,
I'll lop a member off, and give it you.

Shak., I Hen. VI., v. 3. 15.

2. Specifically, the private parts.

Theif gon alle naked, saif a littyll Clout, that theif coveren with here Knees and hire Members.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 197.

3. Figuratively, anything likened to a part of the body.

Baptism; wherein I was made a member of Christ.
Book of Common Prayer, Catechism.

Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? 1 Cor. vi. 15.

The Body of the Law is no less encumbered with superfluous members, that are like Virgil's Army, which he tells us was so crowded many of them had not Room to use their weapons. Addison, Spectator, No. 21.

4. A part of any aggregate or whole; one of a number of associated parts or entities; any unit or division that can be considered separately as part of a total.

The figures and the members of thine Astrolabe.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Astrolabe.

They tax our policy, and call it cowardice;
Count wisdom as no member of the war.

Shak., T. and C., I. 3. 198.

Specifically—(a) A person considered in relation to any aggregate of individuals to which he belongs; particularly, one who has united with or has been formally chosen as a corporate part of an association or public body of any kind, as a church or a society; often used elliptically in England for a member of Parliament, and in the United States for a member of Congress.

There are not more useful members in a commonwealth than merchants. Addison, The Royal Exchange.

He (Sir John Dalrymple) was strenuously supported by Sir James Montgomery, member for Ayrshire.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xiii.

(b) A part of a discourse, or of a period or sentence; a clause; a part of a verse. (c) In arch., any subordinate part of a building, order, or composition, as a frieze, cornice, or molding. (d) In alg., either of the two parts or sides of an equation united by the sign of equality (=). (e) In zool. and bot., a component of any higher classificatory group; thus, a species is a member of a genus; a genus is a member of a family, etc.—Borough member, in the British Parliament, a member of the House of Commons representing a borough.—County member, in the British Parliament, a member of the House of Commons representing a county or a division of a county.—Divisive members. See divisive.—Syn. 1. Member, Limb. Limb is a precise term, in the human body applying to the arms and legs. We speak of the limb of a tree, but rarely apply limb to the leg of an animal. The word has little figurative use, except in science (see definition); such expressions as "limb of the law," for a lawyer, and "limb of the devil" for a rogue, are jocose, limb being used for member or part. Member is much freer in primary and in figurative uses for an integral or distinguishable part of a whole; as, a member of a sentence, of a family, of a society, of a state. "The tongue is a little member" (James iii. 5), and so is the eye, and each of the toes, but none of them is a limb.

membered (mem'bērd), a. [member + -ed.] Having members; especially, having limbs: used chiefly in composition, as big-membered; in her. (also membré), used when the limbs are of a different tincture from the body.

memberless (mem'bēr-less), a. [member + -less.] Destitute of members; simple or undivided.

membership (mem'bēr-ship), n. [member + -ship.] 1. The state of being a member; the office or position of a member, as of Parliament.

No advantages from external church membership or profession of the true religion can of themselves give a man confidence towards God. South, Sermons, II. xi.

Jeffrey is perhaps on his way to Edinburgh to-day. He is a candidate for the Membership there. Carlyle, in Froude.

2. The members of a body regarded collectively: as, the whole membership of the church.

membra, n. Plural of membrum.

Membracidae (mem-bras'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Membrax (< Gr. μῆμραξ, a kind of cicada) + -idae.] A family of homopterous Hemiptera with three-jointed tarsi, typified by the genus Membracis. It is a large group of extraordinarily diversified and grotesque forms, the prothorax especially being the seat of remarkable modifications. The coloration is not less diversified. The antennæ are short and setose, with thickened base beneath the expanded edge of the clypeus, below or a little before the eyes. The legs are short and stout, and the hind tibiae are furnished with a terminal circle of spines. The species, of which there are upward of 800, are all jumpers, and are generally known as tree-hoppers. They abound in tropical and subtropical America, where more than half the known species are found; there are many in Africa, some in Australia and the East Indies, but scarcely any in Europe.

membracine (mem'brā-sin), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Membracidae.

II. n. A member of the family Membracidae.

Membracis (mem'brā-sis), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1776), < Gr. μῆμραξ (μῆμραξ), a kind of cicada.] A genus of tree-hoppers, typical of the family Membracidae, having the two forward pairs of tibiae broadly flattened and fitted very closely against the breast. It is very rich in species, among which are some of the most gaily colored and beautifully decorated members of the family.

membral (mem'brāl), a. [NL. membralis*, < L. membrum, a limb, member: see member.] In anat. and zool., of or pertaining to the limbs of an animal, as distinguished from the body proper; appendicular, as distinguished from axial (parts of the whole body).—Membral segment, a natural morphological division of a limb between two principal joints: thus, the forearm, between the elbow and the wrist, is a membral segment. See isomere.

membranaceous (mem-brā-nā'shius), a. [L. membranaceus, of skin or membrane, < membrana, skin, membrane: see membrane.] Pertaining to or of the nature of membrane; consisting of membrane; membranous.

Birds of Prey that live upon Animal Substances have membranaceous, not muscular stomachs.

Arbutnot, Alimenta, vi. 8.

membrane (mem'brān), n. [F. membrane = Sp. Pg. It. membrana, < L. membrana, the skin or membrane that covers the several members of the body, the thin skin of plants, a skin parchment (> Gr. μῆμραξ, parchment), cover, surface, < membrum, member: see member.] 1. A thin pliable expansive structure of the body; an expansion of any soft tissue or part in the form of a sheet or layer, investing or lining some other structure or connecting two or more structures. The term is used in the widest sense, with little or no reference to the kind of tissue which may be concerned, the membranous quality depending upon thinness and pliability, not upon texture or fabric. No hard parts, as bone and cartilage, come within the definition of membrane. Most membranes are fibrous—that is, consist wholly or in part of some form of connective tissue, in or on which may be other and more special form-elements, as the layers of cells peculiar to the mucous, the serous, and other special membranes. In some cases a sheet of nerve-tissue, or of muscle-tissue, constitutes a membrane, with little admixture of other elements. Some membranes chiefly consist of a network of blood-vessels, with little connective tissue. Most membranes are specified by qualifying terms. See phrases following.

2. In entom., specifically, the membranous terminal part of a hemelytrum; the membrane of the fore wing of a hemipter. See cut under clavus.—3. A skin prepared for being written on.

They consist of three bundles, containing in all 549 skins or membranes. Of these membranes, the greater part are vellum and parchment.

English Glids (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. xlv.

Adipose, alveolar, atrial membrane. See the adjectives.—Alimentary mucous membrane. See alimentary.—Arachnoid membrane, araneous membrane. Same as arachnoid.—Basal membrane of the ligula, in certain Coleoptera, a narrow membranous part between the mentum and the ligula. When more fully developed it is called the hypoglossus.—Basement membrane. See basement.—Basilar membrane. See basilar.—Elastodermic membrane, the blastoderm.—Branchiostegal, branchial, cellular membrane. See the adjectives.—Choroid membrane, the choroid.—Conjunctival membrane, the conjunctiva.—Costocoracoid membrane. See costocoracoid.—Cricothyroid membrane, the tough fibrous tissue which connects the cricoid and thyroid cartilages.—Deciduous membrane, the decidua.—Diphtheritic membrane, in pathol., the false membrane formed in diphtheria, composed of necrosed epithelium, or of an exudate of pus, fibrin, and epithelial scales, or of these with necrosed epithelium.—False membrane, in pathol., an unorganized membraniform layer, such as is produced in croupous inflammation, when it is formed of pus and fibrous and necrosed epithelium in varying amounts.—Fenestrated membrane. See fenestrated.—Fibrous membrane. See fibrous.—Germinal, Henleian, Henslovian, hyaloid, hyoglossal membrane. See the adjectives.—Interosseous membrane, a tough sheet of fascia connecting two bones in their continuity: especially applied to such a tissue between the ulna and the radius, and between the tibia and the fibula.—Investing membrane, the first layer of cells which assumes a distinctly membranous form upon the surface of the cleftricle of the ovum. It was formerly called the serous layer of the germinal membrane.—Jacob's membrane, the bacillary layer, or layer of rods and cones of the retina of the eye. See bacillary.—Krause's membrane, a membrane dividing the muscle-fiber transversely, supposed to be indicated by the intermediate line in the light disk of striated muscle-fiber. Also called Dobie's line, Dobie's stripe.—Limiting membrane of the retina, external and internal, the outer and inner boundaries of the fibers of Müller, presenting the appearance of continuous membranes, the outer lying between the outer nuclear layer and the layer of rods and cones, and the inner being next to the hyaloid membrane.—Membrane of Bruch, a structureless or finely fibrillated transparent membrane, lying between the choriocapillaris and the pigmented layer of the retina.—Membrane of Corti. Same as tectorial membrane.—Membrane of Demours, or membrane of Descemet, a transparent, glassy lamina, covering posteriorly the proper tissue of the cornea, itself lined with a single layer of epithelioid cells. Also called posterior elastic lamina.—Membrane of Henle. Same as Henleian membrane.—Membrane of Reissner, the membrane which separates the scala vestibuli of the cochlea from the cochlear canal or scala media. It extends obliquely from the spiral lamina to the outer wall of the cochlea. It is a very delicate layer of connective tissue continuous with the periotium of the upper surface of the bony lamina, and lined with pavement epithelium on its lower side.—Mucous membrane, the general lining membrane of the alimentary canal and its annexes, including the respiratory and urogenital passages. It is one of the most extensive and the most complex of the membranes of the body, varying greatly in character in different cases, and in different parts of its own extent, and may include various special glandular structures, as mucous crypts, follicles, etc., as well as the appropriate nerves, blood-vessels, and lymphatics. Mucous membrane consists essentially of a basement membrane (see basement), which separates a free epithelium from a fibrovascular attached layer. The epithelium is a layer of cells of various kinds, as spheroidal, columnar, stratified, etc.; the fibrovascular layer consists of connective tissue with vessels, lymphatics, nerves, and often muscular fibers. Embedded in this membrane may be also the glandular structures above mentioned; and the surface is often thrown up into various ridges, villi, and papillae. The structure is essentially a secreting one, giving rise to mucous as well as to various other special secretions. At the openings of the body the mucous membrane is directly continuous with the skin. The conjunctiva of the eye is also a mucous membrane.—Nasmyth's membrane, the cuticula dentis, or cuticle of a tooth; the epithelial investment of the enamel of a young tooth, which persists for a while and then wears off.—Nictitating membrane, the winking membrane or winker; the third eyelid. It is very highly developed in some animals, as birds, in which it can be swept across the whole eye by means of appropriate muscles and tendons (see cut at eye), but in many others it is rudimentary or wanting. In essential character it is a fold of the conjunctival mucous membrane which when little developed, or when not in action, lies at the inner canthus of the eye.—Obturator membrane. (a) The membrane or ligament nearly closing the obturator foramen. (b) The occluding membrane of the fetal brain which closes the upper part of the fourth ventricle.—Pituitary membrane, the mucous membrane of the nose; the membrane lining the nasal passages, continuous with that of the pharynx, ear, eye, and various sinuses of the skull. In a part of this membrane ramify the nerves of smell. Also called Schneiderian membrane.—Pupillary membrane, a delicate transparent vascular membrane of the fetal eye which closes the pupil for a time, and divides the space in which the iris is suspended into two distinct chambers. It is sometimes persistent, causing blindness.—Schneiderian membrane, the pituitary membrane: so called from the anatomist Schneider, who first showed the nasal mucus to be the product of this membrane, not of the brain, as had before been supposed.—Semilunar membrane, in ornith., the membrane of the syrinx or lower larynx. It is a delicate, highly vibratile membrane, with a free concave upper margin ascending in the trachea from the pessulus or cross-bar of the syrinx, and constitutes a part of the vocal organs, like a vocal cord of the larynx of a mammal.—Serous membrane, a thin membrane of connective tissue, of mesoblastic origin, lined with a simple layer of flattened epithelial cells. These cells are joined together along lines which are sometimes straight but usually sinuous or jagged. Between them here and there are openings (stomata) of lymphatic vessels. Membranes of this kind line certain cavities of the body, and are reflected over the contained viscera, forming in this way a shut sac, moistened with lymph and communicating with the lymphatic vessels through the stomata. The best examples of serous membranes are the pleura, the pericardium, the peritoneum, and the tunica vaginalis.—Subradular membrane, a membrane situated under the radula or lingual ribbon of the odontophore of a mollusk.—Synovial membrane, the membrane which lines the joints and secretes synovia or synovial fluid, the glairy substance which lubricates the joint and facilitates its movements. The membrane passes gradually into the articular cartilage. Such membranes consist chiefly of connective tissue, with vessels and nerves, covered here and there with patches of epithelial cells.—Tectorial membrane, in anat., a strong elastic membrane in the cochlear canal of the ear, lying above and parallel with the basilar membrane, extending outward from the limbus spiralis part way toward the outer wall of the cochlea, and covering the Cortian organ, upon the rods of which it rests. It is thin at its origin at the limbus spiralis, then thickens, and again tapers toward the free outer extremity. Also called membrane of Corti.—Thyroid membrane, the fibrous membrane which connects the hyoid bone with the thyroid cartilage.—Tympanic membrane, the membrane which occludes the external meatus of the ear and separates it from the middle ear.—Undulating membranes, simple membranous bands, one margin attached, the other free, exhibiting undulatory motion. Micrographic Dict.—Vibratile membrane. Same as semilunar membrane.—Vitelline membrane, the proper coat or wall of an ovum, inclosing the vitellus or yolk: it corresponds to the cell-wall of any other cell. Also called zona pellucida, from its pellucid appearance in some cases, as in the human ovum.

membrane-bone (mem'brān-bōn), n. An ossification in membrane of any kind; a bone which has any other origin than in cartilage. The bones of the skeleton of vertebrates are for the most part preformed in cartilage, which is resorbed during the process of ossification; but some, as those of the face, of the top and sides of the skull, those found in tendons and other fibrous structures, as the bones of the eyeball, heart, penis, etc., of various animals, and all dermal bones, or those of the exoskeleton, are membrane-bones.

membraneless (mem'brān-less), a. [membrane + -less.] Not provided with a membrane: as, a membraneless cell.

membranella (mem'brā-nel'ā), n.; pl. membranellae (-ē). [NL., dim. of L. membrana, membrane: see membrane.] In zool., same as cirrus, 2 (i).

membraneous (mem-brā'nē-us), a. [L. membraneus, of a membrane or parchment, < L. membrana, membrane: see membrane.] Same as membranous.

membrane-suture (mem'brān-sū'tūr), n. In the hemelytrium of a heteropterous insect, the suture between the basal harder part or corium and the terminal part or membrane.

membrane-winged (mem'brān-wingd), a. In entom., hymenopterous.

membraniferous (mem-brā-nif'ē-rus), a. [L. membrana, membrane, + ferre = E. bear.] Having or producing membrane.

membraniform (mem'brā-ni-fōrm), a. [L. membrana, membrane, + forma, form.] Having the characteristics of a membrane; membranous in form; laminar; lamellar; fascial.

membranocoriaceous (mem'brā-nō-kō-rī-ā-shi-us), a. [L. membrana, membrane, + corium, hide, + -aceous. Cf. coriaceous.] Of a thick, tough, membranous texture or consistency, as a polyzoon.

membranology (mem-brā-nol'ō-jī), n. [L. membrana, membrane, + Gr. -λογία, < lōgōs, speak: see -ology.] The science of membranes; a treatise on membranes. [Rare.]

membranous (mem-brā-nō'sus), n.; pl. membranosi (-sī). [NL.: see membranous.] A muscle of the thigh; the semimembranosus.

membranous (mem'brā-nus), a. [= F. membraneux, < NL. membranosus, < L. membrana, membrane: see membrane.] 1. Having a membrane or membranes; membraniferous.—2. Consisting of membrane; having the texture or quality of a membrane; membranaceous.—3. Of or pertaining in any way to membrane; resembling membrane; membraniform.—4. In bot., having the character or appearance of membrane; thin, rather soft and pliable, and often more or less translucent, as sometimes leaves, the walls of seed-vessels, the indusia in ferns, etc. See phrases below.—Membranous croup, labyrinth, etc. See the nouns.—Membranous mycelium, a mycelium in which the hyphae form a membranous layer by interweaving. See mycelium.—Membranous ossification. See membrane-bone.

membranule (mem'brā-nūl), n. [= F. membranule, < L. membrana, membrane, + -ula, dim. of membrana, a membrane: see membrane.] 1. A little membrane.—2. In entom., a small triangular flap or incurved portion on the posterior part of the base of the wings, seen in certain dragon-flies.

membré (F. pron. moñ-brā'), a. [F., < membre, member: see member.] In her., same as membered.

membrum (mem'brum), n.; pl. membra (-brā). [L.: see member.] In anat., a member: technically distinguished from truncus.

Memecyleae (mem-ē-sil'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1828), < Memecylon + -ae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae, characterized by having a definite number of ovules, and a fruit containing from 1 to 5 seeds, the latter with large embryos. It embraces 3 genera, of which Memecylon is the type, and about 155 species, natives of the tropics.

Memecylon (me-mes'i-lon), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1767), < L. memecylon, < Gr. μεμεικνύων, μεμεικνύος, μεμεικνύος, the fruit of the arbutus or strawberry-tree.] A genus of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae, and type of the tribe Memecyleae, characterized by having 8 anthers and a 1-celled ovary containing 1 seed. They are smooth trees or shrubs with entire coriaceous leaves, and axillary clusters of small blue or white flowers. About 110 species have been described, natives of Asia, Africa, tropical Australia, and some of the islands in the Pacific.

memento (mē-men'tō), n. [= F. memento, a reminder, < L. memento, remember, 2d pers. sing. impv. of meminisse, remember; a redupl. perf., < men, think: see mind.] It should be noted that memento is not connected with memory, remember, etc.] A hint, suggestion, notice, or memorial to awaken memory; that which reminds; a reminder of what is past or of what is to come; specifically, a souvenir.

He is but a man, and seasonable mementos may be useful Bacon.

Brother of death daily haunts us with dying mementos.
Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, v.

At length she found herself decay;
Death sent mementos every day.

Cotton, Fables, v.

These [paralytics] speak a loud memento.
Cotter, Task, l. 482.

memento mori (mē-men'tō mō'rī), [L., remember to die, i. e. that thou must die; usually translated, 'remember death': memento, 2d pers. sing. impv. of meminisse, remember (see memento); mori, die (see mori, mort).] A decorative object, usually an ornament for the person, containing emblems of death or of the passing away of life: common in the sixteenth century.

I make as good use of it as many a man doth of a Death's-head or a memento mori.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., III. 3. 35.

memina (me-mī'nā), n. [Singalese.] 1. The peesoreh, a deerlet of Ceylon, Tragulus memina. Also meminna.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of such small deer, separated from Moschus by J. E. Gray.

Memnonian (mem-nō'ni-an), a. [L. Memnonius, < Gr. Μηνόνας, Μηνόνας, of Memnon, < Μηνων, L. Memnon, Memnon: see def.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling Memnon, an Oriental or Ethiopian hero in the Trojan war, slain by Achilles. He was a solar hero, son of the Dawn (Eos), or of Day (Hemera), symbolized as a youth of marvelous beauty and strength. The Greeks gave his name to one of the colossi of Amenophis III. at Thebes in Egypt, the vocal Memnon, and called one of the temples there the Memnonium or temple of Memnon. See Memnonium.

Xerxes, the liberty of Greece to yoke,
From Susa, his Memnonian palace high,
Came to the sea.
Milton, P. L., x. 308.

Memnonium (mem-nō'ni-um), n.; pl. Memnonia (-ā). [Gr. Μηνόναίον, a temple of Memnon, neut. of Μηνόνας, of Memnon, < Μηνων, Memnon.] 1. A temple of Memnon. The name was given by the Greeks to an ancient temple at Susa in Persia, and also to the temple still so called at Thebes in Egypt, properly the Ramesseum or temple of Rameses II. See Memnonian.

And thou hast walked about (how strange a story!)
In Thebes's streets three thousand years ago,
When the Memnonium was in all its glory.

H. Smith, Address to the Mummy at Belzoni's Exhibition.
2. [l. c. or cap.] The ancient Greek name for the settlement or suburb adjoining the cemetery of an Egyptian city, consisting of extensive establishments for the mummification of the dead, and of the dwellings of the numerous artisans employed in these establishments and in the various professions, arts, and trades connected therewith. Also memnoneion.

Here stood, where the field of the colossi is now, the Memnoneion.
C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 218.

memoir (mem'wor or mē'mōr), n. [F. mémoir, memoir, < L. memoria, memory: see memory.] 1. A note of something to be remembered; a memorandum.

He desired a Memoir of me, which I gave him, of what I would have him search for in the King's Cabinet, and promised me all the satisfaction he could give me in that affair.
Lisler, Journey to Paris, p. 97.

There is not in any author a computation of the revenues of the Roman empire, and hardly any memoirs from whence it might be collected.
Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins.

2. A notice or an essay relating to something within the writer's own memory or knowledge; a record of facts upon a subject personally known or investigated; a concise account of one's knowledge or information on any topic; especially, a communication to a society containing such information: as, the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.—3. pl. A narrative of the facts or events of some phase of history or in the life of a person, written from personal knowledge or observation; a history or narrative dwelling chiefly upon points about which the writer is specially informed, as an autobiography or a continuous record of observations.

Such narratives are generally limited to a special line of facts or series of events, as Guizot's Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de mon temps, 'Memoirs to serve for the History of my Time.'

He told me he had studied the History of Books with the utmost application 18 years, and had brought his Mémoires into a good Method.

Lisler, Journey to Paris, p. 100.

To write his own Mémoires, and leave his Heirs High Schemes of Government, and Plans of War.
Prior, Carmen Seculare, st. 33.

4. In a restricted use, a biography; a memorial volume or work containing notices of the life and character of some one deceased, with extracts from his (or her) correspondence, etc.

= Syn. 4. Biography, Memoir. See biography.

memoiret, n. A Middle English form of memory.

mémoire (mā-mwōr'), n. [F.: see memoir.] In diplomacy, same as memorandum, 4.

memoirism (mem'wor-izm), n. [memoir + -ism.] The act or art of writing memoirs.

Reducing that same mémoiret of the eighteenth century into history.
Carlyle, Misc., II. 242. (Davies.)

memoirist (mem'wor-ist), n. [memoir + -ist. Cf. memorist.] A writer of memoirs; a biographer.

Sir William Temple, the lively, agreeable, and well-informed essayist and memoirist.

Craik, Hist. Eng. Lit., II. 126.

Carlo was beginning to swear "fit to raise the dead," writes the mémoiret, at the tardiness of the Norman pair.
G. W. Cable, Stories of Louisiana, II.

memorabilia (mem'ō-rā-bil'i-ā), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of memorabilis, worthy to be remembered or noted: see memorable.] 1. Things remarkable and worthy of remembrance or record.

All the memorabilia of the wonderful childhood.

Bushnell, Sermons on Living Subjects, p. 32.

2. Things that serve to recall something to memory; things associated with some person, place, or thing that is held in remembrance.

memorability (mem'ō-rā-bil'i-ti), n. [memorable: see -bility.] Memorableness. [Rare.]

Many events of local memorability.

Southey, The Doctor, xlvii. (Davies.)

memorable (mem'ō-rā-bl), a. and n. [= F. memorable = Sp. memorable = Pg. memoravel = It. memorabile, < L. memorabilis, worthy to be remembered or noted, remarkable, < memorare, bring to remembrance, mention: see memorate.] 1. a. 1. Worthy to be remembered; such as to be remembered; not to be forgotten; notable; remarkable: as, the memorable names of history; memorable deeds; a memorable disaster.

I passed through part of that forest, which is called Fontaine Bealeu forest, which is very great and memorable for exceeding abundance of great many stones.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 34 (sig. E).

Witness our too much memorable shame

When Cressy battle fatally was struck.

Shak., Hen. V., II. 4. 53.

Neither the praise of his wisdom or his vertue hath left him memorable to posterity.

Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

On this memorable day [that of the battle of the Boyne] he was seen wherever the peril was greatest.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xvi.

2. Keeping in remembrance; commemorative.

I wear it [the leek] for a memorable honour;

For I am Welsh, you know, good countryman.

Shak., Hen. V., IV. 7. 109.

= Syn. 1. Signal, extraordinary, famous.

II. n. An event worthy of being kept in memory; a noteworthy or remarkable thing.

He that will be thoroughly acquainted with the principal antiquities and memorables of this famous city, let him read a Latin Tract of one Symphorianus Campegius.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 74.

To record the memorables therein.

Fuller, Church Hist., X. vi. 24.

memorableness (mem'ō-rā-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being memorable.

memorably (mem'ō-rā-bli), adv. In a manner not to be forgotten; so as to be worthy of remembrance.

Are he were ded and shuld fro hem wende

A memorand thyng to have yn mynde.

M.S. Harl. 1701, f. 84. (Halliwell.)

memorandum (mem'ō-ran'dum), n.; pl. memoranda (-dā), less commonly memorandums (-dumz). [= F. memorandum, < L. memorandum, neut. of memorandus, to be remembered, gerundive of memorare, bring to remembrance: see memorate.] 1. Something to be remembered: used, originally as mere Latin, and usually abbreviated mem., to introduce a note of a thing to be done. Hence—2. A note to help the memory; a record of something for future reference or consideration.

And over against this memorandum (of the King's own hand), "Otherwise satisfied."

Bacon, Hist. Henry VII., p. 212.

Stings, conscious stings, have made my heart their Butt, Graving outrageous Memorandums there Of those snakes tongues which Aphrodisius shot Into my heedless breast. J. Beaumont, Psyche, II. 147.

I have never seen any work from nature of Millet's that was not memorandum-like in character, indicating by outline and shadow the principal contour.

The Century, XXXVIII. 97.

Specifically—3. In law, a writing in which the terms of a transaction or some part of them are embodied. The statute of frauds requires a note or memorandum in writing to make a valid sale in certain cases; and under this statute a letter may be a sufficient memorandum. The term is often used in the caption memorandum of agreement, with which formal contracts are begun.

4. In diplomacy, a summary of the state of a question, or a justification of a decision agreed on. Also (as French) mémoire.—Memorandum articles, in marine insurance, things referred to in the memorandum clause annexed to some policies, exempting the insurers from liability for the articles therein specified.—Memorandum check, a bank check with "memorandum" or "mem." on the face of it. The legal effects of such an addition to the face of a check are that the drawer is liable upon it absolutely to the one to whom he gives it, and will not be exonerated by delay or omission to present it at the bank; and, on the other hand, it is not, like an ordinary check, a representation that the drawer has any funds in the bank. But the bank may pay it like any other check if presented. The object of a memorandum check is to serve as a formal due bill, usually with an understanding between the parties as to the desired delay in presentation for the convenience of the drawer, or that it shall never be presented at the bank, but to the drawer at a future time.—Memorandum of association, in Eng. law, a document signed by shareholders, stating the name, object, etc., of a joint-stock company, upon the registration of which the company has a legal existence. It corresponds to the articles of association in the American law of corporations.—Memorandum sale, the sending of goods by an intending seller to a proposing buyer, subject to the approval of the latter, the title remaining in the seller until the buyer indicates his approval or acceptance of the goods. R. Miller, Law of Conditional Sales.—Syn. 2. Souvenir, Memento, etc. See memorial.

memorandum-book (mem-ō-ran'dum-būk), n. A book in which memoranda are written; a note-book.

With memorandum-book for every town.

Cowper, Prog. of Err., I. 373.

memorandumer (mem-ō-ran'dum-ēr), n. One who makes memoranda; one who is given to taking notes or jotting down casual observations. [Rare.]

I feel sorry to be named or remembered by that biographical anecdotal memorandum (Boswell) till his book of poor Dr. Johnson's life is finished and published. Madams D'Arbly, Diary, III. 385. (Davies.)

memorate (mem'ō-rāt), v. t. [L. memoratus, pp. of memorare (> It. memorare = Sp. Pg. memorar = OF. membre, membre, F. mémorer), bring to remembrance, mention, recount, < memor, remembering: see memory. Cf. commemorate and remember.] To mention for remembrance; commemorate.

memorative (mem'ō-rā-tiv), a. [= F. mémoratif = Sp. Pg. It. memorativo; as memorate + -ive.] 1. Of or pertaining to memory: as, the memorative faculty or power.—2. Preserving or recalling the memory of something; aiding the memory. [Archaic and rare.]

The mind doth secretly frame to itself memorative heads, whereby it recalls easily the same conceits.

Bp. Hall, Holy Observations, No. 87.

Vernal weather to me most memorative.

Carlyle, in Froude.

memoria (mē-mō'ri-ā), n.; pl. memoriæ (-ē). [ML., < L. memoria, memory: see memory.]

1. A shrine or reliquary containing relics of some martyr or martyrs. In primitive times it was customary to carry the memoria in religious processions.—2. A church or chapel built in memory of a martyr or confessor, often over his tomb. Cath. Dict.

memorial (mē-mō'ri-āl), a. and n. [ME. memorial, < OF. memorial, F. mémorial = Sp. Pg. memorial = It. memoriale, < L. memoriale, of or belonging to memory or remembrance, < memoria, memory: see memory.] I. a. 1. Preservative of memory; serving for commemoration: as, a memorial tablet; a memorial window in a church.

Thou Polymnia,

On Parnass that with thy sutes glade, . . .

Syngeest with vois memorial in the shade.

Chaucer, Anellida and Arctite, I. 18.

Last o'er the urn the sacred earth they spread,

And raised the tomb, memorial of the dead.

Pope, Iliad, xxiv. 1008.

Where still the thorn's white branches wave,
Memorial o'er his rival's grave.

Scott, L. of L. M., IV. 34.

2. Contained in one's memory; within the memory of man: opposed to immemorial. [Rare.]

The case is with the memorial possessions of the greatest part of mankind: a few useful things mixed with many trifles fill up their memories.

Watts.

Memorial cross. See cross, 2.—Memorial day a day observed in memory of something; specifically, in the United States, same as Decoration day (which see, under decoration).—Memorial stone or tablet, a stone or tablet set up, or placed on or in a wall, to commemorate some person or event.

II. n. 1. That which preserves the memory of something; anything designed or adapted to serve as a reminder of a person, an event, or a fact or facts of any kind belonging to past time, as a record, a monument, an inscription, a custom, a periodical observance, etc.: as, the "Memorial of St. Helena," a book by Las Cases; the Martyrs' Memorial at Oxford.

These stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever.

Josh. IV. 7.

Memorials are history unfinished, or the first or rough draughts of history.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 128.

There is a memorial for the dead, as well in giving thanks to God for them as in praying for them.

J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 291.

He lingered, poring on memorials

Of the world's youth. Shelley, Alastor.

Nations whose memorials go back to the highest antiquity.

J. M. Me, in Faiths of the World.

2. In law: (a) A short note or abstract, intended for registry, exhibiting the particulars of a deed, etc. (b) In Scots law, a statement of facts bearing upon a particular point, doubtful or disputed, in order to obtain counsel's opinion upon that point; a statement of facts or points in dispute for the use or advice of counsel; a brief.

—3. A written representation of facts made to a legislative or other body as the ground of a petition, or a representation of facts accompanied with a petition.—4. In diplomacy, one of a class of informal state papers much used in negotiations, embracing such documents as circulars sent to foreign agents, answers to the communications of ambassadors, and notes to foreign cabinets and ambassadors.—5. Memor-y; remembrance; that which is remembered (about a person or thing).

Their memorial is perished with them.

Ps. lx. 6.

Precious is the memorial of the just.

Eccles.

6. Eccles. See commemoration, 2 (b).—Syn. 1. Memorial, Monument, Memento, Souvenir, and Memorandum agree in meaning that which puts one in mind or helps one to remember; all but memorandum are especially means of keeping a revered or endeared person, place, etc., in memory. A memorandum is simply a note made in order to prevent the forgetting of something important, especially something which might easily slip from the mind. Memento and souvenir differ very slightly, souvenir being a somewhat more elevated word: we give a book or a lock of hair as a memento; we prize a faded flower as a souvenir of a visit to Mount Vernon with friends now separated from us. Memorial and monument are sometimes the same: as, the Martyrs' Memorial at Oxford is essentially a monument. A monument is often a single shaft or column, as the Washington monument; a memorial may be a commemorative structure, an illuminated window, a book, etc.

A memorial is the more affectionate; monument, the more laudatory.

C. J. Smith, Synonyms Discriminated, p. 565.

memorialize, v. t. See memorialize.

memorialist (mē-mō'ri-āl-ist), n. [= F. mémorialiste = Sp. It. memorialista; as memorial + -ist.] 1. One who writes a memorial or memorials.

They would have the commemoration of their actions be transmitted by the purest and most untainted memorialists.

Steele, Spectator, No. 188.

memory (mem'ō-ri), n.; pl. memories (-riz). [< ME. memorie, also memoire, < OF. memorie, memoire, memore, F. mémoire = Sp. Pg. It. memoria, < L. memoria, the faculty of remembering, remembrance, memory, a historical account, < memor, mindful, remembering; cf. Gr. μνήμω, anxious, μνήμω, care, thought, Skt. √ smar, remember. From L. memor are also ut. E. memorial, memorate, commemorate, remember, etc.] 1. The mental capacity of retaining unconscious traces of conscious impressions or states, and of recalling these traces to consciousness with the attendant perception that they (or their objects) have a certain relation to the past; in a narrower sense, the power of such retention alone, the power or act of recalling being termed recollection. The application of the term is often extended, with more or less of figurativeness, to analogous physical processes.

The power to revive again in our minds those ideas which after imprinting have disappeared, or have been as it were laid aside out of sight, . . . is memory.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. x. 2.

In memory there is necessarily some contrast of past and present, in retentiveness nothing but the persistence of the old.

 Their memories, their singings, and their gifts.
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 464.
 And I am told that there are women of title who boldly demand memories to be celebrated when there are no communitants: and that there are mass priests who celebrate memories in the very time and place that the ordinary ministers are celebrating the Communion.
Bucer, quoted in E. W. Dixon's Hist. Church of Eng., xviii.
 Legal memory, in Eng. law, the period since the beginning of the reign of Richard I.—Sound and disposing mind and memory, the phrase usual in statutes prescribing what persons may make wills, and generally construed to imply ability to collect and hold in mind the particulars both of the estate to be disposed of and of the persons standing in such a relation as to have just expectations.—To commit to memory. See commit.—To draw to memory, to put on record.
 A noble storie,
 And worthy for to drawen to memorie.
Chaucer, Prologue to Miller's Tale, l. 4.
 =Syn. 1-4. Memory, Recollection, Remembrance, Remi- niscence. Memory is the general word for the faculty or capacity itself; recollection and remembrance are different kinds of exercise of the faculty; reminiscence, also, is used for the exercise of the faculty, but less commonly, and then it stands for the least energetic use of it, the matter seeming rather to be suggested to the mind. The correctness of the use of memory for that which is remembered has been disputed. The others are freely used for that which is remembered. In either sense, recollection implies more effort, more detail, and more union of objects in wholes, than remembrance. Reminiscence is used chiefly of past events, rarely of thoughts, words, or scenes, while recollec- tion is peculiarly appropriate for the act of recalling mental operations. See remember.
Memphian (mem'fi-an), a. [< Memphis + -an.] Same as Memphite.

 As to the vnbeleuers and erroneous, it menaceth truly the greatest euill to come. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 251.
 Thus the singular misunderstanding which menaced an open rupture at one time was happily adjusted.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., l. 19.
 =Syn. Menace, Threaten. Threaten is of very general application, in both great and little things: as, to be threatened with a cold; a threatening cloud; to threaten an attack along the whole line. Threaten is used with infinitives, especially of action, but menace is not: as, to threaten to come, to punish. Menace belongs to dignified style and matters of moment.
 II. intrans. To be threatening; indicate danger or coming harm; threaten.
 He that oft manaceth, he that threteth more than he may performe ful oft time. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

mendicancy (men'di-kan-si), n. [< mendican(t) + -cy.] The condition of being a mendicant; the state of beggary, or the act of begging.

It was often necessary for them to spend a part of every summer in vagrant mendicancy. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvi.

mendicant (men'di-kant), a. and n. [< OF. mendiant, F. mendiant = Sp. Pg. It. mendicante, < L. mendican(t)-s, ppr. of mendicare, mendicari, beg: see mendicate. Cf. mendiant, mendinant.] I. a. 1. Begging; reduced to a condition of beggary.—2. Practising beggary; living by alms or doles: as, a mendicant friar. See friar.

Fields of maize, . . . forming Cloisters for mendicant crows.

Longfellow, Evangeline, ii. 4.
Mendicant orders, those religious orders which originally depended for support on the alms they received. The principal mendicant orders are the Franciscans, the Dominicans, the Carmelites, and the Augustinians. Also called begging friars.

II. n. A beggar; one who lives by asking alms; especially, a member of a begging order or fraternity; a begging friar.

Next . . . are certain Mendicants, which live of Rice and Barley, which any man at the first asking giveth them. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 454.

And, but for that, whatever he may vaunt,
Who now's a monk had been a mendicant.

Bp. Hall, Satires, v. 1.
 She from her store of meal Takes one unsparing handful for the scrip
Of this old Mendicant.

Wordsworth, Old Cumberland Beggar.

All the Buddhist priests are mendicants.

J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, iv. 1.

mendicate† (men'di-kāt), v. i. [< L. mendicatus, pp. of mendicare, mendicari (> It. mendicare = Fr. Sp. Pg. mendigar = F. mendier, > E. obs. maund³, q. v.), beg, < mendicus, poor, needy, beggarly; as a noun, a beggar; ulterior origin unknown.] To beg or practise begging.

mendication† (men'di-kā'shon), n. [< mendicare + -ion.] The act or habitual practice of begging.

Two grave and punctual authors . . . omit the history of his [Bellarius's] mendication.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 17.

mendicence†, n. [*ME., equiv. to mendicance: see mendicancy.] Mendicancy.

There hath ben great discord . . .
Upon the estate of mendicence.

Rom. of the Rose.

mendicity (men-dis'i-ti), n. [< ME. mendicitee, < OF. mendicite, F. mendicité = Sp. mendicidad = Pg. mendicidade = It. mendicità, < L. mendicita(t)-s, beggary, pauperism, < mendicus, beggarly: see mendicate.] 1. The state or condition of a beggar; beggariness.

For riches and mendicitees
Ben cleped two extremytees.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 6525.

In the case of professional authors, mendicity often trails mendacity along with it. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., i. 33.

2. The practice of begging; beggary; mendicancy.

mendinant†, n. [ME., < OF. mendinant, ppr. of mendiner, mendier, beg, < mendien, mandien, mendiant, mendicant, begging: see mendiant, mendicant.] A mendicant or begging friar.

Therefore we mendynantz, we sely freres,
Ben wedded to povertie and continence.

Shak., T. and C., i. 1. 68.

menial†, v., n., and a. A Middle English form of mean†, mean², etc.

menial†, n. A Middle English form of meiny.

menial† (mē'nē), a. A Chaldaic word, signifying 'numbered.'

And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. Dan. v. 25, 26.

Mene† (mē'nē), n. [NL., < Gr. μήνη, the moon: see moon.] A genus of acanthopterygian fishes whose species have silvery hues like moonlight, typical of the family Menidae. Lacépède, 1803.

meneghinite (men-e-gē'nit), n. [After Prof. Meneghini (1811-89), a mineralogist, of Pisa University.] A sulphid of antimony and lead having a lead-gray color and bright metallic luster, occurring in orthorhombic crystals, also in massive forms with fibrous structure.

menepernour†, n. Same as mainpernor.

menevair†, n. See miniver.

men-folks (men'fōks), n. pl. The men of a household or community collectively. [Colloq.]

Is it because they are the burden-carriers of the community, carrying in the creels strapped on to their backs loads that the men-folks would scarcely lift from the ground? Harper's Mag., II. 182.

menget, menget, v. Obsolete forms of ming†, ming².

mengcorn†, n. See mangcorn.

mengite (men'jit), n. [After Menge, the discoverer.] A black mineral occurring in small crystals in granite veins in the Ilmen mountains, Urals. Its exact nature is doubtful; it may be identical with columbite.

menget†, v. and n. An obsolete form of ming†.

menhaden (men-hā'dn), n. [Also mankaden; a corruption of Narragansett Indian munhaw-hatteaug (Roger Williams), lit. 'fertilizer,' a name applied to the menhaden, herring, and alewife, all being used by the Indians for manuring their corn-fields.] A clupeoid fish, Brevoortia tyrannus. It has the appearance of a shad, but is still more compressed, has a large head, and the scales are closely imbricated, leaving a high narrow surface exposed, while their posterior margins are pectinated. The jaws and mouth are toothless, and there is a deep median emargination of the upper jaw. The intestinal canal is very long, and the chief food is obtained from mud taken into the stomach. It is one of the most important economic fishes of the eastern coast of the United States; it ranges from 25° to 45° north latitude, and in the summer occurs in the coast-waters of all the Atlantic States from Maine to Florida, but in winter only south of Cape Hatteras. It is the most abundant fish on the eastern coast of the United States. Formerly it was used almost solely for manure, but large quantities are now converted into oil, and many are canned in oil, to be sold as "sardines," like the European fishes so named. It attains a length of from 12 to 16 inches, is bluish above with silvery or brassy sides, the fins usually tinged yellowish or greenish, and has a dark scapular blotch, often with smaller spots behind it. It varies a good deal in details of form and color with age, and to some extent with season and locality. This fish has at least 80 different popular names in the United States, the leading ones being mossbunker, with many variants (see mossbunker), pogy or pogy and its variants, alewife or old-wife, whiting or whitefish, bony fish, bugfish (which see), hardhead, fatback, chebog, pilchard (a misnomer), shooky, shiner, pauhagen (pogaden, pookagan, etc.), yellowtail, green-tailed shad, shadine (as put up in oil), and sardine. The name menhaden extends in literary use to all the other species of Brevoortia, of which there are several, as B. patronus of the Gulf of Mexico; and it is locally misapplied to the thread-herring, Opithonema thrysia. See cut under Brevoortia.

menhir (men'hīr), n. [< Corn. maenhir, < Corn. and W. maen, a stone (cf. dolmen, cistvaen), + hir, long. Cf. longstone.] In archaeol., one of a class of monumental stones of greater or less antiquity, found in various parts of Europe, also in Africa and in regions of Asia, especially in the Khassian hills. They are very abundant in Brittany, France. They are usually tall and massive, either entirely rough or partly cut, and are set upright in or on the ground, either singly or in groups, alignments, circles, or other combinations. See megalithic.

Group of Menhirs at Carnac, Brittany.

All can trace back the history of the menhirs from historic Christian times to non-historic regions, when these rude stone pillars, with or without still ruder inscriptions, were gradually superseding the earthen tumuli as a record of the dead. Fergusson, Rude Stone Monuments, p. 60.

menial (mē'ni-al), a. and n. [Early mod. E. menyall, < ME. meineal, meyneal, < OF. (AF.) mesnial, menial, meignial, pertaining to a household, < meisnee, maisnee, etc., a household: see meiny.] I. a. 1. Belonging to a retinue or train of servants; serving.

Also an Act was made, That no Lord, nor other, might give any Liveries to any but their Household and Menial Servants. Baker, Chronicles, p. 164.

Lo! the sad father, frantic with his pain,
Around him furious drives his menial train.

Pope, Illiad, xxiv. 292.

2. Pertaining to servants or domestic service; servile.

The women attendants perform only the most menial offices. Swift, Gulliver's Travels.

Freebooters, sprung from low castes, and accustomed to menial employments, became mighty Rajahs.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

II. n. A domestic servant; one of a body of household servants: now used chiefly as a term of disparagement.

That all might mark — knight, menial, high, and low.

Cowper, Hope, l. 312.

Hired servants are of three kinds: menials, day-laborers, and agents. A menial is one who dwells in the household of the master, and is employed about domestic concerns, under a contract, express or implied, to continue service for a certain time. Robinson, Elem. of Law, 123.

menialty† (mē'ni-āl-ti), n. [< menial + -ty. Cf. menalty.] Common people collectively.

The vulgar menialty conclude therefore it is like to increase, because a hearshaw (a whole afternoon together) sate on the top of Saint Peter's church in Cornhill.

Nash, Christ's Tears over Jerusalem (1613). (Nares.)

Menidae (men'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mene + -idae.] A family of scombroidean acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Mene. The body is much compressed and the abdomen prominent and trenchant, the mouth very protractile, the dorsal very long and entire, the anal also very long and commencing just behind the ventrals, and the ventrals elongated and complete. Mene maculata is an inhabitant of the Indian Ocean.

menilite (men'i-lit), n. [< Mēnil(montant) (see def.) + -ite.] A variety or subspecies of opaline silica found at Mēnilmontant, a quarter in the eastern part of Paris. It is found in kidney-shaped masses of the size of the hand or larger, sometimes in globules of the size of a nut. It has usually a dull grayish or bluish color.

meningeal (mē-nin'jē-āl), a. [< meninx, pl. meninges, + -al.] Of or pertaining to the meninges. — Meningeal arteries, the arteries supplying the dura mater of the brain, the principal one being the middle or great meningeal from the internal maxillary.

meninges, n. Plural of meninx.

meningitic (men-in-jit'ik), a. [< meningitis + -ic.] Relating or pertaining to meningitis; affected with meningitis.

meningitis (men-in-jit'is), n. [NL., < Gr. μηνιγίτις (μηνιγίτις), a membrane (see meninx), + -itis.] Inflammation of the membranes of the brain or spinal cord. — Epidemic cerebrospinal meningitis, an infectious disease which in ordinary cases is characterized by an acute invasion with violent headache, severe pains and stiffness in the neck, and great malaise, more or less fever, sometimes a chill, and sometimes vomiting. The subsequent course varies greatly, but usually presents severe headache and backache and retraction of the head, tenderness along the spine, often vertigo, stupor, frequently delirium, sometimes convulsions, sometimes vomiting, with paralysis of the ocular and facial muscles or abnormal stimulation of the same. The spinal nerves exhibit more or less disturbance; herpes facialis is frequent, and other skin affections, such as petechiae, roseola, and urticaria. The spleen may be slightly but is not greatly enlarged. The disease lasts from two to four weeks in many cases, but it may be fatal in a few days, or a severe invasion may be followed by equally speedy recovery; on the other hand, it may last for eight weeks or more. It is most frequent in children, but adults are not exempt. The infection inheres in localities; proximity to or contact with the sick does not seem to increase exposure. Anatomically, the disease presents a purulent leptomeningitis of the cerebrospinal axis. Also called black death, black fever, cerebrospinal fever, congestive fever, malignant meningitis, malignant purpura, malignant purpuric fever, neuropurpuric fever, pestilential purpura, petechial fever, phrenitis typhodes, purple fever, spotted fever, typhoid meningitis, typhus petechialis, typhus syncoptalis. — Tubercular meningitis. See tubercular.

meningocele (mē-nin'gō-sēl), n. [< Gr. μηνιγίς (μηνιγίς), a membrane, + κῆλη, a tumor.] In pathol., hernia of the meninges or cranial membranes; cerebral hernia confined to the membranes.

meningococcus (mē-nin'gō-kok-us), n. [NL., < Gr. μηνιγίς (μηνιγίς), a membrane, + κόκκος, a kernel.] A coccus supposed to be the cause of cerebrospinal fever.

meningorachidian, meningorachidian (mē-nin'gō-rā-kid'i-an), a. [< Gr. μηνιγίς (μηνιγίς), a membrane, + ράχις (ράχις), the spine.] Pertaining to the meninges or membranes of the spinal cord and to the rachis or spine: as, the meningorachidian veins. See spinal.

meninguria (men-ing-gū'ri-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μηνιγίς (μηνιγίς), a membrane, + οὐρον, urine.] Urine containing membranous shreds.

meninting (me-nin'ting), n. [Javanese.] A three-toed kingfisher, Ceyx meninting.

meninx (mē'ninks), n.; pl. meninges (mē-nin'-jēz). [NL., < Gr. μηνιγίς (μηνιγίς), a membrane, esp. of the brain.] In anat., a membrane; especially, one of the three membranes that invest the brain and spinal cord. They are the dura mater, the arachnoid, and the pia mater, named in order from without inward. See these words.

meniscal (mē-nis'kal), a. [< meniscus + -al.] Pertaining to or having the form of a meniscus.

meniscate (mē-nis'kāt), a. [< meniscus + -ate.] Resembling the section of a meniscus: applied in botany to a cylindrical body bent into a semicircle.

menisciform (mē-nis'i-fōrm), a. [< Gr. μηνίσκος, a crescent (see meniscus), + L. forma, form.] Of the form of a meniscus or crescent.

meniscoid (mē-nis'koid), a. [< Gr. μηνίσκος, a crescent, + ειδός, form.] Like a meniscus; crescent-shaped; concavo-convex.

meniscoidal (men-is-koi'dal), a. [< meniscoid + -al.] Same as meniscoid.

meniscus (mē-nis'kus), n.; pl. menisci (-i). [< NL. meniscus, < Gr. μηνίσκος, a crescent, dim. of μήν, the moon: see moon.] 1. A crescent or crescent-shaped body. Specifically — 2. A lens, convex on one side and concave on the other, and thicker in the center, so that its section presents the appearance of the moon in its first quarter. As the convexity exceeds the concavity, a meniscus may be regarded as a convex lens (also called a converging meniscus); the corresponding form in which the convexity is less than the concavity is sometimes but improperly called a diverging meniscus. See cut under lens.

3. The convex or concave surface of a liquid, caused by capillarity: thus, the mercury in a barometer has a convex meniscus, but spirit or water a concave meniscus.

— 4. In anat., an inter-articular fibrocartilage, of a rounded, oval, disk-like, or falcate shape, situated between the ends of bones, in the interior of joints, attached by the margins. Such cartilages are found in man in the temporomaxillary, the sternoclavicular, and sometimes the acromioclavicular articulations, and in the wrist- and knee-joints.

5. In zool., a peculiar organ, of doubtful function, found in Echinorhynchus, a genus of acanthocephalous parasitic worms. Huxley.

menisot, n. [< ME. menuse, < OF. menuse, menuse, menuse, any small object, small fish, small fry, < menutser, make small, diminish: see minish.] 1. Small fish; small fry. — 2. A minnow.

The little roach, the menis biting fast.

John Denny (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 167).

menisont, mensont, n. [< ME. menison, menison, menyoun, menesoun, < OF. meneison, menison, menison, menison, maneson, dysentery, diarrhea, < LL. manatio(n), a flowing: see manation.] Diarrhea; dysentery.

Bothe meeles & mute, and in the menyoun bloody.

Piers Plowman (B), xvi. 111.

Menispermaceae (men'i-spēr-mā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1824), < Menispermum + -aceae.] A natural order of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, of which the genus Menispermum is the type, belonging to the cohort Ranales. It is characterized by small, usually three-parted, discous flowers, with the petals shorter than the sepals, and solitary seeds, which are attached by the ventral face, and have the micropyle above. The order embraces about 57 genera and 350 species, the number of which may, however, be greatly reduced; they are found principally within the tropics, although a few occur in North America, western Asia, and Australia. They are principally woody climbers, with alternate leaves and clusters of small flowers. The plants possess active narcotic and bitter properties, some being very poisonous, while others are used as tonics. It includes 4 tribes, the Tinosporaceae, Cocculaceae, Cissampelideae, and Pachygoneae.

menispermaceous (men'i-spēr-mā'shi-us), a. Of, pertaining to, or having the characters of the Menispermaceae.

menispermic (men-i-spēr'mal), a. [< Menispermum + -ic.] Relating to the Menispermaceae, or to the larger group to which that order belongs.

menispermate (men-i-spēr'māt), n. [< menispermic + -ate.] A compound of menispermic acid and a base.

menispermic (men-i-spēr'mik), a. [< menispermum + -ic.] Obtained from the seeds of the menispermaceous plant Anamirta Cocculus: applied to an acid.

menispermine (men-i-spēr'min), n. [< menispermum + -ine.] An alkaloid extracted from the shells of the fruit of Anamirta Cocculus. It is tasteless and medicinally inert. See Cocculus.

Menispermum (men-i-spēr'mum), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1705), so called from the half-moon shape of the seeds; < Gr. μήν, the moon, + σπέρμα, a seed.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants, type of the natural order Menispermaceae, the moonseed family, and belonging to the tribe Cocculaceae, characterized by having the embryo horseshoe-shaped, and by having from twelve to an indefinite number of stamens. They are climbing plants, with partially peltate, palmately lobed or angled leaves, flowers in panicles, and the fruit a compressed drupe. There are 2 species — M. Canadense, the Canadian moonseed, native of North America, and M. Dauricum, indigenous to the temperate parts of eastern Asia. The former is a desirable arbor-vine, though its flowers are inconspicuous. Its fruit is black with a bloom, resembling small grapes.

2. [i. c.] The pharmacopoeial name of the rhizome and rootlets of Menispermum Canadense. It is little used in medicine, and seems inert. Also called Texas sarsaparilla.

meniveri, n. An obsolete form of miniver.

mennard (men'ard), n. [See minnow.] A minnow. [Prov. Eng.]

mennawet, n. An obsolete form of minnow.

Mennonist (men'on-ist), n. [< Mennonite + -ist.] Same as Mennonite.

Mennonite (men'on-it), n. [< Menno (see def.) + -ite.] A member of a Christian denomination which originated in Friesland in the early part of the sixteenth century, and holds doctrines of which Menno Simons (1492-1559) was the chief exponent. The leading features of the Mennonite bodies have been baptism on profession of faith, refusal of oaths, of civic offices, and of the support of the state in war, and a tendency to asceticism. Many of these beliefs and practices have been modified. The sect became divided in the seventeenth century into the "Upland" ("Obere") Mennonites or Ammanites and the "Lowland" ("Untere") Mennonites, the former being the more conservative and rigorous. Members of the sect are found in the Netherlands, Germany, Russia, etc., and especially in the United States. In the last-named country they are divided into "Untere" or Old Mennonites, "Obere" Mennonites or Ammanites, New Mennonites, Evangelical Mennonites, and Reformed Mennonites (or Herrians).

menobranch (men'ō-brang), n. An animal of the genus Menobranchus.

Menobranchidae (men'ō-brang'ki-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menobranchus + -idae.] A family of amphibians named from the genus Menobranchus: same as Proteidae.

Menobranchus (men'ō-brang'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. μένειν, remain (see remain), + βράχια, gills.] 1. A genus of tailed amphibians of the family Proteidae, characterized by the persistence of Menobranchus or Necturus maculatus.

the gills and the possession of four limbs with four well-developed digits. It is the American representative of the Old World genus Proteus. M. maculatus inhabits the waters of the Mississippi basin and of the Great Lakes, while M. punctatus is found in those of the south Atlantic watershed. The genus is also called Necturus.

2. [i. c.] An animal of this genus.

Menocerca (men'ō-sēr'kă), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μένειν, remain, + κέρκος, a tail.] A series of Old World catarrhine simians, from which the tailless apes (Anthropoidea) and man are by some supposed to be derived, as well as the existing tailed monkeys and baboons. Haeckel.

menocercal (men'ō-sēr'kal), a. [< Menocerca + -al.] Of or pertaining to the Menocerca.

Menodontidae (men'ō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menodus (-odont-) + -idae.] A family of fossil perissodactyls, typified by the genus Menodus, to which are probably also referable such forms as Titanotherium of Leidy, Brontotherium of Marsh, and Symborodon of Cope.

Menodus (men'ō-dus), n. [NL. (Pomel, 1849), < Gr. μήν, a crescent, + οδών (οδών) = E. tooth.] A genus of fossil perissodactyls, typical of the family Menodontidae.

menolipsis (men'ō-lip'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, month (> μήναια, the menses), + λείψις, a failing.] In pathol., the failure or retention of the catamenia.

menologium (men'ō-lō'ji-um), n. Same as menology.

menology (mē-nol'ō-jī), n. [= F. ménologe = Sp. Pg. menologio, < ML. menologium, < MGr. μηνολόγιον, a calendar of months, < Gr. μήν, a month (see month), + λόγος, an account, < λέγειν, speak, tell: see -ology.] 1. A register of months, or of occurrences in the order of the months.

In a Saxon menology of great antiquity, the author . . . goes on to say, etc.

J. M. Kemble, Saxons in England, I. 423.

2. A list or calendar of martyrs; specifically, in the Gr. Ch., a book which contains a list of all the festivals celebrated throughout the year, and the lives of the church saints and martyrs. It corresponds to the martyrology of the Roman Catholic Church.

menopause (men'ō-pāz), n. [= F. ménopause, < Gr. μήν, month (> μηναία, the menses), + παύσις, a cessation.] The final cessation of the menses or monthly courses of women, which occurs normally between the ages of forty-five and fifty; the end of menstruation.

menoplasia (men'ō-plā'ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, month (> μηναία, the menses), + πλάσις, a wandering, deviation.] In pathol., a discharge of blood, at the catamenial period, from some other part of the body than the womb; an aberration of the menstrual flow. Thomas, Med. Diet.

Menopoma (men'ō-pō'mā), n. [NL., so called with ref. to its permanent gill-openings; < Gr. μένειν, remain, + πόμα, a lid.] A genus of large tailed amphibians, typical of the family Menopomidae: so called from the persistence of the gill-slits or branchial apertures. The genus is peculiar to America, where it represents the so-called "giant salamander" of Japan (Cryptobranchus, or Sieboldia, or Megalobatrachus maximus). There are two species of these large, ugly, and repulsive creatures, M. alleghaniensis and M. horrida. They have four short but well-formed limbs, the fore feet four-toed and the hind feet five-toed. They attain a length of one or two feet, and live in muddy waters of the Alleghany region and Mississippi basin. They are voracious, may readily be taken with hook and line, and are very tenacious of life. They are the largest amphibians of America, and are wrongly reputed to be poisonous. They are popularly known by the names of hellbender, mud-devil, water-puppy, water-dog, ground puppy, and twoggs. The genus is also called Protonopis, its two species being then known as P. fusca and P. horrida. See cut under hellbender.

Menopomatidae (men'ō-pō-mat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Menopomidae. Hogg, 1838.

menopome (men'ō-pōm), n. [NL. Menopoma.] An animal of the genus Menopoma.

Menopomidae (men'ō-pōm'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menopoma + -idae.] A family of tailed amphibians named from the genus Menopoma. It is composed of the two genera Menopoma (or Protonopis) and Megalobatrachus (or Sieboldia or Cryptobranchus), and is also called Protonopidae and Cryptobranchidae.

menorrhagia (men'ō-rā'jī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, month (> μηναία, menses), + -παγία, a flowing, < πρὸς, break. Cf. hemorrhage.] 1. In physiol., ordinary menstruation.—2. In pathol., an immoderate menstrual discharge; menorrhagy.

menorrhagic (men'ō-rā'jīk), a. [< menorrhagy + -ic.] Of or pertaining to menorrhagia; also, affected with menorrhagia.

menorrhagy (men'ō-rā'jī), n. Same as menorrhagia.

menorrhoea (men'ō-rē'ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, month (> μηναία, menses), + ροία, a flowing, < ρεῖν, flow.] 1. In physiol., the normal menstrual flow.—2. In pathol., prolonged menstruation.

menostasis (mē-nos'tā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, a month (> μηναία, menses), + στάσις, a standing: see stasis.] 1. In pathol., the retention of the menses and their accumulation in the uterus; suppression or retention of the catamenial discharge.—2. The acute pain which in some women precedes each appearance of the menses: so called because it is presumed to be occasioned by stagnancy of the blood in the capillary vessels of the uterus.

menostation (men-os-tā'shon), n. [< Gr. μήν, a month (> μηναία, menses), + L. statio(-n-), standing: see station.] Same as menostasis.

Menotyphla (men'ō-tif'lā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μένειν, remain, + τυφλός, blind (with ref. to the caecum).] In some systems of classification, a division of the mammalian order Insectivora, including those forms which possess a caecum, as distinguished from those without a caecum, or Lipotyphla.

menotyphlic (men'ō-tif'lik), a. [< Menotyphla + -ic.] Having a caecum; specifically, of or pertaining to the Menotyphla.

menour, n. A Middle English form of minor.

menow, n. An obsolete form of minnow.

mensa (men'sā), n.; pl. mensae (-sē). [L.] A table, or something resembling a table. Spect.

menstruum (men'strō-um), n.; pl. menstrua, menstruums (-ā, -umz). [ML., neut. of L. menstruus, of a month, monthly: see menstruous. The reason of the name in the chemical use is not determined.] Any fluid substance which dissolves a solid; a solvent.

Briefly, it [the material of gems] consisteth of parts so far from an idle dissolution that powerful menstruums are made for its emolition. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 1.

All liquors are called menstruums which are used as solvents, or to extract the virtues of ingredients by infusion or decoction. Quincy.

The intellect dissolves fire, gravity, laws, method, and the subtlest unnamed relations of nature in its restless menstruum. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 295.

mensual (men'sū-āl), a. [= F. mensuel = Sp. mensual = It. mensuale, < L. mensualis, < mensis, a month: see month. Cf. *mensal*².] Of or relating to a month; occurring once a month; monthly.

The arrangement [of a table showing the distribution of earthquakes] is mensual. J. Múne, Earthquakes, p. 259.

Those series of biographies which issue with mensual regularity from Paternoster Row. N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 522.

mensurability (men'sū-rā-bil'i-ti), n. The property of being mensurable.

The common quality which characterizes all of them is their mensurability. Reid, On Quantity.

mensurable (men'sū-rā-bl), a. [= F. mensurable = Sp. mensurable = Pg. mensuravel, < LL.

mensurabilis, that can be measured, < mensurare, measure: see mensurate, measure. Cf. measurable.] 1. Capable of being measured; measurable.

The solar month . . . is not easily mensurable. Holder.

2. In music, noting that style of music which succeeded the earliest plain-song, and was distinguished from it by such a combination of simultaneous but independent voice-parts that a system of rhythm was necessitated to avoid confusion. It involved both a classification of rhythms and the invention of a notation to represent rhythmic values. Two principal rhythms were recognized: tempus perfectum, which was triple (called "perfect" for fanciful theological reasons), and tempus imperfectum, which was duple. The system of notation included notes and rests called large, maxima, long, breve, semibreve, minim, semiminima, fusa, and semifusa (fusella), of which in general each note was equal in duration to either three or two of the next denomination, according to the tempus used. (See the various words.) The working out of the system was highly complicated, but it prepared the way for the medieval study of counterpoint and for the invention of an adequate notation, and thus contributed directly to the progress of musical art. Also mensural.

mensurableness (men'sū-ra-bl-nes), n. The quality of being mensurable; mensurability. Bailey, 1727.

mensural (men'sū-rāl), a. [= Sp. Pg. mensural, < LL. mensuralis, of or belonging to measuring, < L. mensura, measuring: see measure, n.] 1. Pertaining to measure.—2. Same as mensurable, 2.—Mensural note, in musical notation, a note whose form indicates its time-value relative to other notes in the same piece, as in the ordinary modern notation.—Mensural signature. See signature and rhythmic.

mensurate (men'sū-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. mensurated, ppr. mensurating. [LL. mensuratus, pp. of mensurare (> It. mensurare = Sp. Pg. mensurar = F. mesurer), measure, < mensura, measuring, measure: see measure, n. Cf. measure, v.] To measure; to ascertain the dimensions or quantity of. [Rare.]

mensuration (men'sū-rā'shon), n. [= F. mensuration = Pr. mensuratio = Sp. mensuración, < LL. mensuratio(-n-), measuring, < mensurare, measure: see mensurate, measure.] The act, art, or process of measuring; specifically, the act or art of determining length, area, volume, content, etc., by measurement and computation: as, the rules of mensuration; the mensuration of surfaces and solids.

The measure which he [the Christian] would have others mete out to himself is the standard whereby he desires to be tried in his mensurations to all other.

Sp. Hall, The Christian, § 11.

mensurative (men'sū-rā-tiv), a. [mensurate + -ive.] Capable of measuring; adapted for measurement, or for taking the measure of things.

"Yes, Friends," observes the Professor, "not our Logical, Mensurative faculty, but our Imaginative one, is King over us." Carlyle, Sartor Resartus (ed. 1881), p. 168.

The third method spoken of may be called the mensuration.

Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXII. 342.

ment¹. An obsolete preterit of mean¹.

ment². An obsolete preterit of ming¹.

ment³, v. i. A variant of mint³.

-ment. [ME. -ment = OF. and F. -ment = Sp. -miento = Pg. aromatic labiate plants belonging to the tribe Satureieae, type of the subtribe Menthoideae. It is characterized by 4 stamens, which are nearly equal and distant or diverging, with parallel anther-cells, and by a calyx which is 10-nerved and 5-toothed. Over 300 species have been described, but the plants vary greatly, and the number may be reduced to 25: they are widely distributed over the world, but are found principally in the temperate regions. They are erect diffuse herbs with opposite leaves, and flowers in dense whorls, arranged in terminal or axillary heads or spikes. The common name of the genus is mint. See mint¹, horsemint, hillwort, pennyroyal, and peppermint.

menthene (men'thēn), n. [L. mentha, mint, + -ene.] A liquid hydrocarbon (C₁₀H₁₈) obtained from peppermint-oil.

Menthoideae (men-thoi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Benthams, 1832), < Mentha + -oideae.] A subtribe of labiate plants of the tribe Satureieae. It is characterized by distant or divaricate stamens, with anthers which are 2-celled, at least when young, and by a calyx which is almost always from 5 to 10-nerved. It embraces 20 genera, of which Mentha is the type, and about 500 species, although the latter number may be much reduced. The plants are found in both hemispheres, but are almost wholly confined to the temperate or subtropical regions.

menthol (men'thol), n. [L. mentha, mint, + -ol.] In chem., a solid crystalline body (C₁₀H₂₀O) which separates from oil of peppermint on standing. It has the odor of peppermint, melts at 108° F., and volatilizes unchanged at a higher temperature. It is used in medicine as a local application in neuralgia. Also called peppermint-camphor.

It was known that menthol . . . generated a keen feeling of cold on being spread over the forehead.

Dr. Goldschneider, Nature, XXXIV. 71.

Menticirrus (men-ti-sir'us), n. [NL., orig. Menticirrus (Gill, 1861), < L. mentum, the chin, + cirrus, a tuft of hair: see cirrus.] A genus of sciaenoid fishes. There are about 11 species, all American, as M. nebulosus, of the Atlantic coast of the United States, where it is known as kingfish, whiting, and barb; M. alburnus, a more southern whiting of the same coast; and M. undulatus, the bagara of the Pacific coast. They are highly prized for the table. See cut under kingfish.

menticultural (men-ti-kul'tūr-al), a. [L. men(t)-s, the mind, + cultura, culture: see culture.] Cultivating or improving the mind. Imp. Dict.

mentiferous (men-tif'e-rus), a. [L. men(t)-s, the mind, + ferre = E. bear¹.] Conveying or transferring mind or thought; telepathic: as, mentiferous ether. [Recent.]

mention (men'shon), n. [ME. mentoun, mentoun, < OF. mention, F. mention = Sp. men-cion = Pg. menção = It. menzione, < L. mentio(-n-), a calling to mind, a speaking, mention, akin to men(t)-s, mind, < memini (√ men, min), have in mind, remember: see mind¹.] 1. Statement about or reference to a person or thing; notice or remark; especially, assertion or statement without details or particulars.

He did many grete dedes of armes, of whiche is yet made no mention, till that my mater com ther-to.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), I. 124.

And sleep in dull, cold marble, where no mention
Of me more must be heard of.

Shak., Hen. VIII., III. 2. 433.

Let us . . . speak of things at hand
Useful; whence haply mention may arise
Of something not unseasonable to ask.

Milton, P. L., viii. 200.

Now, the mention [of God's name] is vain, when it is useless.

Paley, Moral Philoa., iv. 2.

2. Indication; evidence. [Rare.]

It [the earthquake] brought vp the Sea a great way vpon the maine Land, which is carried backe with it into the Sea, not leauing mention that there had bene Land.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 552.

3t. Note; reputation.

'Tis true, I have been a rascal, as you are,
A fellow of no mention, nor no mark.

Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, v. 3.

4t. Report; account.

And wheresoeuer my fortunes shall conduct me,
So worthy mentions I shall render of you,
So vertuous and so fair.

Beau. and Fl., Custom of the Country, I. 1.

mention (men'shon), v. t. [F. mentioner = Sp. Pg. mencionar = It. menzionare, < ML. mentiare, mention, < L. mentio(-n-), mention: see mention, n.] To make mention of; speak of briefly or cursorily; speak of; name; refer to.

I will mention the lovingkindnesses of the Lord.

Isa. lxiii. 7.

I mention Egypt, where proud kings
Did our forefathers yoke. Milton, Psalm lxxxvii.

This road was formerly called Via Antoniana: the ascent to it is difficult, and a Latin inscription is cut on the a, flower; b, calyx.

rock, mentioning the name of the road, and that it was made by the emperor Aurelius.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. 1. 92.

mentionable (men'shon-a-bl), a. [< mention + -able.] That can or may be mentioned.

mentohyoid (men-tō-hi'oid), a. and n. [< L. mentum, the chin, + NL. hyoides, hyoid.] I. a. Pertaining to the chin and to the hyoid bone.

II. n. An occasional muscle in man, passing between the chin and the hyoid bone.

mentomeckelian (men'tō-me-kē'li-an), n. [< L. mentum, the chin, + Meckel (see def.) + -ian.] A distal division of Meckel's cartilage around which the lower jaw ossifies, as distinguished from a proximal division which is converted into a part of the suspensorium of the jaw or an ossicle of the ear.

mentonnière (mōn-ton-iār'), n. [F., < OF. mentoniere, < menton, the chin, < L. mentum, the chin: see mentum.] 1. Same as beaver.
—2. A piece of armor, used on occasions of special danger as an appendage to the open helmet, worn about the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century. It was put on outside of the gorget, secured to the helmet by hooks on each side and by a slot or similar contrivance at the umbril, and thus replaced the visor and beaver of the armor, except that it was not capable of being raised, but had to be removed altogether.

3. An extra defense used during the just, protecting the throat and lower part of the face. [Rare.]

mentor (men'tor), n. [< L. Mentor, < Gr. Μέντωρ, Mentor (or Athena in his guise), friend and adviser of Odysseus (Ulysses) and of Telemachus; prob. 'adviser,' akin to L. monitor, adviser: see monitor.] One who acts as a wise and faithful guide and monitor, especially of a younger person; an intimate friend who is also a sage counselor, as of one who is young or inexperienced.

mentorial (men-tō'ri-al), a. [< mentor + -ial.] Containing advice or admonition.

mentum (men'tum), n.; pl. menta (-tā). [L., the chin.] 1. The chin; the anterior and inferior part of the mandible or under jawbone of a mammal, with or without associated soft parts. It sometimes is regarded as including the parts in the whole interramal space, or interval between the horizontal ramus of the mandible.

2. In entom., the median or central and usually principal part of the labium. The term has been applied to different parts of the labium, in different insects and also in the same insect, whence confusion has arisen, especially in the use of the terms mentum and submentum. The mentum is properly the part of the labium between the submentum and the ligula, and is often less conspicuous than either of these. See labium, and cut at mouth-parts.

3. In bot., a projection in front of the flower in some orchids, caused by the extension of the foot of the column.—Levator menti. See levator.—Mentum abscissum, the retreating chin, not attaining to a perpendicular let fall from the alveolar border of the jaw; a chin with no prominence.—Mentum prominulum, the protrusive chin, extending beyond a perpendicular let fall from the alveolar border of the jaw.—Quadratus menti, the depressor labii inferioris, a muscle of the chin which draws down the lower lip.—Symphysis menti, the midline of union of the two halves of the lower jawbone.—Tooth of the mentum. Same as mentum-tooth.—Triangularis menti, the depressor anguli oris, a muscle which draws down the corner of the mouth.

mentum-tooth (men'tum-tōth), n. In entom., a small median process on the front margin of the mentum, generally within an emargination. It is found in certain Coleoptera.

Mentzelia (ment-zē'li-ā), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after C. Mentzel, a botanical author of Brandenburg in the 17th century.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Loaseae. It is distinguished by a one-celled ovary with an indefinite number of ovules, by having no scales on the corolla, and by alternate leaves. About 40 species are known, which are found in the warmer and tropical regions of America, especially in the western part. They are herbs or small shrubs, usually with rigid tenacious barbed hairs, leaves which are mostly coarsely toothed or pinnatifid, and yellow or white flowers, which are cymose or solitary.

Mentonnière, close of 15th century.

menu (mē-nū'), n. [F., < L. minutum, neut. of minutus, small: see minute.] A bill of fare.

You have read the menu, may you read it again:
Champagne, perigord, galantine, and—champagne.
Locker, Mr. Flacid's Flirtation.

Menura (mē-nū'rā), n. [NL., so called in ref. to the extraordinary form of the tail (which is otherwise compared to a lyre), < Gr. μύρη, the moon, + οὐρά, tail.] The typical and only known genus of Menuridae. Three species are described: M. superba, M. victoria, and M. alberti, all of Australia, and two apparently valid. See cut under lyre-bird. Also written, incorrectly, Manura, Manura.

menurancet, n. See manurancet.

menuret, v. t. See manure.

Menuridae (mē-nū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menura + -idae.] An Australian family of anomalous or pseudosciniine passerine birds, represented by the genus Menura; the lyre-birds. It is one of two families (the other being Archibirdidae) which, though belonging to the order Passeres, deviate from the normal passerine type in the structure of the vocal organs and in some other particulars, to such an extent that a separate division of the order has been established for their reception. (See Menuridae and Pseudosciniine.) The remarkable conformation of the tail of the male birds early attracted attention, and the size and general appearance of the birds caused them for many years to be considered as raptorial or gallinaceous, they being accordingly ranked with the mound-birds, curassows, and guans. Subsequently they were referred by some authors to the American family of rock-wrens (Pteropodidae). It is only of late years that a knowledge of the anatomical structure has enabled ornithologists to classify the family correctly.

menuroid (men'ū-roid), a. Having the characters of the Menuridae; pseudosciniine.

Menuridae (men-ū-roi'dē-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menura + -idae.] A superfamily of pseudosciniine passerine birds containing the Menuridae and Archibirdidae, or the Australian lyre-birds and scrub-birds, characterized by the abnormal structure of the acromyodian syrinx, and the disposition of the tensor patagii brevis as in picarian birds.

menuse, v. A Middle English form of minish.

menuse, n. See menise.

Menyanthes (men-i-an'thē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Grisebach, 1839), < Menyanthes + -ea.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Gentianeae, the gentian family. It is characterized by having radical or alternate leaves, and by the lobes of the corolla being induplicate-valvate in the bud. It embraces 4 genera, of which Menyanthes is the type, and about 40 species.

Menyanthes (men-i-an'thē-ē), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), impropr. for Menianthes or Menanthes, < Gr. μνναίος, or μνναίος, monthly, or μνν, month, + άνθος, flower.] A genus of plants of the natural order Gentianeae, type of the tribe Menyantheae. It is characterized by a capsule which breaks open irregularly at the top into two partial valves, and by long petiolate radical leaves, which are trifoliate or round, reniform, and crenate. There are two species, or perhaps only one, M. trifoliata, the bog-bean, buck-bean, or marsh-trefoil. They are herbaceous water-plants, with a creeping rootstock, sheathed by the membranous bases of the long petioles, and bear white or bluish flowers, which grow in a raceme at the apex of a long leafless scape. See bog-bean.

menyet, menyiet, n. Other forms of meiny.

menyngt, n. A Middle English form of meaning.

menzie (mē'zi-ē), n. A Scotch form of meiny.

Before all the menzie, and in her moment of power, the Queen humbled her to the dust by taxing her with her shame.
Scott, Abbot, xxi.

Menzieles (men-zī-ē'si-ē), n. [NL. (J. E. Smith, 1806), so named after Archibald Menzies (died 1842), surgeon and naturalist to the expedition under Vancouver. The surname Menzies, prop. Menyies (the s being orig. merely another shape of y), appears to be derived from ME. menzie, i. e. menyie, var. of meiny, etc., a household: see meiny.] A genus of plants of the natural order Ericaceae and the tribe Rhodoreae. It is distinguished by the loose coat of the seeds, the short gamopetalous corolla, and the 4- to 6-celled ovary. There are 7 species, natives of North America, Japan, and Kamchatka, shrubs with alternate petioled entire deciduous leaves, and small or medium-sized flowers in terminal racemes. One species, M. globularis, is found in the Alleghanies. The Irish heath, Daboecia polifolia, was formerly included in this genus.

meoblet, a. and n. See moble.

meont, n. [< Gr. μών, spiguel: see Meum.]

Mephistophelean (mef'is-tō-fē'lē-an), a. [< Mephistopheles + -an.] Same as Mephistophelean.

Wit is apt to be cold . . . and Mephistophelean in men who have no relish for humour.
George Eliot, Essays, German Wit.

Mephistopheles (mef-is-tōf'e-lēz), n. [Written Mephistophilus in Shakspeare, Fletcher, etc.,

Mephistophilus in Marlowe, but now generally Mephistopheles, as in Goethe; a made-up name, like most of the names of the medieval devils. Whether the orig. concocter of the name meant to form it from Gr. μῆ, not, + φῶς (phōs-), light, + φίλος, loving (a plausible etymology, though the formation is irregular), or from some other elements (some conjecture Gr. νέφος, a cloud, + φίλος, loving), or merely concocted a Greek-seeming name of no meaning, must be left to conjecture.] The name of a familiar spirit mentioned in the old legend of Sir John Faustus, and a principal agent in Marlowe's play of Dr. Faustus, and in Goethe's "Faust."

Then he may pleasure the king, at a dead pinch too,
Without a Mephistophilus, such as thou art.
Fletcher, Wife for a Month, v. 1.

Mephistopheles . . . is the Spirit of Negation, and his being exists through opposition to the positive Truth, and Order, and Beauty, which proceed from the never-ending creative energy of the Deity. . . . His irreverence and irony are . . . a part of his nature.
B. Taylor, Faust, I, note 53.

Mephistophelian (mef'is-tō-fē'li-an), a. [Also Mephistophelian; < Mephistopheles + -ian.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling in character the spirit Mephistopheles; diabolical; sardonic; jeering; irreverent.

mephitic (mē-fit'ik), a. [= F. méphitique = Sp. mefitico = Pg. mephitico = It. mefitico, < LL. mephiticus, pestilential, < L. mephitis, a pestilential exhalation: see mephitis.] Pertaining to mephitis; foul; noxious; pestilential; poisonous; stifling.

The schools kept the thinking faculty alive and active, when the disturbed state of civil life, the mephitic atmosphere engendered by the dominant ecclesiasticism, and the almost total neglect of natural knowledge might well have stifled it.
Huxley, Nineteenth Century, XXI. 195.

That strange and scarcely known life, alas! of almost mephitic odor, the xerophyllum.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 863.

Mephitic gas, carbon dioxide.

mephitical (mē-fit'ik-al), a. [< mephitic + -al.] Same as mephitic.

mephitically (mē-fit'ik-al-i), adv. [< mephitical + -ly.] With mephitis; foully; pestilentially.

Mephitinae (mef-i-tī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mephitis + -inae.] A subfamily of Mustelidae peculiar to America, typified by the genus Mephitis; the skunks. The group is closely related to the badgers or Melinae and to the African Zoridinae, the three being combined by some authors. But the Mephitinae are distinguished by having 2 or 4 more teeth in the lower than in the upper jaw, the back upper molar quadrate, and the premolars 3 above and below on each side (in one genus only 2 above on each side). The form is stout, with moderately developed limbs, unwebbed digits, and long bushy tail; the coloration is black and white; there is no subcaudal pouch as in badgers, but the perineal glands are enormously developed, secreting the fetid fluid which forms a means of defense and offense. The habits are terrestrial and to some extent fossorial. There are 3 genera, Mephitis, Spilogale, and Conopatus.

mephitis (mē-fi'tis), n. [< L. mephitis, a pestilential exhalation; personified, Mephitis, also Mefitis, a goddess who averts pestilential exhalations.] 1. A pestilential exhalation, especially from the earth; any noxious or ill-smelling emanation, as from putrid or filthy substances; a noisome or poisonous stench.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of skunks, typical of the subfamily Mephitinae. The teeth are 34 in number, 16 above and 18 below. The pelage is very long, the tail long and very bushy, and the coloration black, striped or spotted with white. The palate ends opposite the last molar; the mastoid process is flaring; the periotics are not much inflated; the zygoma rises backward; and the profile of the skull is highest over the orbits. The nostrils are lateral, and the soles hairy, at least in part. There are several species, of North and Central America, the best-known of which is M. mephitica, the common skunk. M. macrura is the long-tailed skunk of Mexico. The little striped skunk, M. putorius of the United States, is referred by Coates to the genus Spilogale. The South American and African skunks which have been referred to Mephitis belong to other genera. See skunk.

mephitism (mē-fi'tizm), n. [< mephitis + -ism.] Same as mephitis, 1. Dunghison.

Mephistophilus, Mephistophilist, n. See Mephistopheles.

meraculous (mē-rā'shus), a. [Erroneously for meracious, < L. meracus, pure, unmixed, < merus, pure: see mere.] Without admixture or adulteration; pure; hence, strong; racy.

meracity (mē-ras'i-ti), n. [< L. meracus, pure: see meracious.] Clearness or pureness. Bailey, 1731.

meraline (mēr'a-lin), n. A woolen material for women's dresses and cloaks, usually having a narrow stripe.

mercable (mēr'ka-bl), a. [< L. mercabilis, that can be bought, < mercari, trade, buy: see merchant.] Capable of being bought or sold; merchantable. Bailey, 1731.

mercantile (mēr'kan-tīl), a. [Formerly also mercantil; < OF. mercantīl, F. mercantile = Sp. Pg. mercantil = It. mercantile, < ML. mercantilis, of a merchant or of trade, < L. mercant (-t)s, a merchant, trading: see merchant.] 1. Of or pertaining to merchants, or the traffic carried on by merchants; having to do with trade or commerce; trading; commercial.

Bonrepaux . . . was esteemed an adept in the mystery of mercantile politics. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. Characteristic of the business of merchants; in accord with business principles.

It was found essential to establish the work [the "Edinburgh Review"] on a sound mercantile basis, with a paid editor and paid writers. Sydney Smith, Wit and Wisdom.

Mercantile law, the laws applicable to commercial transactions; the law merchant. See law merchant, under law. — Mercantile system, in polit. econ., the belief, generally held till the end of the last century, that all wealth consists in gold and silver, and that therefore the exportation of goods and importation of gold should be encouraged by the state, while the importation of goods and the exportation of gold should be forbidden, or at least restricted as much as possible.

While there are so many things to render the assumption which is the basis of the mercantile system plausible, there is also some small foundation in reason, though a very insufficient one, for the distinction which that system so emphatically draws between money and every other kind of valuable possession. J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., Prelim. Rem.

Thus, the Mercantile System admits every mode of applying the three factors of production, but considers them really productive only in so far as they increase the quantity of the precious metals possessed by the nation, either through the agency of mining at home or by means of foreign trade. W. Roemer, Pol. Econ. (trans.), I. 169.

— Syn. Mercantile, Commercial. Commercial is the broader term, including the other. Mercantile applies only to the actual purchase and sale of goods, according to one's line of business; the mercantile class in a community comprises all such as are actually in the business of buying and selling. Commercial covers the whole theory and practice of commerce, home or foreign: as, the British are a commercial people; commercial usages, honor, law. The word is applicable wherever the more varied activities of commerce are concerned.

mercantilism (mēr'kan-tīl-izm), n. [mercantile + -ism.] 1. The mercantile spirit or character; devotion to trade and commerce; excessive importance attached to traffic, or to exchange of values in any way.

Mercantilism is drawing into its vortex the intellectual strength of the nation. The Century, XXXI. 811.

2. In polit. econ., the mercantile system, or the theories embodied in it. See mercantile.

Indeed, it has been justly observed that there are in him [Hume] several traces of a refined mercantilism, and that he represents a state of opinion in which the transition from the old to the new views is not yet completely effected. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 364.

mercantilist (mēr'kan-tīl-ist), n. [mercantile + -ist.] 1. A devotee of mercantilism; a believer in the supreme importance of trade and commerce. — 2. In polit. econ., an advocate of the mercantile system, or of some similar theory.

The mercantilists may be best described, as Roemer has remarked, not by any definite economic theorem which they held in common, but by a set of theoretic tendencies, commonly found in combination, though severally prevailing in different degrees in different minds. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 364.

mercantilistic (mēr'kan-tīl-ist'ik), a. [mercantilist + -ic.] Pertaining to mercantilism, or to the mercantile system in political economy; characteristic of mercantilists.

From the seventeenth century mercantilistic views began to exercise a more and more marked influence upon financial literature. Cyc. of Pol. Science, II. 197.

mercantility (mēr'kan-tīl'i-ti), n. [mercantile + -ity.] Mercantile spirit or enterprise. [Rare.]

He was all on fire with mercantility. C. Roade, Cloister and Hearth, lxxvi. (Davies.)

mercaptan (mēr-kap'tan), n. [So called as absorbing mercury; < L. Mercurius, Mercury, ML., quicksilver, mercury, + captan (-t)s, taking, ppr. of captare, take: see captation.] One of a class of compounds analogous to alcohols, in which the group SH takes the place of hydroxyl. They are all liquids having an offensive garlic odor, and form with mercuric oxide white crystalline compounds, hence their name. Methyl mercaptan (CH₃SH), or methyl sulphhydrate, is a highly offensive and volatile liquid.

mercaptide (mēr-kap'tid or -tid), n. [mercaptan + -ide.] A compound formed by the union of mercaptan with a metallic base.

mercaptol (mēr-kap-tō'ik), a. [mercaptan + -ol.] Derived from or having the properties of mercaptans.

mercato, mercator, n. [It. mercato, < L. mercatus, a market: see market.] Same as market.

This was formerly the Circus or Agonales, dedicated to sports and pastimes, and is now the greatest market of the city. Evelyn, Diary, Feb. 20, 1645.

By order of court a mercato was erected at Boston, to be kept upon Thursday, the fifth day of the week. Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 148.

mercator (mēr-ka-tor), n. [It. mercatore (cf. Sp. mercader = OF. mercader, < It.) (equiv. to mercante), a merchant, < mercator, trade, < mercato, trading, market: see market, r.] A foreign trader.

Tra. What is he, Biondello?

Non. Master, a mercator, or a pedant, I know not what; but formal in apparel.

Shak., T. of the 8., iv. 2. 63.

mercative (mēr-ka-tiv), a. [ML. mercativus, of trading, < mercatus, trading: see market.] Of or belonging to trade. Coles, 1717.

Mercator's chart, projection. See the nouns.

mercatura (mēr-ka-tūr), n. [L. mercatura, trade, traffic, < mercari, trade: see merchant.] The act or practice of buying and selling; commerce; traffic; trade.

mercet (mērs), v. t. [By aphesis from amerce.] To amerce; mulct; fine.

For the kynge of Egypt put him downe at Jerusalem, and merced the land in an hundred talentes of sylver and a talent of golde. Bible of 1561, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 3.

merceder, n. [ME., < L. merces (merced-), pay, reward, bribe, etc.: see mercy.] Reward; payment; bribe.

That ys no mede bote a mercede.

A maner dewe dette for the doynges.

And bote if yt be payed prestliche the payer is to blame.

Piers Plowman (C), iv. 308.

Mercedonius, Mercedinus (mēr-se-dō'ni-us, -dī'nus), n. [L.] In the Roman calendar commonly ascribed to Numa Pompilius, second king of Rome, an intercalary month inserted every second year between the 23d and the 24th of February, and having twenty-two or twenty-three days.

mercement (mērs'ment), n. [ME., also merciement, merciement; by aphesis from amerce. Cf. merciament.] A fine; a penalty satisfied by a money-payment; a mulct.

Brynge alle men to bowe with-oute byter wounde.

With-oute mercement other manshant amenden alle reames.

Piers Plowman (C), v. 182.

Right so is loue a ledere and the lawe shapeth.

Vpon man for his mysdoles the mercement he taxeth.

Piers Plowman (B), I. 160.

mercenarian (mēr-se-nā'ri-an), n. [mercenary + -an.] A mercenary.

Odd bands

Of voluntaries and mercenarians.

Marston, In Praise of Pygmalion, I. 18.

mercenarily (mēr-se-nā'ri-li), adv. [mercenary + -ly.] In a mercenary manner. Imp. Dict.

mercenariness (mēr-se-nā'ri-nes), n. [mercenary + -ness.] The character of being mercenary; venality; regard to hire or reward; action or conduct uniformly prompted by the love of gain or the acquisition of money as a chief end.

mercenary (mēr-se-nā'ri), a. and n. [ME. mercenarie = F. mercenaire = Sp. Pg. It. mercenario, < L. mercenarius, earlier mercenarius, hired for pay, hireling, as noun a hired laborer, < merces (merced-), pay, wages, reward: see mercy.] I. a. 1. Working or acting for reward; hired; serving only for gain; selling one's services to the highest bidder.

Mercenary men, which get their living by the trade of rowing.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 214.

Mercenary troops, . . . perfectly acquainted with every part of their profession, irresistible in the field, powerful to defend or destroy, but defending without love and without hatred.

Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

Hence — 2. Venal; sordid; actuated only by hope of reward; ready to accept dishonorable gain: as, a mercenary prince or judge; a mercenary disposition.

This study fits a mercenary drudge.

Marlowe, Doctor Faustus, I. 1.

You know me too proud to stoop to mercenary inanimacy.

Goldsmith, To Edward Mills.

3. Pertaining or due to hope of gain or reward; done, given, etc., in return for hire; resulting from sordid motives: as, mercenary services; a mercenary act.

For many of our princes, woe the while.

Lie down'd and soak'd in mercenary blood.

Shak., Hen. V., iv. 7. 79.

Thus needy wits a vile revenue made.

And verse became a mercenary trade.

Dryden and Soame, tr. of Horace's Art of Poetry, iv.

One act that from a thankful heart proceeds Excels ten thousand mercenary deeds.

Cowper, Truth, I. 224.

— Syn. Hiring, etc. See venal.

II. n.; pl. mercenaries (-riz). 1. A person who works for pay; especially, one who has no higher motive to work than love of gain.

He was a schepherde and no mercenary.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., I. 514.

Stationed by, as waiting a result,

Lean silent gangs of mercenaries ceased

Working to watch the strangers.

Browning, Sordello.

2. Specifically, a soldier in foreign service; a professional soldier. This term became common during the long wars of the years immediately following the middle ages, when professional soldiers who served any one who would pay them were contrasted with those who still followed their feudal superiors.

This is to show, both how tyranny grows to stand in need of mercenary soldiers, and how those mercenaries are . . . firmly assured unto the tyrant.

Raleigh, Hist. World, V. II. 2.

Like mercenaries, hired for home defence,

They will not serve against their native Prince.

Dryden, Hind and Panther, II. 290.

The Chief Citizens, like the noble Italians, hire Mercenaries to carry arms in their stead.

Steele, Tatler, No. 28.

mercier (mēr'sēr), n. [ME. mercer, mercere, < OF. mercier, F. mercier = Pr. mercier, mercier = Sp. mercero = Pg. merciero = It. merciajo, < ML. mercarius (also mercarius, mercarius, after OF.), a trader, a dealer in small wares, < L. merx (merc-), merchandise: see mercy, merchant.] 1. A dealer in small wares, or in merchandise of any sort.

A row of pins, arranged as neatly as in the papers sold at the mercers.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 539.

2. A dealer in cloths of different sorts, especially silk. [Eng.]

She feels not how the land drops away, nor the acres melt; nor foresees the change, when the mercer has your woods for her velvets.

B. Jonson, Epicoene, II. 1.

mercerization (mēr'sēr-i-zā'shon), n. [mercerize + -ation.] A process of treating cotton fiber or fabrics, invented by John Mercer, a Lancashire calico-printer, and patented in 1851. He discovered that the steeping of cotton cloth from ten to twenty minutes in caustic and syrupy potash lye, and then washing out the cloth with alcohol of specific gravity 0.825, caused the texture to contract one tenth on drying, retaining 14.72 per cent. of potash. If soda lye of specific gravity 1.342 is substituted for the potash, the cloth shrinks one fourth and contains 9.68 per cent. of soda. Water abstracts all the soda, and leaves the shrunken tissue, which takes more brilliant colors in dyeing than unmercerized calico. Also spelled mercerisation.

mercerize (mēr'sēr-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mercerized, ppr. mercerizing. [Mer (see def. of mercerization) + -ize.] To treat (cotton fiber or fabrics) with a solution of caustic alkali according to the method of mercerization. Also spelled mercerise.

The microscopical examination of a mercerized cotton fiber shows it to have lost all its original characteristics.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 241.

mercer'ship (mēr'sēr-ship), n. [mercer + -ship.] The occupation or business of a mercer.

He confesses himself to be an egregious fool to leave his mercer'ship, and go to be a musqueteer.

Hocell, Letters, II. 62.

mercery (mēr'sēr-i), n.; pl. merceries (-iz). [ME. mercery, mercery, mercerie, < OF. mercerie, mercierie, F. mercerie (> Sp. merceria = Pg. It. merceria), < ML. mercatoria (also mercaria, after OF.), the trade of a mercer, mercers' wares, < mercarius, a mercer: see mercer.] 1. The class of commodities or goods in which a mercer deals, as silks, woolen cloths, etc. [Eng.]

Clothe, fures, and other mercery.

Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., I. cccviii.

Half the shop was appropriated to grocery; the other half to drapery, and a little mercery.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, III.

Serious-faced folk who buy their merceries economically and seldom.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIII. 75.

2. The trade of a mercer.

The mercery is gone from out of Lombard-street and Chespeide into Paternoster-row and Fleet-street.

Graunt, Bills of Mortality.

3. A place where mercers' wares are sold.

merchandise (mēr'chan-dīz), n. [Also merchandize; < ME. merchandise, merchaundise, merchaundise, < OF. merchandise, merchaundise, F. merchandise, a merchant's wares, < merchand, a merchant: see merchant.] 1. In general, any movable object of trade or traffic; that which is passed from hand to hand by purchase and sale; specifically, the objects of commerce; a commercial commodity or commercial commodities in general; the staple of a mercantile business; commodities, goods, or wares bought and sold for gain. Real property, ships, money, stocks, and bonds are not merchandise, nor are notes or other mere representatives or measures of actual commodities or values. [Now never used in the plural.]

Thou shalt not sell her at all for money; thou shalt not make merchandise of her. Deut. xxi. 14.

Men comen azen be Damsace, that is a fulle fayre Cytee, and fulle noble, and fulle of alle Merchandise. Mandeville, Travels, p. 122.

merchandise†, n. An obsolete variant of merchandise.

merchant (mèr'chant), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also merchaunt, merchant, marchaunt, marchand; < ME. marchand, marchaunt, marchand, < AF. marchand, marchaunt, OF. marchand, marcheant, marceant, F. marchand = Sp. mercante = It. mercante, a trader, merchant, < L. mercan(t)-s, a buyer, ppr. of mercari, trade, traffic, buy, < merx (mero-), merchandise, traffic, < merere, mereri, gain, buy, purchase, also deserve, merit; see mercy and merit. Etymologically the adj. precedes the noun; but the noun appears to be earlier in E.] I. n. 1. One who is engaged in the business of buying commercial commodities and selling them again for the sake of profit; especially, one who buys and sells in quantity or by wholesale. One who buys without selling again, or who sells without having bought, as where one sells products of his own labor, or who buys and sells exclusively articles not the subject of ordinary commerce, or who buys and sells commercial articles on salary and not for profit, is not usually termed a merchant. Those who buy or sell on a commission for others are termed commission-merchants. In the law of bankruptcy, which forbids a discharge to merchants and traders who have not kept proper books of account, the term has a more extended meaning, having been held to include a livery-stable keeper who buys hay and grain and indirectly sells it by boarding horses, but not a broker who speculates in stocks.

Thidre comethe Marchauntes with Marchandise be See, from Yndee, Persee, Caldee, Ermonyne, and of many othere Kyngdomes. Mandeville, Travels, p. 122.

Ye merchants that use the trade of merchandise, Use lawfull wares and reasonable prise. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 864.

A merchant of or in an article is one who buys and sells it, and not the manufacturer selling it. A wine grower is not a wine merchant; even a wine importer is not called a wine merchant, but a wine importer.

Lord Bramwell, Law Rep., 7 Ex. 127. Here shall be his Belgravia for his grandees, and this his Cheapside and his Lombard Street for the merchants and bankers. A. Trollope, South Africa, II. 60.

2†. A supercargo; the person in charge of the business affairs of a trading expedition.

He anchored in the road with one ship of small burden; and, pretending the death of his merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might bury their merchant in hallowed ground. Raleigh (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 16).

3†. A merchant ship or vessel; a merchantman.

The masters of some merchant. Shak., Tempest, ii. 1. 5. Convoy ships accompany their merchants till they may prosecute the rest of their voyage without danger. Dryden, Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

Merchant Adventurers. See adventurer.—Merchant bar, merchant iron, an iron bar which has been finished by passing through the merchant rolls. Puddled bars (see puddle) are worked into merchant iron or merchant bar by being cut into pieces of suitable length, which are then piled in packets, heated to a welding-heat, and then hammered and rolled, or rolled without hammering, into bars of suitable shape to be put upon the market. The amount of labor bestowed on this process depends on the quality of the iron it is desired to produce. Puddled bars which have been rolled a second time are called "No. 2," and this is what is usually designated as merchant bar. It is the lowest quality of iron available for the general smith's use. If piled and rolled again, the product is called "No. 3." Another repetition of the process furnishes an article known as "best-best," and still another gives "treble-best."—Merchant captain or seaman, a captain or seaman employed in the merchant service.—Merchant prince, a merchant of great wealth.

In chem., specifically applied to compounds in which each atom of mercury is regarded as bivalent: as, mercuric chlorid, HgCl_2 .—Mercuric chlorid, corrosive sublimate.—Mercuric fulminate, fulminating mercury; a detonating compound ($\text{C}_2\text{Hg}_2\text{N}_2\text{O}_2$) which crystallizes in shining gray crystals, prepared from a mixture of alcohol, nitric acid, and mercury nitrate. A moderate blow or slight friction causes it to explode violently. It is used for charging percussion-caps and detonating caps for firing dynamite, etc.

mercurification (mër-kū'ri-fi-kā'shon), n. [< mercurify + -ation: see -fication.] 1. In chem., the process or operation of obtaining the mercury from metallic minerals in its fluid form.—2. The act or art of mixing with quicksilver.

It remains that I perform the promise I made of adding the ways of mercurification.
Boyle, Works, I. 648.

mercurify (mër-kū'ri-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. mercurified, ppr. mercurifying. [< mercur-y + -fy.] 1. To obtain mercury from (metallic minerals), as by the application of intense heat, which expels the mercury in fumes that are afterward condensed.—2. To combine or mingle with mercury; mercurialize.

A part only of the metal is mercurified.
Boyle, Works, I. 641.

mercuriousness (mër-kū'ri-us-nes), n. [*< mercurious (< L. Mercurius, Mercury) + -ness.] The state or quality of being mercurial, or like the god Mercury, as (in the quotation) in his character of a swift messenger.

A chapeau with wings, to denote the mercuriousness of this messenger.
Fuller, Worthies, Kent.

mercurism (mër-kū-rizm), n. [< Mercur-y + -ism.] A communication of news or intelligence; a communication or announcement.
Sir T. Browne.

mercurous (mër-kū-rus), a. [< mercur-y + -ous.] 1. Related to or containing mercury.—2. In chem., specifically applied to compounds in which two atoms of mercury are regarded as forming a bivalent radical: as, mercurous chlorid, Hg_2Cl_2 .

Mercury

Mercury (mër'kū-ri), n. [< ME. Mercurie, mercurie, < AF. Mercurie, OF. Mercur, F. Mercur = Sp. Pg. It. Mercurio, < L. Mercurius, Mercury (the deity and the planet), so called (appar.) as the god of trade, < merz (merc-), merchandise, wares: see mercy, merchant.] 1. In Rom. myth., the name of a Roman divinity, who became identified with the Greek Hermes. He was the son of Jupiter and Maia, and was the herald and ambassador of Jupiter. As a god of darkness, Mercury is the tutelary deity of thieves and tricksters; he became also the protector of herdsmen, and the god of science, commerce, and the arts and graces of life, and the patron of travelers and athletes. It was he who guided the shades of the dead to their final abiding-place. He is represented in art as a young man, usually wearing a winged hat and the talaris or winged sandals, and bearing the caduceus or pastoral staff and often a purse.

The herald Mercury.
New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill.
Shak., Hamlet, III. 4. 58.

2. [l. c. or cap.] Pl. mercuries (-riz). One who acts like the god Mercury in his capacity of a messenger; a conveyor of news or information; an intelligencer.

Following the mirror of all Christian kings,
With winged heels, as English Mercuries.
Shak., Hen. V., II. chorus, 7.

We give the winds wings, and the angels too, as being the swift messengers of God, the nimble mercuries of heaven.

Hence—3. [l. c. or cap.] A common name for a newspaper or periodical publication; formerly, also, a newspaper-carrier or a seller of newspapers.

Those who sell them [news-books] by wholesale from the press are called mercuries.
Cowell.

No allusion to it is to be found in the monthly Mercuries.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xii.

4†. [l. c.] Warmth or liveliness of temperament; spirit; sprightly qualities; hence, liability to change; fickleness.

He was so full of mercury that he could not fix long in any friendship, or to any design.
Ep. Burnet.

5. The innermost planet of the solar system. Its mean distance from the sun is 0.387 that of the earth. The inclination (7 degrees) and the eccentricity (0.2066) of its orbit are exceeded only by some of the minor planets. Its diameter is only 3,000 miles, or about $\frac{1}{8}$ of that of the earth; its volume is to that of the earth as 1 to 18.5. It performs its sidereal revolution in 88 days, its synodical in 116. Its proximity to the sun prevents its being often seen with the naked eye. The mass of Mercury, though as yet not very precisely determined, is less than that of any other planet (asteroids excepted). According to Schiaparelli it rotates on its axis in the same way as the moon does, once in each orbital revolution.

6. [l. c.] Chemical symbol, Hg; atomic weight, 200.1. A metal of a silver-white color and brilliant metallic luster, unique in that it is fluid at ordinary temperatures. It becomes solid, or freezes, at about -40° , and crystallizes in the isometric system. Its specific gravity at 0° is 13.6; when frozen, according to J. W. Mallet, 14.1982. This metal occurs native, sometimes in considerable quantity; but by far the largest supply is obtained from the sulphid, known as cinnabar. (See cinnabar.) Mercury is not very generally disseminated. In the United States only traces of its ores have been found to the east of the Cordilleras. The principal sources of supply are the mines of Almaden in Spain, of New Almaden and others near the Bay of San Francisco, and of Idria in Austria. Its chief use is in the metallurgical treatment of gold and silver ores by amalgamation. The thermometer and barometer are instruments in which the peculiar qualities of this metal are well illustrated. Commercially the most important salts of mercury are mercurous chlorid (Hg_2Cl_2) or calomel, chiefly used in medicine, and the mercuric chlorid (HgCl_2) or corrosive sublimate, a violent poison used in medicine and extensively in surgery as an antiseptic, and as a preservative in dressing skins, etc., being a very powerful antiseptic. The sulphid (HgS), or cinnabar, when prepared artificially, is called vermillion, and is used as a pigment. The names mercury and quicksilver are entirely synonymous, but the former is rather a scientific designation, and one necessarily used in compound names and in the adjective form; while the latter is a common popular designation of this metal. See amalgam, calomel, quicksilver.

7. [l. c.] The column of quicksilver in a thermometer or barometer, especially with reference to the temperature or state of the atmosphere shown by it. [Colloq.]

Whatever may be the height of the mercury [in the barometer], a sudden and rapid fall is a sure sign of foul weather. R. Strachan, in Modern Meteorology, p. 80.

8. [L. c.] (a) A plant of the genus Mercurialis, chiefly M. perennis, the dog's-mercury, locally called Kentish balsam (which see, under Kentish), and M. annua, the annual or French mercury. See Mercurialis. (b) In older usage, the Chenopodium Bonus-Henricus. See allgood and good-King-Henry. This is the English, false, or wild mercury.—9. In her., the tincture purple, when blazoning is done by the planets.—Argental mercury. See argental.—Baron's mercury [prob. orig. 'barren mercury'], the male plant of Mercurialis perennis.—Boy's mercury, the female plant of Mercurialis annua (the sexes having been mistaken).—Corneous mercury. Same as calomet.—Extinction of mercury. See extinction.—Girl's mercury, the male plant of Mercurialis annua. See male.—Golden mercury, Mercurialis perennis, var. aurca.—Hydrosublimate of mercury, a trade-name for calomet prepared by condensing the vapor of mercurous chlorid with steam in a large receiver, which causes it to deposit in an impalpable powder absolutely free from any trace of corrosive sublimate.—Mercury agometer. See agometer.—Mercury air-pump, an apparatus used for producing a vacuum, consisting essentially of a reservoir above from which mercury flows down through a small vertical tube, the vessel to be exhausted being attached at the side (at C in the figure) at a height something more than 30 inches above the lower receptacle. The descending drops of mercury carry with them portions of the air or other gas from the receiver, and if the process is long continued, the supply vessel at the top being kept full, a nearly perfect vacuum may be obtained. This form of air-pump is often called a Sprengel pump. It gives a much higher degree of exhaustion than is possible with the ordinary mechanical air-pump, and is much used not only in physical experiments but also for practical purposes, for example in removing the air from the glass bulbs of the incandescent electric lamps.—Mount of Mercury, in palms. See mount, 1, 6.—Native or virgin mercury, the pure metal found in the form of globules in cavities of the ores of this metal.—Three-seeded mercury, a plant of the genus Acalypha, of the same family as Mercurialis, and more or less similar in appearance. The fruit splits into three two-valved one-seeded nutlets. It is a large genus, chiefly tropical or subtropical. Many of the species are shrubby; a few (mostly herbaceous) are found in the United States.—Transit of Mercury, a passage of Mercury over the disk of the sun.—Vegetable mercury, a Brazilian plant, Franciscia uniflora, also called manaca. See Franciscia.

mercury† (mēr'kū-ri), v. t. [mercury, n.]. To wash with a preparation of mercury.

They are as tender as . . . a lady's face new mercuried.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, I. 1.

mercury-cup (mēr'kū-ri-kup), n. 1. The cistern of a mercury barometer, which is filled with mercury and in which the lower end of the barometer-tube is inserted.—2. A small open cup containing mercury, used in electrical instruments and apparatus as a connection for conductors. The cup may be of conducting material and connected with one end of the wire forming the circuit, in which case the circuit will be closed by inserting the other end of the wire in the mercury; or the cup may be of non-conducting material, in which case both ends of the wire must be inserted in the mercury to close the circuit.

mercury-furnace (mēr'kū-ri-fēr'nās), n. A furnace in which cinnabar is roasted in order to cause the pure mercury to pass off in fumes, which are condensed in a series of vessels.

mercury-gatherer (mēr'kū-ri-gāth'ēr-ēr), n. In metal-working, a stirring apparatus which causes quicksilver that has become floured or mixed with sulphur in amalgamating to resume the fluid condition, through the agency of mechanical agitation and rubbing. E. H. Knight.

mercury-goosefoot (mēr'kū-ri-gōs'fūt), n. Same as mercury, 8 (b).

mercury-holder (mēr'kū-ri-hōl'dēr), n. A vulcanite cup, with a cover, used by dentists in preparing amalgam.

Mercury's-violet (mēr'kū-riz-vi'ō-let), n. The common canterbury-bell, Campanula Medium.

mercy (mēr'si), n.; pl. mercies (-siz). [ME. mercy, mercye, mersye, marsi, merci, < OF. merci, mercit, F. merci = Pr. merce = Sp. merced = Pg. it. merce, grace, thanks, mercy, pity, pardon, < L. merces (merced-), pay, reward, also bribe, price, detriment, condition, income, etc., ML. also thanks, grace, mercy, pity, pardon, < merz (merc-), merchandise, < merere, mereri, gain, acquire, buy, also deserve, orig. 'receive as a share': see merit. Cf. amerce, gramercy.] 1. Pitying forbearance or forgiveness; compassionate leniency toward enemies or wrongdoers; the disposition to treat offenders kindly or tenderly; the exercise of clemency in favor of an offender.

A man without marci no marci shall have
In tyme of ned when he dothe it crave.
MS. Ashmole 46. (Halliwell.)

The Lord is longsuffering, and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty. Num. xiv. 18.

A woman's mercy is very little,
But a man's mercy is more.

Sir Hugh, or the Jew's Daughter (Child's Ballads, III. 334).

The sentiment of mercy is the natural recoil which the laws of the universe provide to protect mankind from destruction by savage passions. Emerson, John Brown.

2. An act or exercise of forbearance, good will, or favor; also, a kindness undeserved or unexpected; a fortunate or providential circumstance; a blessing: as, it is a mercy that they escaped.

I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies . . . which thou hast shewed unto thy servant. Gen. xxxii. 10.

E'en a judgment, making way for thee,
Seems in their eyes a mercy for thy sake.
Cowper, Task, II. 132.

3. Pity; compassion; benevolence: as, a work of mercy.

In countess lyued haue y,
And neuer dille werks of mercies.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

Which now of these three . . . was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves? And he said, He that shewed mercy on him. Luke x. 36, 37.

4. Discretionary action; unrestrained exercise of the will and the power to punish and to spare: as, to be at one's mercy (that is, wholly in one's power).

At length, vpon their submission, the king tooke them to mercie, vpon their fine, which was seised at twentie thousand marks. Holinshed, Hen. III., an. 1266.

And the offender's life lies in the mercy
Of the duke only. Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 355.

Last, 'bout thy stiff neck we this halter hang,
And leave thee to the mercy of the court.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, v. 2.

A lover is ever complaining of cruelty while anything is denied him; and when the lady ceases to be cruel, she is, from the next moment, at his mercy. Swift.

Covenanted mercies. See covenant.—Fathers of Mercy, the name of a society of Roman Catholic missionary priests, founded in France in 1806 and introduced into the United States in 1842.—For mercy! for mercy's sake! an exclamation, usually an appeal to pity.

For.
Who with mine eyes, never since at ebb, beheld
The king my father wreck'd.

Alack, for mercy!
Shak., Tempest, I. 2. 437.

God-a-mercy! See God!.—Great mercy! [Imitated from gramercy, ME. grant mercy. See gramercy.] Great favor.

Great mercy, sure, for to enlarge a thrall Whose freedom shall thee turne to greatest scath!
Spenser, F. Q., II. v. 18.

Sisters of Mercy. See sisterhood.—Spiritual and corporal works of mercy. In the middle ages, seven great works of mercy were enumerated called the spiritual and as many called the corporal works of mercy. The seven works of corporal mercy are to feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, clothe the naked, visit prisoners, visit the sick, harbor strangers, bury the dead; of spiritual mercy, to convert sinners, instruct the ignorant, counsel the doubtful, console the afflicted, bear wrongs patiently, forgive injuries, pray for the living and the dead. Cath. Dict.

In fulfillinge of Godis commandmentis and of the seven dedis of mercy bodill and gostly to a many euen cristen.
Rolls, quoted in Hampole's Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), (Pref., p. xi).

To cry (one) mercy. (a) See cry, v. (b) To proclaim a tax. Bot Athelstan the maistris wan and did tham mercie crie, & alle Northwales he sat to treughe hie.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 28.

=Syn. 1. Clemency, etc. See leniency.
mercy†, v. t. [ME. mercien, < OF. mercier, thank, also fine, < merci, thank, mercy, fine: see mercy, n., and cf. merce, amerce.] 1. To thank.

Middeliche thenne Meede merciode hem alle
Of heore grete goodnesse. Piets Plowman (A), III. 61.

2. To fine; amerce.

Forsters did somoun, enquired vp & down
Whilk men of toun had taken his venysoun, & who that was gilty thogh the foresters sawe, Mercied was full hi. Rob. of Brunne, p. 112.

mercy-seat (mēr'si-sēt), n. The place of mercy or forgiveness; the propitiatory; specifically, the covering of the ark of the covenant among the Jews. This was of gold, surmounted at each end by a cherub with outstretched wings. On this covering the blood of the yearly atonement was sprinkled, and from this place God gave his oracles to Moses or to the high priest. Hence, to approach the mercy-seat is to draw near to God in prayer.

mercy-stock†, n. A propitiation.

Our Saviour, our Ransom, our Spokesman, our Mercy-stock.
Hutchinson, Works, p. 192. (Davies.)

mercy-stroke (mēr'si-strōk), n. The death-stroke, as putting an end to pain; the coup de grâce.

merd† (mērd), n. [Also mard; < OF. (and F.) merde = Pr. merga = Sp. mierda = Pg. it. merda, < L. merda, dung, ordure.] Ordure; dung; excrement.

If after thou of garlike stronge
The savour wilt expell,
A mard is sure the onely meane
To put away the smell.

Kendall's Flowers of Epigrammes (1577). (Nares.)

Haire o' th' head, burnt clouts, chalk, merds, and clay.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, II. 1.

Merdivoræ (mēr-div'ō-rē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of merdivorus: see merdivorous.] A group of dipterous insects which feed upon dung.

merdivorous (mēr-div'ō-rus), a. [NL. merdivorus, < L. merda, dung, + vorare, devour.] Feeding upon excrement; devouring dung.

mere† (mēr), n. [Formerly also meer, meere, mear; < ME. mere, meere, < AS. mere, a lake, pool, the sea, = OS. meri, a lake, = OFries. mar, a ditch, = MD. mare, maer, D. meer, meir = OHG. mar, mari, meri, meri, MHG. mer, G. meer = Icel. marr = Goth. marei, a lake; = W. môr = Gael. Ir. muir = Lith. marės = Russ. more = L. mare (> it. mare = Pg. Hence in comp. mermaid, merman, etc.; and ult. deriv. marsh, marish.] A pool; a small lake or pond. [Not used in the U. S., except artificially in some local names, in imitation of British names: as, Harlem mere in Central Park in New York.]

Then he wendex his way, wepande for care,
Towarde the mere of Mambre, wepande for sorewe.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), II. 778.

As two Flashes, cast into a Meer,
With fruitful Spawn will furnish in few year
A Town with victuall.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Colonies.
On the edge of the mere the Prince of Orange had already ordered a cluster of forts to be erected.

Molloy, Dutch Republic, II. 431.

mere² (mēr), n. [Formerly also meer, meere, mear, meare; < ME. meer, mere, < AS. gemære = D. meer, a limit, boundary, = Icel. maerr, border-land.] 1. A boundary; boundary-line.

The furious Team, that on the Cambrian side
Doth Shropshire as a meare from Hereford divide.
Drayton, Polyolbion. (Nares.)

As it were, a common meare between lands.

Abp. Usher, Ana. to Malone, p. 309.

2. A balk or furrow serving as a boundary- or dividing-line in a common field; also, a boundary-stone; a merestone. [Obsolete or provincial.]—3. A private carriage-road. [North. Eng.]—4. A measure of 29 or 31 yards in the Peak of Derbyshire in England. It is defined by Blount as "29 yards in the low Peak of Derbyshire and 31 in the high." Mining claims were measured by meres, the discoverer of a lode being allowed to claim two meres.

mere²† (mēr), v. [Also meer, mear, etc.; < mere², n.] I. trans. To limit; bound; divide or cause division in.

That brave honour of the Latine name,
Which meard her rule with Africa and Byze.
Spenser, Ruins of Rome, st. 22.

At such a point,
When half to half the world opposed, he being
The meered question. Shak., A. and C., III. 13. 10.

II. intrans. To set divisions and bounds.

For bounding and mearing, to him that will keepe it justly, it is a bond that brideleth power and desire.
North's Pl., L. 55. D. (Nares.)

mere³ (mēr), a. [Early mod. E. also meer, meere; = OF. mer, mier = Pr. mer, mier = Sp. Pg. it. mero, < L. merus, pure, unmixed (as wine), hence bare, only, mere.] 1. Pure; sheer; unmixed.

For neither can he fly, nor other harme,
But trust unto his strength and manhood meare.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xi. 34.

The most part of them are degenerated and grown all most meere Irish.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

Our wine is here mingled with water and with myrrh; there [in the world to come] it is mere and unmixed.

Jer. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

2t. Absolute; unqualified; utter; whole; in the fullest sense.

Those who, being in mere misery, continually do call on God. Munday (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 204).

Certain tidings now arrived, importing the mere perdition of the Turkish fleet. Shak., Othello, II. 2. 3.

Signor Francisco, whose mere object now is woman at these years, that's the eye-saint, I know, Amongst young gallants. Middleton, The Widow, v. 1.

Although there is such plenty of fish and fowle and wild beasts, yet are they so lasie they will not take paines to catch it till mere hunger constraine them.

Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 228.

3. Sheer; simple; nothing but (the thing mentioned); only: as, it is mere folly to do so; this is the merest trash.

'Tis a mere toy to you, sir; candle-rents. B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 4.

For'd of meer Necessity to eat, He comes to pawn his Dish, to buy his Meat. Congreve, tr. of Satires of Juvenal, xi.

A mere courtier, a mere soldier, a mere scholar, a mere anything, is an insipid pedantic character.

Addison, The Man of the Town.

Mere right, in law, the right of property without possession. = Syn. Mere, Bare. Mere is much oftener used than bare. Bare is positive; mere essentially negative. Strictly, bare means only without other things, or no more than: as, the bare mention of a name. Mere seems to imply deficiency: as, mere conjecture; mere folly. In implying smallness of amount it is sometimes the same as bare. In Shakespeare, Hamlet, III. 1, "a bare bodkin" might be expressed by "a mere bodkin."

mere³⁴ (mēr), adv. [*mere*³, a.] Absolutely; wholly.

On my faith, your highness Is mere mistaken in me. Fletcher, Mad Lover, III. 4.

I know I shall produce things mere divine. Marton, The Fawne, II. 1.

mere⁴⁴ (mēr), a. [ME., also meere, mare, < AS. mære, mære = OS. māri = OHG. māri, MHG. mære = Ice. mærr = Goth. mērs (in comp. waila-mērs), famous; akin to L. memor, mindful, remembering, Skt. √ smar, Zend mar, remember: see memory.] Famous.

mere⁵⁴, n. A Middle English form of *mare*¹. merogoutte (mār'gōt), n. [F. mère-goutte, < L. merus, pure, unmixed, + gutta (> F. goutte), a drop: see *mere*³ and *gout*¹.] The first running of must, oil, etc., from the fruit before pressure has been applied to it: usually limited to the juice of the grape.

merelst, n. [Also merelles, merils; < ME. merels, < OF. merelle, a game, nine men's morris, F. mérelle, marelle, hopscotch, < merel (ML. merellus, merallus), a counter, token, a piece in draughts, also a game.] A game also called fivepenny or nine men's morris, played with counters or pegs. See *morris*¹.

Merelles, or, as it was formerly called in England, nine men's morris, and also five-penny morris, is a game of some antiquity. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 416.

merely (mēr'li), adv. [Formerly also meerly; < ME. merely; < *mere*³ + -ly.] 1t. Absolutely; wholly; completely; utterly.

What goodes, catalles, Jewels, plate, ornamentes, or other stuff, do merely belong or apperteyne to all the sayd promotions. English Gids (E. E. T. S.), p. 197.

I wish you all content, and am as happy In my friend's good as it were merely mine. Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, v. 3.

2. Simply; solely; only.

Excusing his (Mahomet's) sensual felicities in the life to come, as merely allegorical, and necessarily fitted to rude and vulgar capacities. Sandys, Travels, p. 46.

The prayers are commonly performed merely as a matter of ceremony. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 212.

merenchyma (me-rēng'ki-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. μῆρος, a part, + (παρ) ἐγχύμα, in mod. sense 'parenchyma': see parenchyma.] In bot., an imperfect cellular tissue composed of more or less rounded cells and abundant in intercellular spaces. Cooke.

merenchymatous (mer-eng-kim'a-tus), a. [< merenchyma (t-) + -ous.] Having the structure or appearance of merenchyma.

meresauce, n. [ME. meresauce; appar. < OF. mure (ML. muria), pickle, brine, + sauce, sauce. Cf. OF. saulmure, pickle.] Brine or pickle for flesh or fish. Prompt. Parv., p. 334; Palgrave.

meresman (mēr'z-man), n. [Formerly also meersman, meersman; < *mere*³, poss. of *mere*², + man.] One who points out boundaries. [Obsolete or local.]

The use of the word "mere" has been revived in the measures of an Act of Parliament a few years since for ascertaining the boundaries of parishes. N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 291.

mere-stake (mēr'stāk), n. A pollard or tree standing as a mark or boundary for the division of parts or parcels in coppices or woods. Also called mere-tree.

merestead (mēr'sted), n. [Formerly also meerstead, mearestead; < *mere*² + stead.] The land within a particular mere or boundary; a farm.

The men were intent on their labours, Busy with hewing and building, with garden plot and with merestead. Longfellow, Courtship of Miles Standish, VIII.

merestone (mēr'stōn), n. [Formerly also meerstone, meerestone; < ME. merestone, merestane; < *mere*² + stone.] 1. A stone to mark a boundary.

The mislaid of a mere stone is to blame. But it is the unjust judge that is the capital remover of land-marks, when he defineth amisce of lands and property. Bacon, Judicature.

2. Figuratively, a limit.

That you contain the jurisdiction of the court within the ancient merestones, without removing the mark. Bacon, Speech to Hutton (Works, XIII. 202).

mereswinet, meerswinet, n. [ME. mereswinc, etc., < OF. mareswin; < *mere*¹ + swine.] A dolphin or porpoise.

Grassede as a mereswinc with cokes fulle huge. Morte Arthurs (E. E. T. S.), I. 1091.

mere-tree (mēr'trē), n. Same as mere-stake.

A mere tree, a tree which is for some bound or limit of land. Nomenclator (1585). (N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 191.)

meretrician (mer-ē-trish'an), a. [= OF. meretricien, < L. meretrix (-trix), a prostitute, + -ian.] Of or pertaining to prostitutes; meretricious.

meretricious (mer-ē-trish'us), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. meretricio, < L. meretricius, of or pertaining to prostitutes, < meretrix, a prostitute: see meretrix.] 1. Of or pertaining to prostitutes; wanton; libidinous.

The meretricious world claps our cheeks, and fondles us unto fallings. Feltham, Resolves, I. 26.

Her deceitful and meretricious traffick with all the nations of the world. Sp. Hall, Hard Texts, Ia. xxiii. 17.

2. Alluring by false attractions; having a gaudy but deceitful appearance; tawdry; showy: as, meretricious dress or ornaments.

Pride and artificial gluttonies do but adulterate nature, making our diet healthless, our appetites impatient and unsatisfiable, and the taste mixed, fantastical, and meretricious. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, II. 6.

A tawdry carpet, all befowered and befrilled—such a meretricious blur of colors as a hotel offers for vulgar feet to tread upon. T. Winthrop, Cecil Dreeme, xxxviii.

meretriciously (mer-ē-trish'us-li), adv. In a meretricious manner; with false allurements; tawdriely; with vulgar show.

meretriciousness (mer-ē-trish'us-nes), n. The quality of being meretricious; false show or allurements; vulgar finery.

meretrix (mer-ē-triks), n. [L., a prostitute, < merere, earn, gain, serve for pay: see merit.] 1. A prostitute; a harlot.

A beautiful piece, Hight Aspasia, the meretrix. B. Jonson, Volpone, I. 1.

That she (Cynthia) was a meretrix is clear from many indications—her accomplishments, her house in the Subura. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 818.

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of bivalves: same as Cytherea. Lamarck, 1799.

Merganetta (mēr-ga-net'ā), n. [NL., < Mergus + Gr. νῆττα, a duck.] A remarkable genus of Anatida, combining characters of mergansers with those of ordinary ducks, and having furthermore a sharp spur on the bend of the wing; the torrent-ducks. See torrent-duck.

Merganettina (mēr-ga-ne-tī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Merganetta + -ina.] A subfamily of Anatida constituted by the genus Merganetta.

merganser (mēr-gan'sēr), n. [NL. (> Sp. mergansar), < L. mergus, a diver (water-fowl), + anser, goose: see Mergus and Anser.] 1. A bird of the genus Mergus or subfamily Merginae, family Anatida; a sawbill, garbill, or fishing-duck.

A merganser resembles a duck, but has a cylindrical instead of a depressed bill, with a hooked nail at the end, and a serration of very prominent back-set teeth. Several species are among the common water-fowls of the northern hemisphere. The common merganser or goosander, Mergus merganser or Merganser castor, is about 2 feet long, and nearly 3 in extent of wings. In the male the upper parts are glossy black varied with white on the wings, the lower parts white tinged with salmon-color, the head and neck glossy dark-green like a drake's, and the bill and feet coral- or vermilion-red. The head is slightly crested. The red-breasted merganser, M. serrator, is a similar but somewhat smaller bird, with a reddish breast and the head more decidedly crested. The hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus, is still smaller, black and white, with a beautiful erect semi-circular crest. A South American species, distinct from any of the foregoing, is Mergus brasiliensis.

2. [cap.] A genus of Merginae: same as Mergus.

merge (mērj), v.; pret. and pp. merged, ppr. merging. [< OF. merger, mergir = It. mergere, < L. mergere, dive, dip, immerse, sink in, = Skt. √ majj, dip, bathe. Hence emerge, immerge, submerge, immerse, etc.] I. intrans. To sink or disappear in something else; be swallowed up; lose identity or individuality: with in.

He is to take care, undoubtedly, that the ecclesiastic shall not merge in the farmer. Scott, Speech, April, 1802.

Fear, doubt, thought, life itself, ere long Merged in one feeling deep and strong. Whittier, Mogg Megone, II.

II. trans. To cause to be absorbed or engrossed; sink the identity or individuality of; make to disappear in something else: followed by in (sometimes by into): as, all fear was merged in curiosity.

The plaintiff became the purchaser and merged his term in the fee. Chancellor Kent.

The names of Castilian and Aragonese were merged in the comprehensive one of Spaniard.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., II. 26.

merger¹ (mēr'jēr), n. [< merge + -er.] One who or that which merges.

merger² (mēr'jēr), n. [< OF. merger, inf. as noun, a merging: see merge.] 1. In the law of conveyancing, the sinking or obliteration of a lesser estate in lands, etc., resulting when it is transferred without qualification to the owner of a greater estate in the same property (or the like transfer of the greater estate to the owner of the lesser), if there be no intermediate estate. At common law the lesser estate was not deemed to be added to the greater, but to be extinguished, so as to free the greater estate from the qualification or impairment which the existence of the lesser estate had constituted. Thus, if an owner of the fee of land on which there was an outstanding lease, owned by another person, acquired the lease, the lease was thereby annulled, and he thereafter held simply as owner of the fee. It resulted sometimes that, if his title to the fee proved defective, he could not avail himself of any claim under the lease.

Merger is the act of law, and is the annihilation of one estate in another. Its effect is to consolidate two estates, and to conform them into one estate. Mayhew, On Merger, I. 1.

2. In the law of contracts, the extinguishment of a security for a debt by the creditor's acceptance of a higher security, such as a bond in lieu of a note, or a judgment in lieu of either: so called because such acceptance, by operation of law, and without intention of the parties, merges the lower security.

mergh, n. An obsolete or dialectal form of *marrow*¹.

Merginae (mēr-jī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mergus + -inae.] A subfamily of Anatida, typified by the genus Mergus; the mergansers. See merganser.

Mergulus (mēr'gū-lus), n. [NL. (Viellot, 1816), dim. of Mergus, q. v.] A genus of small three-toed web-footed marine birds of the auk family, Alcidae; the dovebies. There is but one species, M. alle. Also called Alle. See cut under dovekie.

Mergus (mēr'gus), n. [NL., < L. mergus, a diver (water-fowl), < mergere, dive: see merge.] The typical genus of Merginae, formerly coextensive with the subfamily, now restricted to such species as the goosander, M. merganser, and the red-breasted merganser, M. serrator. See merganser.

meri (mā'ri), n. A war-ax or war-club used by the natives of New Zealand. It is seldom less than a foot or more than 18 inches long, and is made of wood, bone, basaltic stone, or green jade.

merisum (mē-ri-ē-um), n.; pl. meriaa (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μῆριον, neut. of μῆριος, belonging to the thigh, < μῆρ, the thigh: see meros.] In entom., a posterior inflected part of the metasternum of beetles, forming the anterior surface of the socket of the hind leg. Knoch.

Meriania (mer-i-an'i-ā), n. [NL. (Swartz, 1800), named after M. S. Merian, a Dutch artist.] A genus of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae, type of the tribe Merianieae. There are about 37 species, natives of tropical America and the West Indies. They are erect shrubs or trees with long-petioled oblong-lanceolate leaves and large yellow or purple flowers. Some of the species are cultivated in greenhouses, under the name of Jamaica roses.

Merianias (mer'i-a-ni'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1865), < Meriania + -ae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae and the suborder Melastomeae, characterized by the generally terete or slightly angular capsular fruit and the angulated, cuneate, or fusiform seeds. It embraces 11 genera and about 107 species of tropical American shrubs and trees.

mericarp (mer'i-kārp), n. [= F. mericarpe, < Gr. μέρος, a part, + καρπός, fruit.] One of the two achene-like carpels which form a cremocarp or fruit in the Umbelliferae: same as hemisperm.

merides, n. Plural of meris.

Meridiaceae (mē-rid-i-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Rabenhorst, 1864), < Meridion + -aceae.] A large family of diatoms, according to the classification of Rabenhorst, taking its name from the genus Meridion. The frustule is cuneate, producing fan-shaped colonies, without central nodule. They live in both fresh and salt water. The family is the same or nearly the same as the Meridies of Kuetzing.

meridian (mē-rid'i-ā), a. [ME. merydyall; < LL. meridialis, of midday, < meridies, midday: see meridian.] Of midday; meridian.

Whole men of what age or complexion so euer they be of, shulde take theyr natural rest and slepe in the nyght: and to eschewe merydyall sleep.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 244.

meridian (mē-rid'i-ān), a. and n. [ME. meridian, < OF. meridien, < F. meridien = Sp. Pg. It. meridiano, < L. meridianus, of or belonging to midday or to the south, southern, < meridies, midday, the south, orig. medidies*, < medius, middle, + dies, day: see medium, midl, and dial.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to midday or noon; noonday: as, the meridian sun; the sun's meridian heat or splendor.

In what place that any maner man ys at any tyme of the yer whan that the sonne by moevyng of the firmament cometh to his verrey meridian place, than is hit verrey Mid-day, that we clepen owre noon, as to thilke man; and therefore is it cleped the lyne of midday.

Chaucer, Astrolabe, ll. § 39.

Towards heaven and the full blazing sun,
Which now sat high in his meridian tower.

Milton, P. L., iv. 30.

The sun rode high in the heavens, and its meridian blaze was powerfully felt. Barham, Inglodby Legends, I. 181.

2. Pertaining to the culmination or highest point or degree (the sun being highest at midday); culminating; highest before a decline: as, Athens reached its meridian glory in the age of Pericles.—3. Pertaining to or marking a geographical north and south line; extending in the arc of a great circle passing through the poles: as, a meridian circle on an artificial globe.—4. Noting the eighth of Professor H. Rogers's twelve divisions of the Paleozoic series in the Appalachian chain of North America, the names of which suggest metaphorically the different natural periods of the day: it corresponds with the Oriskany sandstone (which see, under sandstone).—5. Consummate; complete.

An effrontery out of the mouth of a meridian villain.
Roger North, Examen, p. 186. (Davies.)

Meridian altitude of a star. See altitude.—Meridian line on a dial, the twelve o'clock hour-line.

II. n. 1. Midday; noon.—2. Midday repose or indulgence; noon: used specifically as in the quotations.

We have, . . . in the course of this our toilsome journey, lost our meridian (the hour of repose at noon, which in the middle ages was employed in slumber, and which the monastic rules of nocturnal vigils rendered necessary).

Scott, Monastery, xix.

Plumdamas joined the other two gentlemen in drinking their meridian (a bumper-dram of brandy).

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, iv.

3. The highest point reached before a decline; the culmination; the point of greatest increment or development.

You seem to marvel I do not marry all this while, considering that I am past the Meridian of my Age.

Howell, Letters, I. vi. 60.

In the meridian of Edward's age and vigour.

Hallam, Middle Ages, III. 8.

4. A great circle of a sphere passing through the poles, or the half of such a circle included between the poles; in geog., such a circle drawn upon the earth; in astron., such a circle on the celestial sphere. The meridian of a place on the earth's surface is the great circle passing through it and the poles, or the great circle of the celestial sphere passing through the pole and the zenith of the place. See longitude.

5. Figuratively, the state or condition (in any respect) of the people of one place or region, or of persons in one sphere or plane of existence, as compared with those of or in another: as, the institutions or customs of Asia are not suited to the meridian of Europe.

All other knowledge merely serves the concerns of this life, and is fitted to the meridian thereof.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

First or prime meridian, the meridian from which longitude is reckoned, as that of Greenwich. See longitude, 2.

Magnetic meridian of any place, a great circle the plane of which passes through that place and the line of direction of the horizontal magnetic needle. The angle which the magnetic makes with the true geographical meridian is different in different places and at different times, and is called the magnetic declination or the variation of the compass. See declination, and agonic line (under agonic).

Meridian of a globe, a meridian drawn upon a globe; especially, a brass circle concentric with the globe, and having the axis of rotation of the globe fixed in the plane of one of its faces.—Secondary meridian, in geog., a meridian whose longitude from the prime meridian has been so well determined that trustworthy longitudes may be ascertained by measuring from it.

meridian-circle (mē-rid'i-ān-sēr'kl), n. An astronomical instrument consisting of a telescope with cross-wires and moving in the plane of the meridian, and provided with a graduated circle. The meridian-circle subserves the same purposes as the transit-instrument, and also determines the declinations of stars.

meridian-mark (mē-rid'i-ān-mārk), n. A mark placed exactly north or south of a transit-instrument at a considerable distance, to aid in adjusting the instrument in the meridian. It is sometimes placed near, with a lens interposed to render the rays from it parallel as if it were really remote.

meridies (mē-rid'i-ēz), n. [L.: see meridian.] Meridian; mid-point. [Rare.]

About the hour that Cynthia's silver light
Had touch'd the pale meridies of the night.
Cowley, Essays (Agriculture).

Meridion (mē-rid'i-on), n. [NL. (Agardh, 1824), < Gr. μερίδιον, a small part, dim. of μέρος, a part.] A genus of diatoms with cuneate frustule, typical of the family Meridiaceae of Rabenhorst.

meridional (mē-rid'i-ō-nāl), a. [ME. meridional, meridionel, < OF. meridional, F. méridional = Fr. Sp. Pg. meridional = It. meridionale, < LL. meridionalis, of midday, < L. meridies, midday: see meridian.] 1. Pertaining to the meridian; having a direction like that of a terrestrial meridian.

The meridional lines stand wider upon one side than the other.

Sir T. Browne, Garden of Cyrus, iv.

Along one side of this body is a meridional groove, resembling that of a peach. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 427.

2. Highest; consummate.

The meridional brightness, the glorious noon, and height, is to be a Christian.

Donne, Sermons, xvii.

3. Southern; southerly; extending or turned toward the south.

Ethiopia is departed in 2 princypalle parties; and that is, in the East partie and in the Meridionelle partie: the whiche partie meridionelle is clept Moretane.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 156.

The which lyne . . . is cleped the south lyne, or elles the lyne meridional.

Chaucer, Astrolabe, l. 4.

4. Characteristic of southern climates or southern peoples.

A dark meridional physiognomy.

Motley, United Netherlands, I. 139.

Meridional distance. See distance.—Meridional parts, the distance of any given latitude from the equator upon Mercator's map-projection expressed in minutes of the equator. Neglecting the compression, the meridional parts are proportional to the integral of the secant of the latitude, which is the logarithm of the tangent of half the polar distance. Taking account of the compression, the secant of the latitude must be divided before integrating by $1 + e^2 \cos^2 \phi$ (where ϕ is the latitude and e the ellipticity of the meridian).

meridional (mē-rid'i-ō-nāl'i-ti), n. [ME. meridional + -ity.] 1. The state of being meridional or on the meridian.—2. Position in the south; aspect toward the south.

meridionally (mē-rid'i-ō-nāl-i), adv. [ME. meridional + -ly.] In the direction of the meridian; north and south.

Who [the Jews], reverentially declining the situation of their Temple, nor willing to lye as that stood, doe place their beds from north to south, and delight to sleep meridionally.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 8.

merihedric (mer-i-hē'drik), a. [Gr. μέρος, a part, + ἑδρα, a seat, base.] Pertaining to some part of the faces of a polyhedron, taken according to some regular system.

merilist, n. See merels.

meringue (mē-rang'), n. [F., said to be < Mehringen, a town in Germany.] In cookery, a mixture of white of eggs and sugar slightly browned, used for ornamenting and supplementing other confections. Puddings or tarts, etc., covered with this preparation are sometimes called meringues.—Meringue glacé, ice-cream served with a casing of meringue.

merino (mē-rē'nō), a. and n. [= F. mérinos = Pg. merino, merino (sheep), < Sp. merino, roving from pasture to pasture (said of sheep), < merino, an inspector of sheepwalks, a shepherd of merino sheep, also a royal judge, < ML. majorinus (used in Spain), the head of a village, a steward, majordomo; cf. majoralis, a chief, in Spain a head shepherd, < L. major, greater, in ML. a head, chief, etc.: see major, mayor.] I. a. 1. Noting a variety of sheep from Spain, or their wool. See below.—2. Made of the wool of the merino sheep: as, merino stockings or underclothing. The articles so designated are usually made with an admixture of cotton to prevent shrinkage.—Merino sheep, a variety of sheep originally peculiar to Spain, but now introduced into many other countries. They are raised chiefly for the sake of their long fine wool, the mutton being but little esteemed. In summer the Spanish sheep feed upon the elevated lands of Biscay, Navarre, and Aragon, and toward winter are driven southward to the fertile plains of New Castile, Andalusia, and Extremadura.

II. n. 1. A merino sheep.—2. A thin woolen cloth, twilled on both sides and used especially for women's dresses, now to some extent superseded by cashmere. It was originally made of the wool of the merino sheep. There is a variety which has an admixture of silk.

3. A variety of tricor or knitted material for undergarments. [U. S.]

merion (mē'ri-on), n. [= F. mérione, < NL. Meriones, q. v.] A book-name of the deer-mouse or jumping-mouse of North America, Zapus hudsonius, formerly placed in the genus Meriones under the name of M. hudsonicus. See cut under deer-mouse, 1.

Meriones (mē-rī'ō-nēz), n. [NL., so called with ref. to the development of the hind legs (cf. Gr. Μηρίωνες, a man's name, companion of Idomeneus), < Gr. μηρία, thigh-bones, < μηρός, thigh.] A genus of saltatorial myomorph rodents. The name has been applied: (a) By Illiger, 1811, to the Old World jerboas: a synonym of Dipus. (b) By Fré. Cuvier, 1825, to a different genus of American jumping-mice, now called Zapus. [Disused in both senses.]

meris (mē'ris), n.; pl. merides (rī-dēz). [NL., < F. meride (Perrier), < Gr. μερίς, a part.] A permanent colony of cells or plastids, which may remain isolated or may multiply by gemmation to form higher aggregates called demes. See deme and zooid. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 842.

merismatic (mer-is-mat'ik), a. [Gr. μερίσμα, a part, μερισμός, a division, < μερίζω, divide, < μέρος, a part: see merit.] In biol., dividing by the formation of internal partitions; taking place by internal partition into cells or segments.

Merismatic cells, remaining without function sometimes for several years, until the sap-wood containing them becomes dry or heart wood, when they begin their activity.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 680.

merispor (mer'i-spōr), n. [Gr. μέρος or μερίς, a part, division, + σπόρα, seed.] One of the individual cells or secondary spores of a pluricellular (septate or compound) spore.

meristem (mer'is-tem), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μεριστός, verbal adj. of μερίζω, divide, < μέρος, a part.] Actively dividing cell-tissue; the unformed and growing cell-tissues found at the ends of young stems, leaves, and roots. In structure the cells of the meristem are characterized by having a delicate homogeneous membrane, which is only rarely thickened, and homogenous granular protoplasm with a nucleus. It is distinguished as primary meristem when it forms the first foundation of a member, or the cells which develop into the various tissue-elements, and which ordinarily soon lose the power of independent growth, and secondary meristem, in which the tissue-elements retain during their life the properties of typical cells, consisting of a closed cell-membrane with active protoplasm, a nucleus, and cell-contents. They retain the power of independent growth, and a meristem may arise from them at any time.

meristem (mer'is-tē-mat'ik), a. [< meristem + -atic².] Consisting of or pertaining to the meristem.

meristematically (mer'is-tē-mat'i-kal-i), adv. After the manner of meristem.

meristogenetic (me-ris-tō-jē-net'ik), a. [< Gr. μεριστικός, verbal adj. of μερίζω, divide (see meristem), + γένεσις, generation: see genetic.] Produced by a meristem.

merit (mer'it), n. [< ME. merite, meryte, maret, < OF. merite, F. mérite = Pr. merit, merite = Sp. mérito = Pg. It. merito, < L. meritum, that which one deserves, desert (good or bad); also, a ground of desert (service, kindness, benefit, or fault, blame, demerit), worth, value, importance; neut. of meritis, pp. of merere, mereri (> OF. merir), deserve, be worthy of, earn, gain, get, acquire, buy, in military use (sc. stipendia), earn pay, serve for pay; lit. 'receive as a share', akin to Gr. μέρος, μέρος, a part, share, division, μέρος, a part, lot, fate, destiny, μοίρα, lot, μοίρα, share, divide. Cf. mercantile, mercenary, merchant, mercy, etc., from the same ult. source.] 1. That which is deserved; honor or reward due; recompense or consideration deserved. [Rare.]

We believe of the day of Doom, and that every man shall have his Meryte, after he hath deserved.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 135.

A dearer merit, not so deep a maim,
Have I deserved at your highness' hands.

Shak., Rich. II., i. 3. 156.

All power
I give thee; reign forever, and assume Thy merits.

Milton, P. L., iii. 819.

2. The state or fact of deserving; desert, good or bad; intrinsic ground of consideration or award; most commonly in the plural: as, to treat a person according to his merits.

Here men may seen how synne hath his merits.
Chaucer, Doctor's Tale, l. 277.

Nothing [no punishment] is great enough for Silius' merit.

B. Jonson, Sejanus, ii. 1.

Satan exalted sat, by merit raised
To that bad eminence.

Milton, P. L., ii. 5.

Praise from a friend, or censure from a foe,
Are lost on hearers that our merits know.

Pope, Illiad, x. 294.

Specifically—3. The state or fact of deserving well; good desert; worthiness of reward or consideration.

Reputation is . . . oft got without merit, and lost without deserving.

Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 270.

This letter hath more merit than one of more diligence, for I wrote it in my bed, and with much pain.

Donne, Letters, xiv.

Charms strike the sight, but merit wins the soul.

Pope, R. of the L., v. 24.

4. Good quality in general; excellence.

The great merit of Walter Scott's novels is their generous and pure sentiment.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 316.

5. That which deserves consideration or reward; ground of desert; claim to notice or commendation: as, to enumerate the merits of a person, a book, or a scheme.

What a merit were it in death to take this poor maid from the world!

Shak., M. for M., iii. 1. 240.

It was the merit of Montaigne to rise . . . into the clear world of reality.

Lecky, Relationism, i. 113.

6. pl. In law, the right and wrong of a case; the strict legal or equitable rights of the parties, as distinguished from questions of procedure and matters resting in judicial discretion or favor; essential facts and principles that lead to an opinion clear of personal bias: as, to judge a case on its merits.—Figure of merit, a numerical coefficient of excellence in the performance of any instrument, as a chronometer, gun, etc.—Merit of condignity, merit of congruity. See quotation under condignity, 2.—Order for Merit, a Prussian order composed of two classes, military and civil. The first class was founded by Frederick the Great in 1740. The badge is a blue enameled cross adorned with the letter F, the words "pour le mérite," and golden eagles. Since 1810 it has been given exclusively for distinction on the field. The second class (or second order) was founded by Frederick William IV. in 1842 for distinction in science and art. = Syn. Worth, etc. See desert², n.

merit (mer'it), v. [*< ME. meriten, < OF. meriter, F. mériter = Sp. meritar = It. meritare, < L. meritare, earn, gain, serve for pay, freq. of merere, earn, gain, merit: see merit, n.] 1. trans. 1. To deserve; earn a right or incur a liability to; be or become deserving of: as, to merit reward or punishment.

For strength from truth divided and from just,
Illaudable, naught merits but dispraise
And ignominy.

Milton, P. L., vi. 382.

Those best can bear reproach who merit praise.

Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 583.

2. To deserve as a reward; earn by commendable action or conduct.

So many most noble Favours and Respects which I shall daily study to improve and merit.

Howell, Letters, i. v. 34.

A man at best is incapable of meriting anything from God.

South.

3†. To reward.

The king will merit it with gifts.

Chapman, Illiad, ix. 259.

= Syn. 1 and 2. See desert², n.

II. intrans. To acquire merit, benefit, or profit.

And yet he bode them do it, and they were bounde to obey, and merited and deserved by their obedience.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 496.

And if in my poor death fair France may merit,
Give me a thousand blows.

Beau. and Fl.

Does Tertullian think they [the Christians] merited by not being willing to lose their lives in the quarrels of Infidels?

Milton, Ans. to Salmasius.

meritable (mer'i-tā-bl), a. [< OF. meritable, < meriter, merit: see merit.] Having merit; meritorious.

The people generally are very acceptive, and apt to applaud any meritable work.

B. Jonson, Case is Altered, ii. 4.

meritedly (mer'i-ted-li), adv. In accordance with merit; by merit; deservedly; worthily.

merithal (mer'i-thal), n. [< NL. merithallus, < Gr. μερίς (μερι-), a part, + θαλλός, a branch, twig.] In bot., same as internode.

meriting (mer'i-ting), p. a. Deserving.

'Twere well to torture
So meriting a traitor.

B. Jonson, Sejanus, v. 10.

meritmonger (mer'it-mung'gēr), n. One who advocates the doctrine of human merit as entitling man to divine rewards, or who depends on merit for salvation: used in contempt.

Like as these merit-mongers doe, which esteeme themselves after their merits.

Latimer, Sermon, iii., On the Lord's Prayer.

meritorious (mer-i-tō'ri-us), a. [In older use meritory, q. v.; = OF. meritoire, F. méritoire = Pr. meritori = Sp. Pg. It. meritorio, < L. meritorius, of or belonging to the earning of money, that earns money, < merere, mereri, pp. meritus, earn: see merit. In the second sense, dependent more directly on merit.] 1†. That earns money; hireling. B. Jonson.—2. Deserving of reward; worthy of praise or honor; possessing merit.

And meritorious shall that hand be call'd, Canonized and worshipp'd as a saint.

Shak., K. John, iii. 1. 176.

You fool'd the lawyer,
And thought it meritorious to abuse him.

Fletcher, Spanish Curate, v. 2.

Meritorious cognition. See cognition.

meritoriously (mer-i-tō'ri-us-li), adv. In a meritorious manner; in such a manner as to deserve reward.

meritoriousness (mer-i-tō'ri-us-ness), n. The state or quality of being meritorious, or of deserving reward or honor.

meritory (mer'i-tō-ri), a. [< ME. meritory, < L. meritorius, that earns money: see meritorious.] Deserving of reward; meritorious.

How meritory is thilke dede
Of charites to clothe and fede
The poore folke.

Gower, Conf. Amant, Prol.

As to the first, it is meritory.

Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

meritot (mer'i-tot), n. [See merry-totter.] See the quotation.

Meritot, in Chaucer, a Sport used by Children, by swinging themselves in Bell-ropes, or such-like, till they are giddy.

Bourne's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 406.

merling (mēr'ling), n. [< ME. merlyng, merlynge, with aecom. term. -ing (as in whiting) (ML. merlingus), < OF. merlan, merlanc, merlanke, F. merlan (> Sp. marlan), a whiting, < L. merula, a fish, the sea-carp, a transferred use of merula, a blackbird: see merle¹.] A small gadoid fish, Merlangus vulgaris, the European whiting.

Merlin's-grass (mēr'linz-grās), n. A species of quillwort, Isoetes lacustris, growing in lakes. According to a local Welsh tradition, it is marvelously nourishing to cattle and fishes.

merlon (mēr'lon), n. [*< F. merlon = Sp. merlon = Pg. merlão, a merlon, < It. merlo, a merlon, perhaps < LL. merulus, dim. of mærus, murus, wall: see mure.] In fort., the plain member of masonry or other material which separates two crenelles or embrasures; a cop. See battlement.

The battery was soon erected, the merlons being framed of logs and filled with earth. Franklin, Autobiog., p. 175.

The merlons of the Guelph battlements were square, those of the Ghibelline were "a coda di rondine"—that is, in shape like the letter M.

C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 200.

Merlucciidae (mēr-lū-sī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Merlucius + -idae.] In Gill's system of classification, a family of Gadoidea or gadoid fishes, represented by the genus Merlucius. The caudal region is moderate and conform behind; the caudal rays are procurent forward; the anus is submedian; the suborbital bones are moderate; the mouth is terminal; the ventral fins are subjugular; the dorsal fin is double, a short anterior and a long posterior one; there is a long anal fin corresponding to the second dorsal; the ribs are wide, approximated and channeled below, or with inflected sides; and there are paired excavated frontal bones with divergent crests continuous from the forked occipital crest. The family includes the English hake and related fishes.

merluccine (mēr-lū'si-in), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Merlucciidae, or having their characters.

II. n. A gadoid fish of the family Merlucciidae. merluccoid (mēr-lū'si-oid), a. Like a hake; of or pertaining to the Merlucciidae.

Merlucius (mēr-lū'si-us), n. [NL., < F. merluce, merlus, OF. merlus, merluz (= Sp. merluza = It. merluzzo, the hake), dried haddock, < merlus, haddock, according to Ménage, < L. maris lucius, ocean pike: maris, gen. of mare, the sea; lucius, a fish, perhaps the pike: see luce¹.] A genus of fishes represented by the common hake of Europe, M. smiridus or vulgaris, and type of the family Merlucciidae. Also spelled Merluccius.

mermaid (mēr mād), n. [< ME. mermayde, meremayde; < mere¹ + maid. Cf. mermaid.] A fabled marine or amphibian creature having the form of a woman above the waist and that of a fish below, endowed with human attributes, and usually working harm, with or without malignant intent, to mortals with whom she might be thrown into relation.

Chauntecleer so free Sang merier than the mermayde in the see.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 450.

And as for the mermaid called Nerides, it is no fabulous tale that goeth of them; for looke, how painters draw them, so they are indeed.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, ix. 5.
Who would be
A mermaid fair,
Singing alone,
Combing her hair
Under the sea?
Tennyson, The Mermaid.

False mermaid, the Florkia proserpinacoides, an inconspicuous annual plant of the northern United States, resembling the mermaid-weed.—Mermaid lace, a fine Venetian point-lace.—Mermaid's fish-lines, a common seaweed, Chorda filum: so called from its cord-like appearance. See Chorda, 2.

mermaid (mēr mād), n. [< ME. mermaid-en, mermayden, meremaiden; < mere¹ + maid-en. Cf. mermaid.] A mermaid; a siren.

Goth now rather away, ye mermaydens [L. sirenes], whiche that ben swete til it be at the laste.
Chaucer, Boethius, i. prose 1.

Mermen and mermaidens. The Century, XXXV. 537.

mermaid-fish (mēr mād-fish), n. An angel-fish, Squatina angelus, unnaturally set up for a mermaid by a taxidermist.

mermaid's-egg (mēr mādz-eg), n. Same as mermaid's-purse.

mermaid's-glove (mēr mādz-gluv), n. 1. A name given to the largest of British sponges, Halichondria oculata, from its tendency to branch into a form bearing a remote resemblance to a glove with extended fingers. It sometimes attains a height of 2 feet.—2. A kind of alcyonarian polyp, Alcyonium digitatum: same as dead-men's-fingers.

mermaid's-hair (mēr mādz-hār), n. A blackish-green filamentous species of seaweed, Lyngbya majuscula. See Lyngbya.

mermaid's-head (mēr mādzh-hed), n. A popular British name of a spatangoid sea-urchin, as the Spatangus or Amphidotus cordatus. Also called heart-urchin.

mermaid's-purse (mēr mādzh-pers), n. An egg-case or oviduct of a skate, ray, or shark. Also called sea-purse and sea-barrow.

These cases are frequently found on the sea-shore, and are called mermaid's-purses. Yarrell, British Fishes.

mermaid-weed (mēr mād-wēd), n. A plant of the genus Proserpinaca, which consists of two marsh-herbs of North America and the West Indies, having comb-toothed leaves and inconspicuous flowers.

mermaladet, n. An obsolete form of marmalade.

merman (mēr'man), n.; pl. mermen (-men). [Early mod. E. also mereman, meareman; < ME. mereman (= D. meerman = G. meermann); < mere¹ + man. Cf. mermin and mermaid.*] 1. A fabulous man of the sea, with the lower part of the body that of a fish.

A thing turmoiling in the sea we spide,
Like to a meareman.
John Taylor, Works, li. 22. (Nares.)

2. In her., same as triton. merman (mēr'mi-an), n. [< Mermis + -an.] A land-hairworm of the family Mermithidae or Mermithidae. In their early stages these worms are parasitic in the visceral cavities of insects, and the young are able to move over the ground or even on trees during heavy dews or in wet weather.

mermin, n. [ME., also mermyr, pl. merminnen, < mereminnen, < AS. meremennan, meremenn, meremen, f. (= MD. merminne, maerminne, f., = MLG. merminne = OHG. meremanne, meremenni, merimeni, merimin, mermin, n., meriminna, meriminna, f., MHG. mereminne, merminne, f., a mermaid, = (with additional suffix) Icel. marmennill, marmendill (mod. marmendill), also margmelli = Norw. marmale, a sea-goblin; < mere, sea, + mennen, fem. of man, mann, man: see mere¹ and man, and cf. merman.] A mermaid or merman.

The oost of Rome sig [saw] mermyr in liknes of men and of women.
Trevius, tr. of Higden's Polychronicon.
Ther heo funden the merminnen
That beoth deor of muclehe ginnen.
Layamon, l. 56.

Mermis (mēr'mis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέρμις, a cord, string.] The typical genus of Mermithidae. M. nigrescens and M. albescentis are examples.

Mermithidae (mēr-mith'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mermis (Mermith) + -idae.] A family of nematoid worms, typified by the genus Mermis, belonging to the order Gordiaceae; the land-hairworms. They are apterous Nematodea, with a very long filiform body and six oral papillae, the male having two spicules and three rows of papillae on the broadened caudal region. The worms in their larval state are parasitic, like the true gordians, being found in the bodies of various insects. When mature they live in the ground, and sometimes swarm to the surface in such numbers as to give rise to the vulgar belief that it has rained worms. Also Mermithidae, Mermithidae.

meroblast (mēr'ō-blāst), n. [< Gr. μέρος, a part (see merit), + βλαστός, a germ.] In embryol., a meroblastic ovum; an egg or ovum containing food-yolk or nutritive protoplasm besides the formative or germinal protoplasm: distinguished from holoblast.

meroblastic (mēr'ō-blas'tik), a. [< meroblast + -ic.] In embryol., partially germinal: applied by Remak to those eggs in which there is much food-yolk which does not undergo segmentation or take part in germination: opposed to holoblastic. Birds, reptiles, most fishes, and most invertebrates have meroblastic eggs.

merocoele (mē'rō-sēl), n. [< Gr. μέρως, thigh, + κύλη, tumor.] Femoral hernia. See hernia.

merocerite (mē-ros'e-rit), n. [< Gr. μέρως, thigh, + κέρα, horn, + -ite².] In Crustacea, one of the joints of an antenna, borne upon the ischiocerite. See antenna.

meroceritic (mē-ros'e-rit'ik), a. [< merocerite + -ic.] Of the nature of a merocerite.

merogastrula (mēr'ō-gas'trō-lā), n.; pl. merogastrulae (-lā). [NL., < Gr. μέρος, a part, + NL. gastrula, q. v.] The gastrula, of whatever form, of a meroblastic egg. It is a discogastrula if the partial segmentation is discoidal, a perigastrula if the segmentation is superficial as well as partial.

merogenesis (mēr'ō-jen'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέρος, a part, + γένεσις, generation: see genesis.] In biol., segmentation; origination of the segments of which an organized body may consist. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 183.

merogenetic (mēr'ō-jē-net'ik), a. [< merogenesis, after genetic.] Pertaining to, characterized by, or exhibiting merogenesis.

merohedral (mēr'ō-hē'dral), a. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + ἑδρα, seat, base, + -al.] In crystal., same as hemihedral.

merohedrism (mēr'ō-hē'drizm), n. [As merohedr-al + -ism.] Same as hemihedrism.

merostic (mēr'ō-is'tik), a. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + ὄν, egg (ovum), + -istic.] Secreting not only ova, but also vitelligenous cells: applied to the ovaries of insects. See panostic.

Dr. A. Brandt has proposed the term panostic for ovaries of the first mode, and merostic for those of the second and third modes of development.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 381.

meromorph (mēr'ō-mōrf), a. Same as meromorphic.

meromorphic (mēr'ō-mōrf'ik), a. [< Gr. μέρος, part, fraction, + μορφή, form.] Similar in nature to a rational fraction.—Meromorphic function, in the theory of functions, a function which, so long as the variable remains within a certain part of the plane of imaginary quantity within which the function is said to be meromorphic, varies continuously, has a derivative, and is monotonic except in going round certain points or isolated values of the variable called poles, at which the function becomes infinite. The function is, therefore, of the nature of a fraction whose numerator and denominator may be infinite series. An older name is fractionary function.

Meromyaria (mēr'ō-mī-ā-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέρος, a part, + μυς, a muscle, + -aria.] One of the three principal divisions of the Nematodea, containing those threadworms which have only eight longitudinal series of muscle-cells, two between each dorsal and ventral line and lateral area respectively. See Polymyaria, Holomyaria.

meromyarian (mēr'ō-mī-ā-ri-an), a. [< Meromyaria + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Meromyaria.

meroparonymy (mēr'ō-pa-ron'i-mi), n. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + παρωνυμία, paronymy: see paronymy.] Partial paronymy; adoption or naturalization of a Latin or Greek word in only one or two modern languages. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 519. [Rare.]

Meropidae (mē-rop'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Merops + -idae.] An Old World family of tenuirostral picarian birds, typified by the genus Merops; the bee-eaters or apiasters. They have the feet not zygodactyl, the bill long, slender, and acute, the sternum four-notched behind, the carotid single, the elyodochon nude, and a spinal apertium. The range of the family is extensive, including the Palearctic, Ethiopian, Oriental, and Australasian regions. The family contains upward of 30 species, divided into several genera, and by Gray into 2 subfamilies, Nyctinomithinae and Meropinae. See cut under bee-eater.

meropidan (mē-rop'i-dan), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Meropidae, or having their characters.

II. n. A bird of the family Meropidae. Meropinae (mēr'ō-pī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Merops + -inae.] The leading subfamily of Meropidae, containing nearly all the species.

meropodite (mē-rop'ō-dit), n. [< Gr. μέρως, thigh, + ποδ- (pod-) = E. foot, + -ite².] The fourth joint of a developed endopodite, between the ischiopodite and the carpopodite. See cut under endopodite.

meropoditic (mē-rop'ō-dit'ik), a. [< meropodite + -ic.] Of the nature of a meropodite: as, the meropoditic segment of the leg.

Merops (mē'rops), n. [NL., < L. merops, < Gr. μέρως, a bird, the bee-eater, appar. the same as μέρως, speaking, endowed with speech, < μέρος, a part, μερῖσθαι, divide, + ὄψ, voice.] The typical genus of Meropidae. Birds of this genus are of lithe and slender form, somewhat like that of the swallow, which they also resemble in their mode of flight. The bill is long and slender, the wings are long and pointed, the tail has the two middle feathers lengthened, and the plumage is beautifully variegated with bright colors. They prey on insects, especially bees, wasps, and other hymenoptera, which they capture on the wing. There are several species, the best-known of which is M. apiculator, the only one of general distribution in Europe, though a second, M. cyprius, is also found in parts of Europe. See bee-eater. Also called Aplaster.

merorganization (me-rôr'gan-i-zâ'shon), n. [Gr. μέρος, part, + E. organization.] Organization in part, or partial organization. [Rare.]

meros, merus (mê'ros, -rus), n. [NL., < Gr. μέρος, thigh.] 1. In zool., one of the joints of a maxilliped.—2. In anat., the thigh, femur, or femoral segment of the hind limb, extending from the hip to the knee, and corresponding to the brachium of the fore limb.

merosomal (mer'ô-sô-mal), a. [< merosome + -al.] Of the nature of a merosome.

merosome (mer'ô-sôm), n. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + σῶμα, body.] In zool., one of the definite successive parts or segments of which the body is composed; a metamere; a somite. Thus, one of the rays of a starfish, or one of the rings of a worm or crustacean, is a merosome.

Merostomata (mer'ô-stô-ma-tâ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέρος, a part, + στόμα, mouth.] A group of articulated animals to which various values and limits have been assigned. (a) Named by De Blainville as an order of crustaceans, containing the horseshoe-crabs, together with certain heterogeneous forms. (b) Extended to the Limulidae and the Eurypterida. (c) Extended to the Limulidae, Eurypterida, and Trilobita, as a class of crustaceans: synonymous with Gigantostomata and with Palaeocarida. (d) Having the same limits as (c), but associated with the Arachnida. (e) Restricted, as an order of crustaceans, to the Limulidae: synonymous with Xiphosura. (f) Restricted, as an order of Gigantostomata, to the Eurypterida, and synonymous therewith. See Paleodipoda. Hamatobranchia is a synonym.

merostomatous (mer'ô-stom'a-tus), a. [< Merostomata + -ous.] Pertaining to the Merostomata, or having their characters.

merostome (mer'ô-stôm), n. One of the Merostomata, as a trilobite or a horseshoe-crab.

merostomous (me-ros'tô-mus), a. [< merostome + -ous.] Same as merostomatous.

-merous. [< Gr. μέρος, combining form of μέρος, a part.] A suffix denoting 'parted,' 'divided into parts': often used in botany with a numerical prefix, as 2-merous, 3-merous, etc., to be read dimerous, trimerous, etc., according to the Greek.

Merovingian (mer'ô-vin'ji-an), a. and n. [= F. Mérovingien, < ML. Merovingi, the descendants of Merovæus, an ancestor of the founder of the dynasty, *< OHG. Merowig or Merwig.] 1. a. Taking name from Merowig or Merwig (L. Merovæus), an alleged chief or king of a part of the Salian Franks and grandfather of Clovis: as, the Merovingian race, dynasty, or period. Clovis, invading the Roman part of Gaul in A. D. 486, founded the Merovingian or first race of French kings (several often reigning at the same time in different parts of France), which was succeeded by the Carolingian dynasty in 751 or 752. Some suppose Merowig or Merovæus to have been the patronymic of the family or clan of Clovis, derived from a more remote ancestor.—Merovingian writing, a variety of cursive script full of flourishes and difficult enforcements and combinations of letters, peculiar to the Merovingian period in France: used in many documents still in existence.

The writing of the Frankish empire to which the title of Merovingian has been applied had a wider range than the other national hands. It had a long career both for diplomatic and literary purposes. In this writing, as it appears in documents, we see that the Roman cursive is subjected to a lateral pressure, so that the letters received a curiously cramped appearance, while the heads and tails are exaggerated to inordinate length. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 187.

II. n. A member of the family to which the first dynasty of French kings belonged. See I. meroxene (me-rok'sên), n. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + ξένος, strange, foreign.] A variety of the kind of mica called biotite, distinguished by its optical characters. See biotite and mica. The name was early given by Breithaupt to the Vesuvian biotite, but has recently been limited by Tschermak to those kinds of biotite in which the optic axial plane is parallel to the plane of symmetry.

merpeople (mêr'pê'pl), n. pl. [< mer- (in mermaid, merman) + people.] Fabled inhabitants of the sea with a human body and a fish-like tail: a collective name for mermaids and mermen. Gill, Forum, III. 85.

merret, v. t. A Middle English form of marl. merrify (mer'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. merrified, ppr. merrifying. [< merry + -fy.] To cause to be or become merry. [Rare.]

It merrified us all.

Mme. D'Arblay, Diary, I. 324. (Davies.) merrily (mer'i-li), adv. [< ME. merrily, meriely; < merry + -ly.] In a merry, cheerful, or glad manner; with mirth and jollity.

merrimake (mer'i-māk), n. and v. See merry-make.

merriment (mer'i-ment), n. [< merry + -ment.] 1. The state of being merry or frolicsome; hilarious enjoyment; jollity: as, boisterous merriment.

merry (mer'i), n. [Orig. merise*, then meries, applied as a plural to the fruit, whence the sing. merry; < F. merise, wild cherry; origin uncertain. Cf. cherry, ult. < F. cerise, cherry.] The wild cherry of England, Prunus avium.

merry-andrew (mer'i-an'drô), n. [< merry + Andrew, a man's name: see Andrew. The name Andrew may refer to some buffoon of that name, of whom nothing is now known (cf. a similar use of some man's name in smart Aleck, a slang term for a would-be smart fellow), or it may be a general appellation like zany, a merry-andrew, ult. identical with John. There appears to be no evidence for the assertion (appar. first made by Hearne) that the name orig. referred to Andrew Boorde, doctor of physic in the reign of Henry VIII., the author of the "Introduction to Knowledge" and other works, and to whom several jest-books were erroneously ascribed (perhaps because of his surname, which recalls ME. boorde, borde, bourde, a jest: see bourd).] One whose business it is to make sport for others by jokes and ridiculous posturing; a buffoon; a clown.

Th' Italian Merry Andrews took their place,

And quite debauch'd the Stage with lewd grimace.

Dryden, Epil. to Univ. of Oxford (1678), l. 11.

merrybounk, n. [Formerly also merriboucke; appar. < merry + bounk.] A cold posset.

I present you with meate, and you . . . can do no less than present mee with the best morning's draught of merry-go-downe in your quarters.

Nashe, Lenten Stuffe, Ded. (Harl. Misc., VI. 145).

merry-go-round (mer'i-gô-round'), n. A revolving machine, consisting of a series of wooden horses or carriage-seats, mounted on a circular platform, on or in which children and sometimes grown persons ride for amusement. In the United States also called a carrousel.

merry-maid (mer'i-mäd), n. A dialectal form of mermaid. [Cornwall, Eng.]

merrymake (mer'i-māk), v. t.; pret. and pp. merrymade, ppr. merrymaking. [Also merri-make; < merry + make.] To make merry; frolic.

With thee 'twas Marian's dear delight

To moll all day, and merrymake at night.

Gay, Shepherd's Week, Tuesday.

The weak and wronged shall sit with me,

And eat and drink, and merrymake and go,

Singing a holiday for every one.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 180.

merrymake (mer'i-māk), n. [< merrymake, v.] A merrymaking; sport; pastime. Also written merrimake.

But when he saw her toy, and gibe, and geare,

And passe the bonds of modest merrimake,

Her dalliance he despis'd and follies did forsake.

Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 121.

We'll have feasts,

And funerals also, merrymakes and wars.

Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

merrymaking (mer'i-mä'king), n. The act of making merry; a convivial entertainment; a gay festival.

Is this a place for mirthful cheer?

Can merry-making enter here?

Wordsworth, Matron of Jedborough.

merrymaking (mer'i-mä'king), a. Producing mirth or sport.

His talents lending to exalt the freaks

Of merry-making beggars, . . . provoked

To laughter multiplied in louder peals

By his malicious wit.

Wordsworth, Excursion, vi.

merryman (mer'i-man), n.; pl. merrymen (-men). A merry-andrew; a buffoon; a clown: used as an appellative or pretended surname for a clown: as, Mr. Merryman.

merrymeeting (mer'i-mē'ting), n. A meeting for mirth or sport; a merrymaking; a festival.

The studious man prefers a book before a revel, the rigours of contemplation before merry-meetings and jolly company. South, Sermons, VIII. 403.

merry-night (mer'i-nit), n. A rural festival held in the north of England, where young people meet in the evening for the purpose of dancing.

He hears a sound, and sees the light,
And in a moment calls to mind
That 'tis the village Merry-Night!
Wordsworth, The Waggoner.

merrythought (mer'i-thāt), n. The furcula or wishbone of a fowl's breast: so called from the sport of breaking it between two persons of whom each pulls at one of the two ends, to determine which is to be married first, or which is to have a wish gratified that has been mentally formed for the occasion, the winner being the one who gets the longer fragment.

I have known the shooting of a star spoil a night's rest; and have seen a man in love grow pale, and lose his appetite, upon the plucking of a merry-thought. Addison, Omena.

merry-totter (mer'i-tot'er), n. [ME. merytotyr, merytoytyr, mery totyr, myry totyr; < meryt + totter, a swing.] A swing for children. Prompt. Par., p. 518; Cath. Ang., pp. 235, 390.

Mesembryanthemum (me-sem'bri-an-thē-mum), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1719), prop. Mesembryanthemum*, < Gr. μεσημβρία, midday, the south (< μέσος, middle, + ἡμέρα, day), + ἄνθος, a flower, < ἀνθίσ, bloom, < ἄνθος, a flower: see anther.] A large genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Ficoideae, the fig-marigold family, type of the tribe Mesembryanthemae. They are erect or prostrate fleshy herbs, sometimes slightly woody, with thick fleshy leaves, and showy white, yellow, or rose-colored flowers in terminal or axillary clusters. The fruit is a capsule, which is hygroscopic, swelling out and opening in the rain, and so allowing the seeds to escape. The genus embraces some 300 species, reaching by far its greatest development in South Africa, a few species, mostly littoral, being scattered in the Canaries, the Mediterranean region, Australia, etc. A general name for the species is fig-marigold, also midday flower and pig's-face. M. crystallinum is the ice-plant (which see). M. acinaciforme and M. edule of South Africa are called Hottentot fig. M. dolabriforme is the hatchet-leaved fig-marigold (see cut under dolabriform). See dog's-chop, cat-chop, and *fig*².

mesembryo (me-sem'bri-ō), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἐμβρυον, embryo: see embryo.] The blastula stage of the ova of metazoans, parallel with the adult colonies of such protozoans as Eudorina. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1887.

mesembryonic (me-sem'bri-on'ik), a. [Gr. mesembryo (n) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a mesembryo.

mesencephalic (mes'en-se-fal'ik or -sef'a-lik), a. [Gr. mesencephalon + -ic.] Situated in the midst of the encephalon, as the midbrain; of or pertaining to the mesencephalon: as, the mesencephalic segment of the brain.

mesencephalon (mes-en-sef'a-lon), n.; pl. mesencephala (-lā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἐνκέφαλος, brain: see encephalon.] The midbrain; a segment of the encephalon consisting essentially of the corpora quadrigemina or optic lobes and the crura cerebri. See brain. Also mesencephal, mesocephalon.

mesenchyma (mes-eng'ki-mā), n. [NL.] Same as mesenchyme.

mesenchymal (mes-eng'ki-mal), a. [Gr. mesenchyme + -al.] Pertaining to, consisting of, or derived from mesenchyme; mesenchymatous.

The ordinary mesenchymal cells.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III. 194.

mesenchymatous (mes-eng-kim'a-tus), a. [Gr. mesenchyma (n) + -ous.] Same as mesenchymal.

The body-cavity contains mesenchymatous elements.

Jour. Roy. Micros. Soc., Feb., 1886, p. 54.

mesenchyme (mes-eng'kim), n. [Gr. mesenchyma, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἐνχυμα, an infusion.] The tissue or substance of the mesoderm of some animals, as sponges.

mesenna, n. Plural of mesenteron. mesenteria, n. Plural of mesenterium.

mesenterial (mez-en-tē-ri-al), a. [Gr. mesenteria + -al.] Same as mesenteric. The low development of the mesenterial filament.

Micros. Science, XXVIII. 425.

mesenteric (mez-en-ter'ik), a. [Gr. mesenteria + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a mesentery, in any sense: as, mesenteric attachment.—Mesenteric artery, an artery which ramifies between the two layers of a mesentery. In man there are two large arteries of this name, superior and inferior, both branches of the abdominal aorta.—Mesenteric chamber, the space between any two mesenteries of an actinozoan.—Mesenteric fever, filament, ganglia, gland. See the nouns.—Mesenteric lymphatic, a lacteal.—Mesenteric septum. Same as mesentery, 2.—Mesenteric vein, a vein which corresponds to a mesenteric artery.

mesentericat (mes-en-ter'i-kā), n. [NL., < Gr. μεσεντερικόν, the mesentery: see mesentery.] In bot., the mycelium of certain fungi.

mesenteriololum (mes-en-te-ri'ō-lum), n. [NL., dim. of mesenterium, mesentery: see mesentery.] A duplicature of peritoneum connecting the appendix vermiformis with the mesentery.

mesenteritis (mes-en-te-ri'tis), n. [NL., < mesentery + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the mesentery.

mesenterium (mes-en-tē-ri-um), n.; pl. mesenteria (-ā). [NL.: see mesentery.] A mesentery. mesenteron (mes-en'te-ron), n.; pl. mesentera (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μεσεντέριον, < μέσος, middle, + έντερον, intestine.] In embryol., the interior of the archenteron or primitive intestine; the intestinal cavity in an early stage, bounded by the hypoblast.

After the formation of the mesoblast and the separation of a portion of the archenteron, the hypoblastic cavity is known as the mesenteron. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 11.

mesenteronic (mes-en-te-ron'ik), a. [Gr. mesenteron + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesenteron.

mesentery (mez'en-ter-i), n.; pl. mesenteries (-iz). [Gr. mesenterium, < Gr. μεσεντέριον, the mesentery, lit. the middle intestine, < μέσος, middle, + έντερον, intestine: see enteron.] 1. In anat., a fold or duplicature of peritoneum investing the intestine or other abdominal viscous wholly or in part, and serving to retain such viscous in its proper position in the abdominal cavity. It consists of two layers of peritoneum, separated in that part of their extent which is wrapped around the viscous, in the rest of their extent lying closely apposed, but still having between them the vessels, nerves, and lymphatics which go to the viscous, together with, usually, a quantity of fat. In man the mesentery of the intestine is connected by its root to the spinal column for a distance of about six inches, from the left side of the second lumbar vertebra to the right sacro-iliac synchondrosis; its breadth, or the distance from the vertebra to the intestinal border, is about four inches. The term mesentery is sometimes restricted to the reflection of peritoneum which keeps the small intestine in position, in which case the similar foldings about other viscera have special names, as mesoarium, mesocacum, mesocolon, mesoduodenum, mesogastrum, mesometry, mesorchium, mesorectum, mesovaricum. See these words. Also mesaraic.

2. In zool., some structure like a mesentery; a perivisceral or mesenteric septum. (a) In Actinozoa, one of the several membranous partitions which radiate from the wall of the gastric sac to that of the body vertically across the somatic or perivisceral cavity, which is thus divided into a corresponding number of mesenteric chambers. (b) In sundry other invertebrates, as annelids, one of the membranous or muscular septa which may subdivide the perivisceral cavity into several partly separate chambers.

mesepimeral (mes-e-pim'e-ral), a. [Gr. mesepimeron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesepimeron.

mesepimeron (mes-e-pim'e-ron), n.; pl. mesepimera (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. epimeron, q. v.] In entom., the epimeron of the mesothorax; the epimeral sclerite of the mesopleuron.

mesepisternum (mes-ep-i-stēr'num), n.; pl. mesepisterna (-nā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. episternum, q. v.] In entom., one of the mesothoracic episterna.

meseraic, meseraical. Erroneous forms of mesaraic, mesaraical.

mesethmoid (mes-eth'moid), a. and n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. ethmoid.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the mesethmoid.

II. n. The middle ethmoidal bone; the median element of the compound ethmoid bone. It is the part called in human anatomy the lamina perpendicularis, or perpendicular plate of the ethmoid, as distinguished from the lateral masses of that bone, or the ethmoturbinals. See ethmoid.

mesethmoidal (mes-eth-moi'dal), a. [Gr. mesethmoid + -al.] Same as mesethmoid.

mesh¹ (mesh), n. [Formerly also meash and mash, and dial. mask; < ME. maske, < AS. masc*, transposed max, also dim. mæsc (rare) = MD. masche, maesche, D. maas = MLG. masche = OHG. masca, MHG. G. masche = Icel. möskvi = Sw. maska = Dan. maske, a mesh, net. Cf. W. masg, a mesh, network, mesgl, a mesh; Lith. mazgas, a knot, megsti, knot, weave nets.] 1. One of the clear spaces of a net or netting; an opening in network of a size determined by the distance apart of the knots by which the crossing twines or threads are united; also, a clear space between the threads or wires of a sieve.

Or spreads his subtle nets from sight,

With twinkling glasses, to betray

The larks that in the meshes light.

Dryden, tr. of Horace's Epodes, II.

2. Figuratively, network; means of entanglement; anything that serves to entangle or constrain: often in the plural: as, the meshes of the law.

A golden mesh to entrap the hearts of men

Faster than gnats in cobwebs.

Shak., M. of V., III. 2. 122.

Breaking the mesh of the bramble fine.

Whittier, Moss Megone, I.

The home ties that make a web of infinite fineness and soft silken meshes around his heart.

D. G. Mitchell, Reveries of a Bachelor, IV.

3. pl. In lace and similar fabrics, the whole background, often formed of threads very irregularly spaced.—4. In mach., the engagement of the teeth of gearing: as, the mesh of a toothed wheel with the teeth of a rack or with the cogs of another wheel.—5. A tool used in embroidery, knitting, etc., for the production of stitching of regular size, and sometimes having a groove to guide the scissors. Dict. Needlework.

mesh¹ (mesh), v. [Early mod. E. also meash (and mash* f); < ME. masken, mesh; from the noun: see *mesh*¹, n. Cf. immesh.] I. trans.

1. To make in meshes; form the meshes of.

Within the loft are many tarry-fingered Penelopes mending old nets and meshing new ones.

Harper's Mag., LXV. 5.

2. To catch in a net, as fish; hence, to entangle; entrap in meshes.

The goodlyhed or beaute which that kynde

In any other lady hadde yest

Kan noight the mountance of a knot unbynde

About his herte, of alle Cryseydes net;

He was so narwe ymasked and yknet.

Chaucer, Troilus, III. 1733.

Meshed in the breers, that erst was onely torne.

Wyatt, The Lure that fled Loue.

This fly is caught, is meshed already; I will suck him, and lay him by.

Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, IV. 2.

3. To engage (the teeth of wheels or the teeth of a rack and pinion) with each other.

II. intrans. 1. To make meshes or nets.

Net-making . . . is a simple and easily acquired art. . . . A little practice in meshing is sufficient to develop wonderful dexterity of movement. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 359.

2. To become engaged, as the teeth of one wheel with those of another.

A pitman consisting of two grooved bars connected by teeth with each other is combined with a gear wheel on a main shaft meshing into the teeth.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LXI. 73.

mesh², v. t. An obsolete or dialectal form of *mesh*¹. Florio.

meshed (mesht), a. [Gr. *mesh*¹ + *-ed*².] Having meshes; also, decorated with a pattern of crossing lines, resembling the meshes of a net: as, meshed silk.

Small meshed net about 18 inches deep.

Nature, XL. 423.

Meshed work, embroidery on netting, the original form of needle-point lace: common in the seventeenth century.

meshing-net (mesh'ing-net), n. A net in the meshes of which fish are caught by their gills; a gill-net.

mesh-stick (mesh'stik), n. In making nets, a flat slat with rounded ends and angles, about which the thread or twine is netted or looped, and which gages the size of the meshes so that they are of uniform dimensions.

mesh-structure (mesh'struk'tūr), n. In lithol., a sort of network frequently seen in alteration products of minerals, and especially in the commonly occurring change of olivin to serpentine. Also called net-structure and lattice-structure—the latter when the linear arrangement of the products is such as gives rise to lozenge-shaped figures, as in the case of the alterations of hornblende.

meshwork (mesh'wērk), n. A network; meshes collectively; a web; a plexus; cancellation.

If this Danton were to burst your mesh-work!—Very curious indeed to consider.

Carlyle, French Rev., II. viii. 2.

meshy (mesh'i), a. [mesh + -y]. 1. Formed like network; reticulated.—2. Resembling network; divided into small equal parts.

When all the treasures of the deep Into their meshy cells were poured. J. Baillie.

mesial (mes'i-al or mē'zi-al), a. [NL., mesialis (formed according to medialis, medial), < Gr. μέσος, middle, mid: see meson.] Pertaining to the middle; being in the middle; in zool., pertaining to or on the middle line or plane of the body; median. Also mesian.—Mesial aspect, the aspect of an organ which is toward the mesial plane or meson, as distinguished from its dextral or sinistral aspect.—Mesial line. Same as median line (which see, under median).—Mesial plane, the meson or meson.

mesially (mes'i- or mē'zi-al-i), adv. Same as mesally.

mesialward (mes'i-al-wārd), adv. [mesial + -ward.] Same as mesad.

mesian (mes'i-an), a. [mes(i)on + -an.] Same as mesal or mesial. Barclay.

mesion (mes'i-on), n. [NL. (John Barclay, 1803), < Gr. μέσος, middle: see mesial.] The middle or median longitudinal plane of the body of a bilaterally symmetrical animal, dividing it into equal and similar right and left halves; the meson.

mesistem (mes'is-tem), n. An abbreviation of mesomeresistem.

Mesites (me-si'tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. μεσῖτης, a mediator, < μέσος, middle: see mesial.] 1. A genus of birds peculiar to Madagascar, type of the family Mesitidae, presenting a very unusual combination of characters. The general appearance is thrush-like, and there are points about the bird which have caused it to be classed with thrushes, pigeons, galinaceous birds, rails, herons, etc. The nearest relatives of Mesites are the sun-bitterns (Eurypyga) and the kagus (Rhinocetus). (See cuts under Eurypyga and kagu.) M. variegata is cinnamon-brown varied with black. The genus was founded by Isidore Geoffroy St. Hilaire in 1838. It is also called Mesitornis and Mesenas.

2. In entom., a genus of beetles of the family Calandridae, of wide distribution and few species. They abound in Madeira and the Canary Islands, breeding in decaying and dead euphorbias and laurels. Two species occur in the United States, M. subcylindricus and M. ruficollis.

3. A genus of fishes: same as Galaxias. Jenyns, 1842.—4. A genus of echinoderms.

Mesitidae (me-sit'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesites + -idae.] A family of gallatorial birds, represented by Mesites, and related to the Eurypygidae and Rhinocetidae, but not to the Eupetidae. Also Mesitinae, as a subfamily of Eupetidae.

mesitine-spar (mes'i-tin-spār), n. [mesitine* (< Gr. μεσῖτης, a mediator, lit. being in the middle, + -ine) + spar]. A carbonate of magnesium and iron intermediate between magnesite and siderite, occurring in yellowish rhombohedral crystals at Traversella in Piedmont.

mesitite (mes'i-tit), n. [Gr. μεσῖτης, a mediator (lit. being in the middle) (see Mesites), + -ite]. Same as mesitine-spar.

mesitule (mes'i-tūl), n. Same as mesityl.

mesityl (mes'i-til), n. [As mesit-ite + -yl.] An organic radical, C₆H₁₀, whose oxid yields acetone by hydration.

mesitylene (mes'i-ti-lēn), n. [mesityl + -ene.] Trimethyl benzin, an oily, colorless liquid, C₆H₃(CH₃)₃, obtained from acetone distilled with half its volume of fuming sulphuric acid. It is a constituent of coal-tar.

mesium (mes'i-um), n.; pl. mesia (-ē). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle: see meson.] Same as meson, 1. Barclay.

mesjid, n. Same as masjid.

meskitot, n. See mesquit.

meskin, n. Same as maskin.

meskit¹, n. Same as mesquit¹.

meskit², n. See mesquit².

meslé (me-lā'), a. [OF., pp. of mesler, mix: see meddle, mell.] In her., divided into small parts, paly, bendy, barruly, etc., and alternately a color and a metal.

meslin¹, n. and a. Same as maslin¹.

meslin², n. See maslin².

mesmerie (mez-mēr-ē'), n. [mesmer(ize) + -ee]. The person on whom a mesmerist operates; one who is mesmerized. Imp. Dict.
mesmeric (mez-mer'ik), a. [mesmer (see mesmerism) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mesmerism; produced by mesmerism, or resembling its effects: as, the mesmeric theory; mesmeric sleep.

Phenomena . . . induced by mesmeric or hypnotic methods. Braid, Trance, p. 31.

Mesmeric lucidity, clairvoyance.

We are especially anxious to witness cases of what is termed mesmeric lucidity or clairvoyance. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, April, 1883, p. vi.

Mesmeric promise. See the quotation.

Some of the cases adduced—as of the so-called mesmeric promise, or impression made on the brain in the mesmeric state, which irresistibly works itself out in the subsequent normal condition—present a singular conformity to some of the best physiological speculations on the mechanism of memory. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 288.

mesmerical (mez-mer'ik-al), a. [mesmeric + -al.] Same as mesmeric.

mesmerically (mez-mer'ik-al-i), adv. In a mesmeric way; in the manner of or according to Mesmer or mesmerism; by mesmeric means.

mesmerisation, mesmerise, etc. See mesmerization, etc.

mesmerism (mez'mēr-izm), n. [F. mesmérisme (Sp. Pg. It. mesmerismo); so called from Friedrich Anton (or Franz) Mesmer (1733–1815), a German physician, who propounded the theory in 1778, in Paris.] 1. The doctrine that one person can exercise influence over the will and nervous system of another, and produce certain phenomena by virtue of a supposed emanation, called animal magnetism, proceeding from him, or simply by the domination of his will over that of the person operated on. Originally Mesmer professed to produce his results by the operation of actual magnets, but all such apparatus has long been abandoned, and those who profess belief in magnetism as the cause of the phenomena exhibited refer it to the body of the mesmerist. The actual phenomena believed to be produced by this so-called animal magnetism are now explained by modern hypnotism, or artificial somnambulism, which within recent years has been the subject of extended research. It is now generally admitted that there is no force of any kind transmitted from the operator to the person operated upon, and many of the pretensions of mesmerism, such as clairvoyance, are rejected. The term mesmerism is still popularly used, often more or less synonymously with hypnotism, but more frequently in its original or an allied sense. Other terms used more or less synonymously with either mesmerism or hypnotism are braidism (after the English surgeon Braid, who first studied the phenomena of mesmerism scientifically) and neurohypnotology.

By one of my usual processes for reducing the cataleptic state of muscles during hypnotism or mesmerism, I was enabled, in a few seconds, to unlock her jaws and open her mouth. Braid, Trance, p. 50.

2. The influence itself; animal magnetism.

mesmerist (mez'mēr-ist), n. [mesmer(ize) + -ist.] One who practises mesmerism.

The extravagance of the mesmerists, who have contended for the reality of clairvoyance in some of their patients. Braid, Trance, p. 36.

mesmerization (mez'mēr-i-zā'shon), n. [mesmerize + -ation.] The act of mesmerizing, or the state of being mesmerized. Also spelled mesmerisation.

mesmerize (mez'mēr-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mesmerized, ppr. mesmerizing. [mesmer(ism) + -ize.] To practise mesmerism upon; bring into a mesmeric state; hypnotize. Also spelled mesmerise.

The rigidity of the mesmerized fingers could be tested with, if possible, even more certainty than their insensibility, by simply telling the "subject," after a minute of mesmerisation, to close his or her fist. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 259.

mesmerizer (mez'mēr-i-zēr), n. One who mesmerizes; a mesmerist. Also spelled mesmeriser.
mesmeromania (mez'mēr-ō-mā'ni-ā), n. [mesmer(ism) + mania.] Mesmerism regarded as a mania or delusion.

"The mesmero-mania," says one doctor in the Medico-Chirurgical Review, "has nearly dwindled in the metropolis into anle fatuity." Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 412, note.

mesmeromaniac (mez'mēr-ō-mā'ni-ak), n. [mesmeromania + -ac, after maniac.] A person affected with mesmeromania.

mesnality (mē-nal'i-ti), n. Same as mesnalty.

mesnalty (mē-nal-ti), n. [mesne + -al + -ty. Cf. mesnality.] The manor or estate of a mesne lord.

And the consequence of construing it otherwise would be dangerous to create a mesnalty. But this mesnalty doth not extinct the Lord's tenura, but he may still charge the lands for it, albeit not the person of the tenant. Welch and Wale, 3 Keble, 554.

mesne (mēn), a. [An archaic spelling of mean (ME. mene, < OF. mesne, etc.), retained in law use.] In law, middle; intervening; intermediate. A mesne lord was a feudal lord who held land of a superior, but had granted a part of it to another person. Thus, he was a tenant to the superior, but lord or superior to the second grantee, and thus his mesne or mediate lord.

They sank from the rank of tenants-in-chief to the rank of mesne tenants. E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, IV. 28.

Mesne conveyance. See conveyance.—Mesne encumbrances, encumbrances the right of priority of which is intermediate to the dates of two other encumbrances or titles under consideration.—Mesne process, any process in a suit which intervenes between the original process of writ and the final execution.—Mesne profits, the profits of an estate which accrue to a tenant in possession intermediate between two dates, particularly the commencement and the termination of a possession held without right.

mesoarial (mes-ō-ā'ri-al), a. [mesoarium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoarium. Encyc. Brit., XII. 660.

mesoarium (mes-ō-ā'ri-um), n.; pl. mesoaria (-ē). [NL., < Gr. μέσος + αἰσίων, dim. of σῶν, egg. Cf. mesovarium.] A fold of the peritoneum forming the mesentery of the ovary or genital gland of some animals, as fishes; a mesovarium.

The genital glands . . . overlie the kidneys, . . . each being suspended by a fold of mesentery (mesoarium). Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 58.

mesoblast (mes-ō-blāst), n. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + βλαστός, a germ.] The middle one of the three germinal layers of any metazoic embryo, between the epiblast and the hypoblast; the mesoderm. It corresponds to the vascular layer of an earlier nomenclature, when the other two layers were called serous and mucous. By far the greater part of the body of a metazoic animal is derived from the mesoblast.

mesoblastema (mes-ō-blāst-ē-mā), n.; pl. mesoblastemata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + βλαστήμα, a shoot, a sprout: see blastema.] The mass or layer of cells which constitutes the mesoblast; the mesoderm in its early germination.

mesoblastemic (mes-ō-blāst-ēm'ik), a. [mesoblastema + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesoblastema: as, mesoblastemic cells or tissue.

mesoblastic (mes-ō-blāst'ik), a. [mesoblast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesoblast: as, a mesoblastic cell; the mesoblastic layer.

mesobranchial (mes-ō-brang'ki-al), a. [Gr. μέσος, middle, + βράγχια, gills: see branchial.] Overlying the middle of the branchial chambers: applied specifically to a median subdivision of the branchial region of the carapace of a crab, called the mesobranchial lobe. See cut under Brachyura.

mesocæcal (mes-ō-sē'kal), a. [mesocæcum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesocæcum.

mesocæcum (mes-ō-sē'kum), n.; pl. mesocæca (-kā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. cæcum, q. v.] The mesentery of the cæcum and vermiform appendage; the special peritoneal fold which sometimes holds those parts in place.

mesocarp (mes-ō-kārp), n. [= F. mesocarpe; < NL. mesocarpium, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., the middle layer of a pericarp when it is possible to distinguish three dissimilar layers; the sarcocarp. It is the fleshy substance or edible part of fruits which lies between the epicarp and the endocarp. See cuts under drupe and endocarp.

Mesocarpacae (mes-ō-kār-pā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesocarpus + -aceae.] One of the three families of algae into which the group Conjugata is divided. The sexual reproduction is by a process of conjugation, which may be either scalariform (that is, between two or several cells of two different filaments) or lateral (that is, between two adjacent cells of the same filament). The result of this conjugation is the production of a globular zygospore, which differs from that produced by the Zygnemataceae in that immediately after its formation it divides into two, three, or more cells, the central one only of which is fertile. Sometimes Mesocarpineae. See Conjugata.

Mesocarpus (mes-ō-kār'pus), n. [NL. (Hassall, 1845), < Gr. μέσος, middle, + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of fresh-water algae, typical of the family Mesocarpaceae. The copulation is scalariform, and the spores are spherical or oval, between two cylindrical, straight, or slightly incurved cells.

mesocephalic (mes-ō-se-fal'ik or -sef'a-lik), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + κεφαλή, head, + -ic.] 1. In craniom., of medium size; neither large nor small; with a capacity of from 1,350 to 1,450 cubic centimeters.

A skull of variable form, mostly mesocephalic.

W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII, 317.

2. Having a skull of medium breadth or capacity.

mesocephalism (mes-ō-sef'a-lizm), n. [< mesocephalic + -ism.] The character or state of being mesocephalic. Also mesocephaly.

Departures from a width of eight and length of ten (mesocephalism), measured from one auricular aperture over the head to the other, and nose root over the head to the nucha, determine whether the skull shall be considered long. Amer. Nat., XXII, 614.

mesocephalon (mes-ō-sef'a-lon), n.; pl. mesocephala (-lā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + κεφαλή, head.] Same as mesencephalon.

mesocephalous (mes-ō-sef'a-lus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + κεφαλή, head, + -ous.] Mesocephalic.

mesocephaly (mes-ō-sef'a-li), n. Same as mesocephalism.

mesochil (mes-ō-kil), n. [< NL. mesochilium, q. v.] Same as mesochilium.

mesochilium (mes-ō-kil'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + χείλος, lip.] The intermediate part of the lip of such orchids as have this organ separated into three distinct parts. Lindley, Treasury of Botany.

mesochorus (me-sok'ō-rōs), n. [< Gr. μεσόχορος, standing in mid-chorus, < μέσος, middle, + χορός, chorus.] Same as coryphæus, 1.

mesocœle (mes-ō-sēl), n. Same as mesocœlia.

mesocœlia (mes-ō-sēl'i-ā), n.; pl. mesocœliæ (-ē). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + κοιλία, a hollow, ventricle: see cœlia.] The ventricle of the mesencephalon; the mesencephalic cavity of the brain, connecting the diacœlia with the epicœlia; the aqueduct of Sylvius. B. G. Wilder.

mesocœlian (mes-ō-sēl'i-an), a. [< mesocœlia + -an.] Of or pertaining to the mesocœlia of the brain.

Mesocœlia tabular; mesocœlian roof quadrilobate.

Amer. Nat., XXI, 914.

mesocolic (mes-ō-kol'ik), a. [< mesocolon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesocolon: as, a mesocolic peritoneal fold; mesocolic attachment.

mesocolon (me-sok'ō-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. μεσόκOLON, less prop. μεσώκOLON, the part of the mesentery next the colon, < μέσος, middle, + κOLON, the colon: see colon.] The mesentery of the colon; the peritoneal fold which holds the colon in place.

mesocoracoid (mes-ō-kor'ā-koid), a. and n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. coracoid.] I. a. Situated between the hypercoracoid and the hypocoracoid.

II. n. An element in the shoulder-girdle of teleost fishes, disintegrated from the coracoid or paragenal cartilage, and intermediate between or bridging over the hypercoracoid and hypocoracoid. It is developed in the malacopterygian and plectrospandylous fishes, but is lost in the acanthopterygians.

mesocuneiform (mes-ō-kū-nē-i-fōrm), n. and a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. cuneiform.] I. n. In anat. and zool., the middle one of the three cuneiform bones of the tarsus, lying between the ectocuneiform and the entocuneiform. It is in special relation with the head of the second metatarsal bone. Also called mesosphenoid.

II. a. Middle, as a cuneiform bone; pertaining to the mesocuneiform.

mesode (mes'ōd), n. [< Gr. μεσώδης, a mesode (see def.), < μέσος, middle, + αἰδέειν, αἰέν, sing, > ᾠδή, a song, ode: see ode.] In anc. pros., a system of metrically different composition intervening between a strophe and its antistrophe. See epode.

mesoderm (mes-ō-dērm), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + δέρμα, skin.] 1. The middle germinal layer of the three-layered embryo of any metazoic animal, lying between the endoderm and the ectoderm. The term is used synonymously with mesoblast, the correlation being endoderm, mesoderm, and ectoderm; hypoblast, mesoblast, and epiblast; or mucous, vascular, and serous layers. Most of the body of every metazoan animal is derived from the mesoderm. When the embryo becomes four-layered, as it usually does, this state results from the splitting of the mesoderm into an inner visceral and an outer parietal layer, called respectively splanchnopleural and somatopleural, or involuntomotory and voluntomotory.

2. In bot., the middle layer of tissue in the shell of the spore-case of an urn-moss.

mesodermal (mes-ō-dēr-mal), a. [< mesoderm + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoderm in plants or animals; having a middle germinal layer.

Mesodermalia (mes-ō-dēr-mā'li-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + δέρμα, skin.] Spongiopora or Porifera regarded as a prime division of the grade Cœlentera, whose archenteron is a branching canal-system communicating with the outer water by a set of inhalent and exhalent pores; the sponges; opposed to Epithelaria, or all other cœlenterates collectively. R. von Lendenfeld.

mesodermalian (mes-ō-dēr-mā'li-an), a. and n. [< Mesodermalia + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Mesodermalia, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Mesodermalia.

mesodermic (mes-ō-dēr'mik), a. [< mesoderm + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a mesoderm or middle germinating layer; mesodermal.

And so form the foundation of the mesodermic investment by which the body cavity of the adult is lined.

A. Sedgwick, Micros. Science, XXVII, 499.

Mesodesma (mes-ō-des'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + δέσμα, a band: see desma.] A genus of wedge-shells of the family Donacidae, or made type of a family Mesodesmidae, having a thick solid trigonal shell with two short stout lateral teeth, and the cartilage internal. Species abound in the Australian region.

Mesodesmidae (mes-ō-des'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesodesma + -idae.] A family of bivalve mollusks, named from the genus Mesodesma. J. E. Gray, 1840.

mesodic (mes-ōd'ik), a. [< mesode + -ic.] In anc. pros., constituting or pertaining to a colon, line, or system of a different length or metrical character interposed between two cola, two sets of uniform lines, or two systems of identical metrical form; especially, constituting, pertaining to, or containing a system of different form intervening between a strophe and its antistrophe. See epodic, palinodic, periodic, prodic.

mesodont (mes-ō-dont), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. In anthropol., having medium-sized teeth: as, the mesodont races. 2. In zool., pertaining to the Mesodonta, or having their characters.

Mesodonta (mes-ō-don'tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A group of extinct mammals of North America, resembling Insectivora, characterized by Cope as a suborder of Bunotheria, having the incisors not growing from persistent pulps, the molars tubercular and never sectorial, the third trochanter apparently elevated, and the astragalus not grooved above. Ten Eocene genera are referred to this group.

mesoduodenal (mes-ō-dū-ō-dē'nal), a. [< mesoduodenum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoduodenum.

mesoduodenum (mes-ō-dū-ō-dē'num), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. duodenum, q. v.] The fold of peritoneum which incloses and supports the duodenum; the duodenal mesentery.

mesogaster (mes-ō-gas'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + γαστήρ, belly.] 1. An intermediate part of the intestine, extending from the pylorus to the cæcum, and including the small intestine with its annexes, as the liver and pancreas, also, in the fetus, the umbilical vesicle. It is commonly called the mid-gut.—2. [cap.] A genus of fossil fishes. Agassiz.

mesogastral (mes-ō-gas'tral), a. [< mesogaster + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesogaster.

mesogastric (mes-ō-gas'trik), a. [< mesogastrium + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the mesogastrium; umbilical, as a region of the abdomen; mesenteric with reference to the stomach or to the mesogaster.—2. In Crustacea, situated in the middle of the gastric lobe of the carapace: specifically applied to a median subdivision of that lobe, the mesogastric lobe. See cut under Brachyura.

mesogastrium (mes-ō-gas'tri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + γαστήρ, belly.] 1. In human anat., the umbilical region of the abdomen, between the epigastrium above and the hypogastrium or epipubic region below. See cut under abdomen.—2. In anat. and zool., the mesenteric of the stomach; the fold of peritoneum which holds the stomach in place. It is a portion of the common intestinal mesentery, in early fetal life indistinguishable therefrom, but afterward variously modified.

mesogenous (me-soj'e-nus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + -γενής, born, produced: see -genous.] Increasing by growth at or from the middle, as the spores of certain fungi. [Rare.]

mesoglaea (mes-ō-glē-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + γλῶσσα, γλῶδι, glue: see glue.] 1. The mesodermal intercellular substance, or ground-substance, of some animals, as sponges and other cœlenterates. R. von Lendenfeld, Proc. Zool. Soc., London, 1886, p. 566.—2. [cap.] A genus of gelatinous seaweeds, typical of the Mesoglaeaceae, with olive-brown branching filiform fronds. The unilocular sporangia are oval in shape and borne at the base of peripheral filaments; the plurilocular sporangia are unknown. Agardh, 1817.

Mesoglaeaceae (mes-ō-glē-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Kuetzing, 1843), < Mesoglaea + -aceae.] A family of olive-green seaweeds with a gelatinous or cartilaginous thallus of hemispherical or cylindrical outline, forming small gelatinous or slimy cushions or branching tufts on other larger seaweeds: the same or nearly the same as the Chordarieae or Chordariaceae of Harvey. See Chordarieae.

mesoglossal (mes-ō-glō'sal), a. [< mesoglossa + -al.] Consisting of, pertaining to, or resembling mesoglossa.

mesoglutæus (mes-ō-glō-tē'us), n.; pl. mesoglutæi (-ī). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. glutæus, q. v.] The middle gluteal muscle; the glutæus medius.

mesoglutæal (mes-ō-glō-tē'al), a. [< mesoglutæus + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoglutæus.

mesognathic (mes-og-nath'ik), a. Same as mesognathous.

mesognathous (me-sog'nā-thus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + γνάθος, jaw.] 1. Having a moderate or intermediate gnathic index of from 98 to 103, as a skull.—2. Having a skull thus characterized, as a person.

mesognathy (me-sog'nā-thi), n. [As mesognathous + -y.] That character of a skull or person in which the jaws are moderately prominent anteriorly, indicated by a gnathic index of from 98 to 103.

Mesochippus (mes-ō-hip'us), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἵππος, a horse.] A genus of very small three-toed horses, of the family Equidae, founded by Marsh in 1875 upon remains from the early Miocene of North America. The animal was only about as large as a sheep, with three functional digits on each foot, and an additional splint-bone on each of the fore feet.

mesolabe (mes-ō-lāb), n. [< L. mesolabium, < Gr. *μεσολάβιον, prop. μεσόλαβον, μεσόλαβος, an instrument invented by Eratosthenes for finding mean proportional lines, < μέσος, middle, mean (neut. pl. μέσα, mean terms), + λαμβάνειν, √ λαβ, take. Cf. astrolabe.] A mechanical contrivance for geometrically extracting the roots of quantities. It consists of a number of equal rectangles, each having a diagonal marked, and all capable of sliding along a line common to the bases of all, so that they partially overlap one another. The marked diagonals are all parallel. To use the instrument, all the intersections, each formed of the diagonal of one rectangle and the overlapping edge of the next one, are brought, by the sliding along of the rectangles, into one straight line with one extremity of the diagonal of the uppermost rectangle and a point on the exposed edge of the lowermost whose distance from the extremity of the diagonal on the same edge measures the quantity whose root is to be extracted. Then the corresponding distance on the uppermost rectangle is the root multiplied by that of the common altitude of the rectangles, which last is supposed to be known. The exponent of the root is equal to the number of rectangles employed. The mesolabe was invented by Eratosthenes, about 200 to 250 years before Christ.

mesole (mes'ōl), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle (?).] See thomsonite.

mesolite (mes'ō-lit), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + λίθος, stone.] A zeolitic mineral resembling scapolite, but containing both calcium and sodium.

mesolobar (mes'ō-lō-bār), a. [< mesolobe + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the mesolobe; callosal: as, mesolobar arteries. [Rare.]

mesolobe (mes'ō-lōb), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + λοβός, lobe: see lobe.] The callosum or corpus callosum of the brain; the great commissure of the cerebral hemispheres. [Rare or obsolete.]

mesologarithm (mes'ō-log'ā-rī-thm), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. logarithm.] A logarithm of the cosine or cotangent. Kepler.

mesological (mes'ō-lōj'i-kal), a. [< mesology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mesology; relating to the medium in which an organism exists.

Grapes contain the mineral salts in variable quantity, the proportion depending on the variety of grape and on mesological conditions.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III. 882.

mesology (mes'ō-lōj'i), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + λογία, λόγος, speak: see -ology.] The sum of human knowledge concerning the relations of an organism to its environment.

mesomeristem (mes'ō-mer'is-tem), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. meristem.] The innermost of the two layers into which the exomeristem is divided. The exomeristem is the thickening-ring which surrounds the axial strand (primary pith of Sano) or pith-cylinder of the nascent shoot or branches of plants. It is divided into two layers, the mesomeristem, which gives rise to the vascular bundles, and the perimeristem, which gives rise to the external cortex and the dermatogen.

mesometric (mes'ō-met'rik), a. [< mesometry + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a mesometry or mesometrium: as, mesometric folds of peritoneum.

mesometritis (mes'ō-mē-trī'tis), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + μήτρα, the womb, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the middle or muscular coat of the uterus. Compare metritis.

mesometrium (mes'ō-mē'tri-um), n.; pl. mesometria (-iā). Same as mesometry.

mesometry (mes'ō-mē-trī), n.; pl. mesometries (-triz). [< NL. mesometrium, < Gr. μέσος, middle, intermediate, + μήτρα, the womb: see matriz.] The mesentery of the womb or its annexes; a peritoneal fold, holding in place the uterus or an oviduct. The broad ligament of the human uterus is a mesometry. Corresponding duplications of peritoneum acquire special characters in different cases.

It (the oviduct of a bird) is supported by peritoneal folds forming a mesometry, like the mesentery of the intestines.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 221.

Mesomphalia (mes-om-fā'li-ā), n. [NL. (Hope, 1838), < Gr. μέσος, middle, + μφαλός, the navel.] A genus of beetles of the family Chrysomelidae. They are almost exclusively South American, there being over 200 such species, as against one in North America. M. conspersa is a South American species with peaked elytra, of a blackish-green color punctured with velvety black spots, and burnished with six larger golden-haired spots.

Mesomyodi (mes'ō-mī-ō'dī), n. pl. [< NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + μύς, muscle, + ᾠδή, song.] A suborder or other prime division of Passeres, in which the syrinx is mesomyodian; non-melodious or songless passerine birds: distinguished from Acromyodi.

mesomyodian (mes'ō-mī-ō'dī-an), a. [As Mesomyodi + -ian.] Having the intrinsic syringeal muscles attached to the middle part of the upper bronchial rings.

Syrinx with less than four distinct pairs of intrinsic muscles inserted at the middle of the upper bronchial half-ring, representing the mesomyodian type of voiceorgan.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 427.

mesomyodous (mes'ō-mī-ō'dus), a. [As Mesomyodi + -ous.] Same as mesomyodian.

meson (mes'on), n. [< Gr. μέσος, the middle, neut. of μέσος = L. medius, middle: see medium, mid.] 1. The median plane which divides a body into two equal and symmetrical parts; the vertical longitudinal middle plane, dividing the body into right and left halves. Every median line lies in the meson. The dorsal border of the meson is called the dorsomeson; the ventral, ventrimeson. Also mesium. See median, a.

The meson, mesal, or median plane is an imaginary longitudinal plane extending from the dorsal surface of the body to the ventral surface, and dividing the body into right and left symmetrical halves.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 536.

2. See tetrachord.

mesondeut, mesondieut, n. See mesondue.

mesonephric (mes'ō-nef'rik), a. [< mesonephron + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesonephron.

The mesonephric tubules extend gradually from behind forwards till they come in contact with the pronephros.

Microsc. Science, XXIX. 185.

mesonephron (mes'ō-nef'ron), n.; pl. mesonephra (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + νεφρός, kidney: see nephritis.] The Wolffian body proper; the central or intermediate part of the segmental organs or primitive renal organs of the embryo, between the pronephron and the metanephron, whose duct is the Wolffian duct: distinguished from pronephron and metanephron.

mesonephros (mes'ō-nef'ros), n.; pl. mesonephroi (-roi). [NL.: see mesonephron.] Same as mesonephron. Gray, Anat. (ed. 1887), p. 133.

mesonotal (mes'ō-nō'tal), a. [< mesonotum + -al.] Situated on the mesonotum; of or pertaining to the mesonotum.

mesonotum (mes'ō-nō'tum), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + νῶτος, the back.] The middle one of the three divisions of the notum of an insect, succeeding the pronotum and preceding the metanotum; the dorsal division of the mesothorax; the upper part of the middle thoracic segment. It consists typically of four sclerites, called praescutum, scutum, scutellum, and postscutellum, which may or may not be distinguishable by means of sutures between them. In Hymenoptera, Lepidoptera, and Diptera it is very large, forming the principal part of the upper surface of the thorax: in these insects its divisions are usually named without the prefix meso-. In insects having wing-covers the mesonotum is generally concealed by them, except a piece called the scutellum, which may be very small, as in most Coleoptera, or large, as in many Hemiptera.

Mesonychidae (mes'ō-nīk'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesonyx + -idae.] A family of mammals having as type the genus Mesonyx.

Mesonyx (mes'ō-nīks), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ονύξ (ὄνυξ-), nail: see onyx.] A genus of fossil carnivorous mammals, based by Cope in 1873 upon remains from the Eocene beds of Wyoming. It represents a generalized type supposed by Cope to have some relationship with existing seals. The animal had flat blunt claws and a long slender tail.

mesoparapteral (mes'ō-pa-rap'te-ral), a. [< mesoparapteron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoparapteron.

mesoparapteron (mes'ō-pa-rap'te-ron), n.; pl. mesoparaptera (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. parapteron: see parapteron.] The parapteron of the mesothoracic segment; the third sclerite of the mesopleuron.

mesophlebitis (mes'ō-flē-bī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φλέψ (φλεβ-), a vein, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the middle coat of a vein.

mesophloeum (mes'ō-flē-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φλοῦς, bark.] In bot., the middle or green layer of bark.

mesophragm (mes'ō-fram), n. [NL.: see mesophragma.] Same as mesophragma.

mesophragma (mes'ō-frag'mā), n.; pl. mesophragmata (-mā-tā). [< NL. mesophragma, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φράγμα, partition: see diaphragm.] 1. In entom., a transverse internal partition, descending from the anterior border of the metathorax above, between the mesothorax and the metathorax, and serving for the attachment of muscles. It probably corresponds to the metapraescutum; it is often absent.—2. In Crustacea, that process of an endosternite (or intersternal apodeme) which is directed inward to unite with its fellow and form an arch over the sternal canal. See sternal canal, under sternal.

mesophragmal (mes'ō-frag'mal), a. [< mesophragm + -al.] Pertaining to the mesophragm.

mesophyl, mesophyll (mes'ō-fil), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φύλλον, a leaf.] The parenchymatous tissue which lies between the epidermal layers of a flat leaf-lamina; the soft inner tissue of leaves.

mesophyllum (mes'ō-fil'um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φύλλον, leaf.] Same as mesophyl.

mesophytum (mes'ō-fī-tum), n.; pl. mesophyta (-tā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φυτόν, a plant.] In bot., the line of demarcation between the internode and the petiole. Lindley.

mesopic (mes'ō-pīk), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὤψ (ὥπ-) face.] Having a nasomalar index of from 107.5 to 110, as the negroid races; having small and moderately retreating malar bones: as, a mesopic face.

mesoplast (mes'ō-plast), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + πλαστός, verbal adj. of πλάσσειν, form, mold.] Nuclear protoplasm; endoplast; a cell-nucleus.

mesoplastic (mes'ō-plas'tik), a. [< mesoplast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mesoplast.

mesoplastral (mes'ō-plas'tral), a. [< mesoplastron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoplastron.

In the Pleurodora the first two families are distinguished from one another by the presence or absence of a mesoplastral bone.

Nature, XL. 7.

mesoplastron (mes'ō-plas'tron), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. plastron.] A median and anterior bone or plate of the plastron developed in certain of the pleurodorous tortoises.

mesopleural (mes'ō-plō'rāl), a. [< mesopleuron + -al.] In entom., intermediate and lateral, as a part of the mesothorax; of or pertaining to the mesopleuron.

mesopleuron (mes'ō-plō'rōn), n.; pl. mesopleura (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + πλευρά, a rib: see pleura.] The lateral or pleural part of the mesothorax of an insect; a mesothoracic pleuron, following the propleuron and preceding the metapleuron. Each mesopleuron, right and left, is divided into three sclerites—an episternum, an epimeron, and a parapteron.

Mesopiodon (mes'ō-pīō-dōn), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + πῖος, arms, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of cetaceans: same as Ziphius.

mesopiodont (mes'ō-pīō-dōnt), a. [< Mesopiodon + -ont.] Armed with a tooth in the middle of each side of the lower jaw: said specifically of whales of the genus Mesopiodon.

mesopodia, n. Plural of mesopodium.

mesopodial (mes'ō-pō'di-āl), a. and n. [< mesopodium + -al.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the mesopodium of a mollusk.—2. Of or pertaining to the mesopodialia.

II. n. A mesopodial bone; one of the mesopodialia.

mesopodialia (mes'ō-pō'di-ā'li-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Marsh, 1880): see mesopodium.] The bones of the carpus and tarsus, taken together, as mutually corresponding, and as forming morphological segments of the limbs intervening between the epipodialia and the metapodialia. See epipodialia.

mesopodium (mes'ō-pō'di-um), n.; pl. mesopodia (-iā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] The middle one of the three parts into which the foot of some mollusks, as gastropods and pteropods, may be divided, between the propodium and the metapodium. See epipodium.

mesopostscutellar (mes'ō-post-skū'te-lār), a. [< mesopostscutellum + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the mesopostscutellum.

mesopostscutellum (mes'ō-post-skū'tel'um), n.; pl. mesopostscutella (-iā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. postscutellum, q. v.] The postscutellum of the mesonotum; the postscutellar sclerite of the mesothorax.

Mesopotamian (mes'ō-pō-tā'mi-an), a. [< Mesopotamia, < Gr. Μεσποταμία, Mesopotamia (see def.), lit. 'the land between the rivers,' < μέσος, middle, + ποταμός, river.] Pertaining to Mesopotamia, the region between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates in Asia, north of Babylonia. The name is sometimes extended to include Babylonia also.—Mesopotamian art, a convenient general name including the kindred arts of ancient Chaldaea, Babylonia, and Assyria—though these arts were not definitely limited to Mesopotamia proper. They constitute together one of the chief divisions of art development, and exerted an important influence upon Greek art, and hence upon succeeding arts for all time. See Assyrian, Babylonian, and Chaldean.

mesopraescutal (mes'ō-prē-skū'tal), a. [< mesopraescutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesopraescutum.

mesopraescutum (mes'ō-prē-skū'tum), n.; pl. mesopraescuta (-tā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. praescutum, q. v.] The praescutum of the mesothoracic segment of an insect.

mesoprosopic (mes'ō-prō-sop'ik), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + πρόσωπον, face.] In craniom., intermediate between chamæprosopic and lepto-rosopic—that is, with a face of moderate width; with a facial index of about 90.

mesopsyche (mes'ō-pī'kē), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + ψυχή, spirit.] Haeckel's name for the midbrain or mesencephalon.

mesopterygial (mes'ō-pē-rij'i-āl), a. [< mesopterygium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesopterygium.

mesopterygium (mes'ō-pē-rij'i-um), n.; pl. mesopterygia (-iā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, +

NL. pterygium.] The middle one of several basal cartilages which the pterygium of a fish, as an elasmobranch, may present, between the propterygium and the metapterygium. See pterygium.

mesopterygoid (mes-op-ter'i-goid), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. pterygoid, q. v.] That part of the pterygium which in birds articulates with the palatal bone or with the basipterygoid process of the sphenoid, or with both.

mesopycni (mes-ō-pik'ni), n. pl. [ML., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + πυκνός, a small interval in music, neut. of πυκνός, close.] In medieval music, modes based upon a tetrachord having its half-step in the middle.

mesorchial (mes-ōr'ki-āl), a. [< mesorchium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesorchium.

mesorchium (mes-ōr'ki-um), n.; pl. mesorchia (-i-ā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὄρχις, a testicle.] In anat., the fold of peritoneum supporting the testis while in the abdomen, or as it descends into the scrotal sac.

mesorectal (mes-ō-rek'tal), a. [< mesorectum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesorectum.

mesorectum (mes-ō-rek'tum), n.; pl. mesorecta (-tā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. rectum, q. v.] The mesentery of the rectum; the fold of peritoneum which is reflected over part of the rectum, holding this gut in place.

mesoretina (mes-ō-ret'i-nā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. retina, q. v.] The middle stratum, or mosaic layer, of the retina, composed of the rod and cone and nuclear layers. J. Leidy, Anat., 1889.

mesorhinal (mes-ō-rī'nāl), a. [< mesorhine + -al.] Internasal; internarial; situated between the nostrils: said specifically of the mesorhinium.

mesorhine (mes-ō-rin), a. [Properly mesorrhine (cf. Gr. μεσέρρινος, having a middling nose), < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ῥίς (rhis), nose.] Having an index ranging from 48 to 53: applied to the nose, or to a person having such a nose.

Nose small, mesorhine or leptorhine. W. H. Flower.

mesorhinian (mes-ō-rin'i-an), a. [< mesorhine + -ian.] Same as mesorhine. Nature, XXXV. 357.

mesorhinium (mes-ō-rin'i-um), n.; pl. mesorhinia (-i-ā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ῥίς (rhis), the nose.] In ornith., the part of a bird's beak which is situated between the external nostrils; the basal or internarial part of the culmen. In some birds it runs up on the forehead, magnified or otherwise diversified, giving rise to the frontal shield or casque. See cuts at antice and shield.

mesoscapula (mes-ō-skap'ū-lā), n.; pl. mesoscapulae (-lā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. scapula, q. v.] The spine of the scapula, considered as a median element of that bone. W. K. Parker. — Delta mesoscapulae. See delta.

mesoscapular (mes-ō-skap'ū-lār), a. [< mesoscapula + -ar.] Of or relating to the mesoscapula.

At the scapular extremity of the clavicle there is often a piece of cartilage, considered to be segmented off from the end of the mesoscapula, and hence called mesoscapular segment. W. H. Flower.

mesoscuta, n. Plural of mesoscutum.

mesoscutal (mes-ō-skū'tal), a. [< mesoscutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoscutum.

mesoscutellar (mes-ō-skū'te-lār), a. Of or pertaining to the mesoscutellum.

mesoscutellum (mes-ō-skū'tel'um), n.; pl. mesoscutella (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. scutellum, q. v.] In entom., the scutellum of the mesonotum; the scutellar sclerite of the mesothorax.

mesoscutum (mes-ō-skū'tum), n.; pl. mesoscuta (-tā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. scutum, q. v.] In entom., the scutum of the mesonotum; the scutal sclerite of the mesothorax.

mesoseme (mes-ō-sēm), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + σημα, a sign, mark, token.] In craniom., having an orbital index between 84 and 89.

Mesosemia (mes-ō-sē'mi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + σημα, a sign, mark, token.] A genus of South American butterflies of the family Erycinidae. It contains many brown or blue species, striped with black, and usually having a large round black spot in the middle of the fore wing.

mesosiderite (mes-ō-sid'e-rit), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + σίδηρος, of iron: see siderite.] A name given by G. Rose (1864) to one of three subdivisions made by him in the classification of meteoric irons, these divisions being founded on the comparative amount of iron and stony matter present. As defined by Brezina, in one of the most recent systematic classifications of the meteorites, mesosiderite is a network of iron inclosing olivin and bronzite with more or less plagioclase, these minerals having so coarsely crystalline a texture that the characteristic structure is obscured. It forms a passage from the iron to the chondrites. The meteorite which fell at Estherville, Iowa, in 1879 is of this class. See meteorite.

mesosigmoid (mes-ō-sig'moid), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. sigmoid.] The mesentery of the sigmoid flexure of the intestine, between the mesocolon and the mesorectum.

mesosoma (mes-ō-sō'mā), n.; pl. mesosomata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + σῶμα, the body.] In lamellibranchiate mollusks, a middle region of the body, which gives rise to the foot and is situated between the prosoma and the metasoma.

mesosomatic (mes'ō-sō-mat'ik), a. [< mesosoma + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesosoma of a mollusk.

mesosperm (mes-ō-spērm), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., a membrane of a seed; the secundine, or second membrane from the surface.

mesospore (mes'ō-spōr), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + σπόρος, seed.] The middle coat or layer of a spore when it is possible to distinguish three layers, as in the spores of Onoclea Struthiopteris.

mesosporic (mes-ō-spō'rik), a. [< mesospore + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesospore.

mesostaphyline (mes-ō-staf'i-lin), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + σταφυλή, the uvula.] In craniom., intermediate between leptostaphyline and brachystaphyline—that is, with a palate of median width; having a palatal index of from 80 to 85.

mesostate (mes'ō-stāt), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. state.] In biol., an intermediate substance or product in a series of metabolic changes.

We are thus led to the conception that the specific material of a secretion, such as the trypsin of pancreatic juice, comes from the protoplasm of the cell, through a number of intermediate substances, or mesostates as they are called. M. Foster, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 19.

mesosterna, n. Plural of mesosternal.

mesosternal (mes-ō-stēr'nāl), a. [< mesosternum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesosternum: as, a mesosternal sternite.

mesosternerber (mes-ō-stēr'ne-bēr), n. [< NL. mesosternebra, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. sternebra, sternber: see sternber.] Any one of the intermediate sternbers or pieces of the breast-bone which intervene between the manubrium of the sternum and the xiphoid or ensiform appendage. There are usually several such bones in mammals and various reptiles, as the four composing the gladiolus in man.

mesosternebra (mes-ō-stēr'ne-brē), n.; pl. mesosternebrae (-brē). [NL.] Same as mesosternerber.

mesosternal (mes-ō-stēr'ne-brāl), a. [< mesosternerber + -al.] Pertaining to a mesosternerber.

mesosternum (mes-ō-stēr'num), n.; pl. mesosterna (-nā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. sternum, q. v.] 1. In anat., the piece or pieces of a breast-bone which has several segments lying between the presternum and the xiphisternum: said chiefly of the segmented sternum of mammals.

In man it is the gladiolus or body of the sternum proper, as distinguished from the manubrium and the xiphoid cartilage. 2. In entom., the ventral or sternal sclerite of the mesothorax; the under side of the mesothorax, opposite the mesonotum.

mesostethium (mes-ō-stē'thi-um), n.; pl. mesostethia (-i-ā). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + στήθος, the breast.] In entom., the metasternum, or large piece between the bases of the middle and the posterior legs. It is conspicuous in beetles. Kirby.

mesostylous (mes-ō-stī'lus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + στυλος, a pillar: see style.] Same as mid-styled. See heterostylism.

Mesosuchia (mes-ō-sū'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + σούχος, a crocodile (a local name in Egypt).] A division of crocodiles having amphicealous vertebrae: contrasted with Eusuchia and Parasuchia.

mesosuchian (mes-ō-sū'ki-an), a. [< Mesosuchia + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Mesosuchia.

Crocodylians have developed into the Mesosuchian type. Günther, Encyc. Brit., XX. 465.

mesosuchious (mes-ō-sū'ki-us), a. [< Mesosuchia + -ous.] Same as mesosuchian.

mesotarsus (mes-ō-tār'sus), n.; pl. mesotarsi (-sī). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. tarsus, q. v.] In entom., the whole tarsus of the second or middle leg of a six-footed insect, coming between the metatarsus of the hind leg and the protarsus of the fore leg.

mesothelial (mes-ō-thē'li-āl), a. [< mesothelium + -al.] Of or pertaining to mesothelium.

mesothelium (mes-ō-thē'li-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. (epi)thelium, q. v.] The epithelium lining the entire primitive coelom or body-cavity of the embryo; the coelarium.

Mesotheriidae (mes'ō-thē-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesotherium + -idae.] A family of extinct quadrupeds from the Pliocene of South America, representing a very generalized type, allied on the one hand to the rodents and by some made a suborder, Hebetidentati, of Rodentia, by others referred to the Subungulata or polydaetyl ungulates. There are clavicles, as in no other known ungulates, and four lower incisors, as in no known rodents; the mandibular condyle is transverse, and the maxillaries articulate with the nasals. There are in each upper half-jaw 1 incisor, no canines, 2 premolars, and 3 molars, and in each lower half-jaw 2 incisors, no canines, 1 premolar, and 3 molars—in all, 24 teeth.

Mesotherium (mes-ō-thē'ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil rodent-like ungulate quadrupeds, typical of the family Mesotheriidae, upon which is based the prime division Hebetidentati. M. cristatum is the type species. Typotherium is a synonym.

mesotherm (mes'ō-thērm), n. [= F. mésotherme, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + θερμός, hot, θερμή, heat.] In Alphonse de Candolle's classification of plants with regard to their geographical distribution, a plant of his third "physiological group." The plants of this group require a moderate degree of heat, from 15° to 20° C. They are very numerous, including most of the plants of the warmer parts of the temperate zones of both hemispheres exclusive of the mountainous districts.

mesothesis (me-soth'e-sis), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + θεσις, a putting, proposition: see thesis.] Middle place; mean. [Rare.]

Imitation is the mesothesis of likeness and difference. Coleridge.

mesothoracic (mes'ō-thō-ras'ik), a. [< mesothorax (-ac-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesothorax of an insect.—Mesothoracic case. Same as mesothoracotheca.

mesothoracotheca (mes-ō-thō'ra-kō-thē'kā), n.; pl. mesothoracothecae (-sē). [NL., < mesothorax (-ac-) + Gr. θήκη, a case.] In entom., the mesothoracic case, or that part of the integument of a pupa covering the mesothorax. In the Lepidoptera and Diptera the other thoracic cases are indistinguishable from this, and it is then called the thoracotheca.

mesothorax (mes-ō-thō'raks), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + θώραξ, chest: see thorax.] In entom., the second or middle one of the three divisions of the thorax, situated between the prothorax and the metathorax, and bearing the second pair of legs and the first pair of wings.

When very large, as in dipterous insects, it is simply called the thorax.

mesotrocha (me-sot'rō-kā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + τροχός, anything round or circular: see trochee.] Ciliated embryos of polychæteous annelids in which one or many bands of cilia encircle the middle of the body. See atrocha, teleotrocha.

mesotrochal (me-sot'rō-kāl), a. [< mesotrocha + -al.] Pertaining to or resembling mesotrocha; mesotrochous.

The actively locomotive embryo of Sipunculus . . . resembles a Rotifer or a mesotrochal annelidan larva. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 217.

mesotrochous (me-sot'rō-kus), a. [As mesotrocha + -ous.] Same as mesotrochal.

mesotympanic (mes'ō-tim-pan'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + τύμπανον, a drum (see tympanum), + -ic.] 1. a. Situated in the Sternum showing ms, mesosternum or gladiolus; ps, presternum or manubrium; xs, xiphisternum, or xiphoid appendage.

Mesothorax, shaded, between prothorax (a) and metathorax (b); c, head; d, two abdominal segments.

midst of the bones forming the tympanic pedicle of a fish; symplectic: correlated in Owen's nomenclature with epitympanic, hypotympanic, and pretympanic.

II. n. The mesotympanic bone, now called the symplectic. See cut under palatoquadrate.

The pterygoid abutting upon the hypotympanic, between this and the epitympanic are the mesotympanic and the pretympanic. Owen, Anat. Vert. (1896), I. 105.

mesotype (mes'ō-tip), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + τύπος, impression, type: see type.] In mineral., a name early given to several minerals of the zeolite group which are now recognized as distinct species. It included natrolite or soda-mesotype, scolecite or lime-mesotype, mesolite or lime-soda mesotype, and also thomsonite.

mesovarian (mes-ō-vā'ri-an), a. [< mesovarium + -an.] Of or pertaining to the mesovarium.

mesovarium (mes-ō-vā'ri-um), n.; pl. mesovaria (-i). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. ovarium, ovary: see ovary. Cf. mesoarium.] The mesentery of the ovary; a fold of peritoneum holding the ovary in place, and representing in the female the mesorchium of the male.

mesoventral (mes-ō-ven'tral), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. ventral.] Median and ventral in position; situated on the ventrimeson.

mesoventrally (mes-ō-ven'tral-i), adv. In a mesoventral position or direction; ventrimesad.

mesoxalate (mē-sok'sā-lāt), n. [< mesoxal(ic) + -ate.] A combination of mesoxalic acid with a base.

mesoxalic (mes-ok-sal'ik), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. oxalic.] Of, pertaining to, or derived from oxalic acid: as, mesoxalic acid, C(OH)₂(CO₂H)₂, a crystalline solid which readily breaks up into carbonic acid and oxalic acid.

Mesozoa (mes-ō-zō'zō), n. pl. [NL., pl. of mesozoön.] A provisional primary division of animals, considered intermediate between the Protozoa and the Metazoa, and based upon the characters of the Dicyemida alone. These animals have no mesoderm, yet develop metazoic embryos by epiboly. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 578.

Mesozoic (mes-ō-zō'ik), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + ζωή, life.] In geol., lying, as a part of the geological series so designated, between the Paleozoic and the Tertiary rocks. It is a synonym of Secondary as that term is employed by geologists. The whole series of fossiliferous rocks is divided into Paleozoic, Mesozoic or Secondary, and Cenozoic or Tertiary. The principal subdivisions of the Mesozoic are the Trias or Triassic, the Jura or Jurassic, and the Cretaceous. (See these terms.) The Mesozoic is distinguished for the great development of the Reptilia, and its period has hence been called the "Age of Reptiles." In the Mesozoic occur the first traces of mammals, of birds, and of fishes with bony skeletons, as well as the first palms and angiosperms.

mesozoön (mes-ō-zō'on), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ζωον, animal.] One of the Mesozoa.

Mespilus (mes'pi-lus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. mespilus, also mespila, mespilum, < Gr. μέσπιλον, medlar-tree, a medlar, μέσπιλη, medlar-tree: see medlar.] A genus of rosaceous plants of the tribe Pomeae, characterized by the bony endocarp of the fruit and the expanded mouth of the leafy calyx. They are shrubs or small trees, which are more or less thorny when wild, and have undivided, nearly sessile leaves, and large white or pinkish flowers, solitary and sessile on short leafy branches. The fruit is nearly globular or pear-shaped, and is crowned by a broad, hairy disk, from which the five bony cells slightly protrude. The genus includes one (or perhaps two) species, found in various parts of Europe and western Asia. M. Germanica is the common medlar, cultivated in many varieties for its fruit. See medlar.

mespriset, n. See misprize.

mesquit¹, n. [Also mesquite, meskit, mesquite, mesquite; < Sp. mesquite, mezquite, < Ar. masjid, a mosque: see mosque and masjid.] A mosque.

The Mesquit (for many of them are Mahometanes) is of bricks. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 461.

This foresaid late prince Ismael lieth buried in a faire Meskit, with a sumptuous sepulchre in the same. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 347.

The very Mahometans . . . have their sepulchres near the Mesquite; never in it. Sp. Hall, Works, V. 414. (Davies.)

mesquit², *mesquite*² (mes'kēt or mes-kēt'), n. [Also mezquite, meskit, etc.; < Sp. mezquite; of Mex. (?) origin.] 1. An important leguminous tree, or often shrub, Prosopis juliflora, growing from Texas to southern California, and thence southward to Chili. It reaches a height of 30 or 40 feet, but is often scrubby, forming dense clumps of chaparral. Under the action of prairie fires it is reduced to a low shrub, developing then an enormous mass of roots, locally known as underground forest, of great value as fuel. The wood is heavy and very hard, almost indestructible in contact with the ground; it is used for the beams and underpinnings of adobe houses, for posts and fencing, for fuel, and for furniture. It is of a brown or red color, handsome when polished, but difficult to work. The bean-like pods, before maturity, become pulpy and exceedingly rich in grape-sugar. They are eaten by the Indians as well as by whites, and furnish a valuable fodder for horses. The shrub also exudes a gum resembling gum arabic, which in Texas and Mexico is collected in considerable quantities for export. Also called honey-mesquit, honey-locust, honey-pod, and July-flower. The Spanish name is algarrobo.

2. Same as mesquit-grass.—Screw-pod mesquit, a tree, Prosopis pubescens, similar to P. juliflora, found from New Mexico to southern California, and in Mexico. Its pods are twisted into spiral cylinders, whence the above name, and that of screw-bean. They are ground into meal and used as food by the Indians, also serving as fodder. The Mexican name is toronilla.

mesquit-bean (mes'kēt-bēn), n. The fruit of the mesquit-tree.

mesquite², n. See *mesquit*².

mesquit-grass (mes'kēt-grās), n. A grass, properly of the genus Bouteloua, growing on the plains east of the Rocky Mountains, and forming a rich wild pasture. B. oligostachya is the most useful species. Buchloe dactyloides, included under the name, is sometimes distinguished as false mesquit. Also called buffalo-grass and grama-grass.

mesquit-gum (mes'kēt-gum), n. See *mesquit*².

mesquit-tree (mes'kēt-trē), n. Same as *mesquit*².

Mesropian (mes-rō'pi-an), a. [< Mesrob (see def.) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to Mesrob or Miesrob (fifth century A. D.), patriarch of Armenia, a reputed founder of Armenian literature, who devised the Armenian alphabet of thirty-six letters, to which after his time two more were added, and the Georgian alphabet of thirty-nine or forty letters, still in use.

In 406 A. D. the Mesropian alphabet was adopted by an edict of the Armenian King.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 271.

mess¹ (mes), n. [< ME. mes, mess, messe, < OF. mes (F. mets—a bad spelling), a portion of food, a dish, a course at table, = It. messio, m., also messia, f., a course at table, < ML. missum (found only as messum, after OF., a portion of land), prop. neut. of L. missus, sent, pp. of mittere, send: see mission. Cf. AS. sand, sond, early ME. sond, a mess, dish, lit. a sending: see send. The word mess (ME. mēs) may have been partly confused in ME. with mēs, mese, a dinner: see mesel.] 1. A supply or provision of anything to be eaten at one meal; a quantity of food sufficient for one or more persons for a single occasion: as, a mess of peas for dinner; a mess of oats for a horse.

And he took and sent messes unto them from before him: but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs. Gen. xlii. 34.

Of herbs, and other country messes, Which the neat-handed Phillis dresses.

Milton, L'Allegro, l. 85.

'Tis only a page that carols unseen, Crumbling your bounds their messes.

Browning, Pippa Passes, ll.

2. In fishing, the amount or number of fish taken; the take or haul of fish.

I got a rare mess of golden and silver and bright cupreous fishes. Thoreau, Walden, p. 338.

3. A number of persons who eat together at the same table; especially, a group of officers or men in the army or navy who regularly take their meals in company.

Also the meyre of London, notable of dignitye, And of Queensborow the meire, no thyng like in degre, At one mess they ought in no wise to sitt ne be. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 192.

With your brode knyfe properly unclose the napkyn that the bread is in, and set the bread all beneath the salt towards the seconde messe.

Leland, Collectanea, Inthronization of Abp. Neville.

That student was in luck who found himself in the same mess with Burke. Contemporary Rev., L. 30.

4. A set of four; any group of four persons or things: originally as a convenient subdivision of a numerous company at dinner, a practice still maintained in the London inns of court.

There lacks a fourth thing to make up the mess.

Latimer, Sermons, v.

You three fools lack'd me fool to make up the mess.

Shak., L. L. L., iv. 3. 207.

Lower mess, those persons who formerly sat at table below the salt. See salt. Nor should there stand any great, cumbersome, uncut-up pies at the nether end [of the table], filled with moss and stones, partly to make a show with, and partly to keep the lower mess from eating.

Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, l. 2.

To lose the number of one's mess. See *lose*¹.

mess¹ (mes), v. [*< mess*¹, n.] I. intrans. To share a mess; eat in company with others or as a member of a mess; take a meal with any other person: as, I will mess with you to-day.

Now that we are in harbour I mess here, because Mrs. Trotter is on board. Marryat, Peter Simple, v.

I told him to bring up the dinner, and we would mess on deck. The Century, XXVI. 944.

II. trans. 1. To supply with a mess: as, to mess cattle.—2. To sort in messes for the table, as meat.

1. A disorderly mixture or jumble of things; a state of dirt and disorder: as, the house was in a mess. [Colloq.]

They make it a rule when they receive neither beer nor money from a house to make as great a mess as possible the next time they come.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 193.

What a mess they made of it! I had no place for the sole of my foot. J. W. Palmer, After his Kind, p. 91.

2. A situation of confusion, disorder, or embarrassment; a muddle: as, to get one's self into a mess.

Neither battle I see, nor arraying, nor king in Israel, Only infinite jumble and mess and dislocation.

Clough, Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich, lx.

mess² (mes), v. t. [*< mess², n.] 1. To make a mess of; disorder, soil, or dirty.*

It messes one's things so to pick them to pieces. C. Roada, Love me Little, l.

2. To muddle; throw into confusion: as, he messes the whole business. [Prov. Eng. and U. S.]

mess³, n. An obsolete form of *mass*¹.—*Mess John*¹, a domestic chaplain; a priest or clergyman: contemptuous or jocular.

I should only stipulate that these new mess Johns in robes and coronets should keep some sort of bounds in the democratic and levelling principles which are expected from their titled pulpits. Burke, Rev. in France.

An' syne Mess John, beyond expression, Fell foul o' me. Burns, To a Tailor.

Syne for Mess John they quickly sent, Wha tied them to their hearts' content, And now she's Lady Gowrie.

The Lass o' Gowrie (modern version).

mess³, interj. Mass. See by the mass, under *mass*¹.

mess⁴, n. An obsolete form of *mace*³.

mess⁴ di voce (mes'sā dē vō'che). [It., lit. a setting of the voice: mess, fem. of messio, pp. of mettere, put, set; dī, of; voce, voice.] In singing, the production of a single tone with a gradual change of force from soft to loud and then back to soft again; a combination of a slow crescendo with a slow diminuendo.

message (mes'āj), n. [< ME. message, massage, < F. message = Pr. messatge = Sp. mensaje = Pg. mensagem, mensagem = It. messaggio, < ML. missaticum (also, after Rom., missagium, messagium), a message, a notice sent, < L. mittere, pp. missus, send: see mission. Cf. missive, of same origin and similar meaning; and *mess*¹, of same origin. Hence messenger, messenger.] 1. A communication transmitted; a notice sent; information or opinion or advice communicated through a messenger or other agency: as, a verbal or written message; a telegraphic message.

And after this, biforn the hye bord

He with a manly vois seith his message.

Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 91.

If case ye be of message sent, know you the same through-out.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 104.

Ehud said, I have a message from God unto thee.

Judges iii. 20.

2. In U. S. politics, an official communication of information, opinion, or advice from a chief executive to a legislative body, or a formal statement of matters requiring legislative consideration or action, sent by the hands of a messenger: as, the President's or governor's message; an annual or a special message (that is, the message regularly presented at the opening of an annual legislative session, or one relating to some special matter subsequently arising).

The change from the address delivered in person, with its answer, to the message sent by the private secretary, and no answer, was introduced by Mr. Jefferson and considered a reform. T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, II. 32.

3†. A company of messengers; an embassy.

That we make vs a message of men of astate, Duly to Delphon devoutly to wende.

4†. A messenger.

Thus sente the kynge his messages thourgh all the londe, and a-noon as thei were fro hym departed.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), III. 574.

messaget (mes'āj), v. t. [< message, n.] To deliver in the manner of a messenger; announce.

He dyd in expressed command to me message his errand.
Stanikurk, Eneid, iv. 877.

messenger, n. A Middle English form of messenger.

messenger, n. [ME., < OF. messengerie, F. messengerie = Pr. messatgaria, messatjaria = Sp. mensajería = It. messengeria: see message and -ry.] The carrying of messages; the going between two persons with a message; procuring.

Fool-hardynesse, and Flaterie, and Desir, Messagerie, and Meede, and other three.

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 228.

Messalian (me-sā'li-an), n. Same as Euchite. Also written Massalian.

messall, n. An obsolete form of missal.

messan, n. and a. See messin.

messandewt, n. See measondue.

messan-dog, n. See messin-dog.

mess-chest (mes'chest), n. Naut., on board a man-of-war, one of the covered chests belonging to each mess of the crew, in which small articles of mess-gear are kept.

A mess-chest is rigged to hold the knives, forks, cans, etc.
P. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 861.

mess-cloth (mes'klōth), n. Naut., in a man-of-war, a tarpaulin spread on deck to serve as a table-cloth.

mess-deck (mes'dek), n. Naut., the deck on which the crew mess.

messe¹, n. A Middle English form of measel.

messe², n. An obsolete form of mass.

messel¹, n. See mesel, meseled.

messel², n. [OF. mesel, < L. mensa, a table: see mensal.] A table.

messelinet, n. See *maslin*².

messelite (mes'el-it), n. [OF. Messel (see def.) + -ite.] A hydrous phosphate of calcium and iron occurring in groups of small tabular crystals in the brown-coal beds near Messel in Hesse.

messenger (mes'en-jēr), n. [ME. messenger, messyngere (with unorig. medial n as also in passenger, porringer, etc.), for messenger, messagier, < OF. messagier, F. messenger (= Pr. messatgier = OSp. messagero, Sp. mensajero = Pg. mensageiro = It. messaggiere, messaggiere), a messenger, < message, a message: see message.] 1. One who bears a message or goes on an errand; the bearer of a verbal or written communication, notice, or invitation; in the civil service, one employed in conveying official despatches.

When men holden Sege abouten Cytee or Castelle, and thei with innen dur not senden out Messagers with Lettres, from Lord to Lord, for to sake Sokour.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 118.

The blay lark, messenger of daye,

Salueth in hire song the morwe graye.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 683.

The messagers departeden two and two togeder, and passed thourgh many londes and contres in to a tyme that filij of hem soodeynly metten to-geder.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), l. 80.

Joy touch'd the messenger of heav'n; he stay'd Entranced.

Pope, Odyssey, v. 97.

2. One who or that which foreruns; a har-binger; a precursor; a forerunner.

The Angel answerde and seyde that sche scholde have no drede of him, for he was verry Message of Jesu Crist.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 138.

Down to short repose they lay,

Till radiant rose the messenger of day.

Pope, Odyssey, xv. 584.

3. A light scudding cloud regarded as the precursor of a storm or gale of wind.

A southwest wind is blowing over the plains. It drives the messengers over the sky, and the sails of the windmill, and makes the dead leaves dance.

Mrs. J. H. Ewing, Jan of the Windmill.

4. Naut., an endless rope or chain turned around the capstan, formerly used to unmoor or heave up a ship's anchors, by transmitting the power of the capstan to the cable. The messenger is gripped to the cable by means of nippers, which are shifted from the capstan to the hawse-hole as the cable is hauled in.

5. In law, a person appointed to perform certain ministerial duties under bankrupt and insolvent laws, such as to take temporary charge of the assets, and to perform some other duties in reference to the proceedings.—6. A piece of stiff paper, or the like, set upon the end of a kite-string held in the hand, to be blown up the string to the kite.—Corbie messenger. See corbie.—Cuckoo's messenger, the wryneck.—Messenger sword, a sword-like implement, constituting a credential of the royal messengers of Ashantee. Two of these were brought to England in 1874; they are partly of gold and partly of iron, and are elaborately ornamented in conventional patterns.—Queen's (or king's) messenger, an officer of the British government, employed under the secretaries of state, appointed or held in readiness to carry official despatches both at home and abroad.—Syn. 1. Carrier, intelligence, courier, herald, emissary.

messenger-at-arms (mes'en-jēr-at-ārmz'), n. In Scots law, an officer appointed by and under the control of the Lyon king-at-arms. He executes all summonses and letters of diligence connected with the Courts of Session and Courts of Justiciary.—Execution by a messenger-at-arms. See execution.

messet, n. [Cf. messin.] A cur; a messin.

mess-gear (mes'gēr), n. Naut., the outfit of a mess, such as pots, pans, cans, spoons, knives, forks, etc.; mess-traps.

Messiah (me-si'ā), n. [= F. Messie = Sp. Mesias = Pg. Messias = It. Messia = D. G. Dan. Sw. Messias, < L. Messias, < Gr. Messias, < Heb. Māshiach, anointed, < māshach, anoint.] A designation of Jesus as the Saviour of the world; the Hebrew equivalent of Christ, the Anointed, but used more frequently as a descriptive title (the Messiah) than as a name: from prophetic passages in the Hebrew Scriptures (where, except in two instances in Daniel, it is translated Anointed, often as a noun) interpreted by Jesus and by Christians as referring to him and universal in scope, but regarded by the Jews as promising a divinely sent deliverer for their own race. This belief in a coming Messiah is still held as a doctrine by many Jews; and at various periods of the Christian era impostors have assumed the name and character, and have had many adherents. The title is also applied figuratively to historical characters who have been great deliverers. Sometimes written, after the Greek of the New Testament, Messias.

We have found Messias, which is, being interpreted, the Christ.

In the High Church of Jerusalem, the Christians were but another Sect of Jews, that did believe the Messias was come.

Selden, Table-Talk, p. 38.

At thy nativity, a glorious quire

Of angels, in the fields of Bethlehem, sung

To shepherds, watching at their folds by night,

And told them the Messiah now was born.

Milton, P. R., l. 245.

Messiahship (me-si'ā-ship), n. [OF. Messiah + -ship.] The character, state, or office of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world: also used of pretenders to a similar office or mission.

Christ . . . gave as strong a proof of his Messiahship as infinite power, joined with equal veracity, could give.

South, Works, III. 382. (Latham.)

One of the chief candidates for the messiahship [among the Mohammedans] has already reached Assuan.

The Century, XXIV. 788.

Messianic (mes-i-an'ik), a. [= F. Messianique = Sp. Mesánico; as Messiah + -an + -ic.] Relating or pertaining to the Messiah, or to any one supposed to exercise the office of a Messiah: as, the Messianic prophecies or psalms; Messianic pretensions.

Messias (me-si'as), n. Same as Messiah.

Messidor (mes-si-dōr'), n. [F., one of the fanciful names concocted to adorn the Revolutionary calendar; < L. messis, harvest, + Gr. δῆρον, a gift.] The tenth month of the year in the calendar of the first French republic, commencing (in 1794) June 19th and ending July 18th.

messin (mes'in), n. and a. [Also messan, formerly irreg. messoun; a var. of mestin, maslin, < OF. maslin, F. maslin, a mastiff: see mastiff.] 1. A mongrel dog; a cur. [Scotch.]

We hounds slew the hair, quoth the messoun.

Ray's Proverbs (1678), p. 394.

But wad hae spent an hour carassin',

E'en wif a tinkler-gypsy's messin.

Burns, The Two Dogs.

II. a. Mongrel; curish. [Scotch.]

messin-dog (mes'in-dog), n. [Also messan-dog; < messin + dog.] Same as messin.

mess-kettle (mes'ket'l), n. A camp-kettle used in cooking for a mess.

The richly chased vessels of gold and silver which served the Roman household have been displaced by the canteen and the mess-kettle of the garrison of the Crescent.

The Century, XXXVIII. 51.

mess-kit (mes'kit), n. The cooking- and table-utensils of a camp, with the chest in which they are kept and transported.

mess-locker (mes'lok'er), n. A small locker on shipboard for holding mess-gear.

messmaking (mes'mā'king), n. The act of clubbing together, or messing in company.

This friendship began by messmaking in the Temple hall.

Roger North, Lord Guilford, l. 62.

messmate (mes'māt), n. 1. An associate in a mess, especially in a ship's mess; one who eats ordinarily at the same table with another.

Messmates, hear a brother sailor

Sing the dangers of the sea.

G. A. Stevens, The Storm.

2. In zool., a commensal.—3. In bot., same as messmate-tree.

messmate-gum (mes'māt-gum), n. See *gum*², 3. messmate-tree (mes'māt-trē), n. One of the stringy-barked eucalypts, Eucalyptus obliqua. It is a large tree forming extensive forests in Australia and Tasmania, and furnishing an abundance of cheap flammable timber for all kinds of rough work above the ground.

mess-table (mes'tā'bl), n. The table at which a mess eat together.

mess-traps (mes'traps), n. pl. The articles which compose a mess-gear.

messuage (mes'wāj), n. [ME. messuage, < OF. messuage, maissage, mesnage (ML. reflex messuagium), < ML. mansuaticum, a dwelling-house, manor-house: see menage, which is a doublet of messuage.] In law: (a) A dwelling-house.

I give unto my said son John all that messuage wherein I now dwell.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 487.

(b) A dwelling-house with the adjacent buildings and curtilage, including garden and orchard, appropriated to the use of the household; a manor-house and its appendages.

There were then greater number of messuages and mansions almost in every place.

Harrison, Descrip. of Eng., xxi.

They wedded her to sixty thousand pounds,

To lands in Kent, and messuages in York.

Tennyson, Edwin Morris.

messy (mes'i), a. [OF. *mess*² + -y.] In a state of mess, confusion, or dirtiness; making a mess; littered or littering; untidy. [Rare.]

The floor of the room[s] . . . in which messy work has to be done is of asphalt.

Science, III. 851.

mest, a. A Middle English form of most.

mestee (mes-tē'), n. [Also mustee; short for mestizo. Cf. OF. mestis, F. métis, mongrel.] The offspring of a white and a quadroon. [West Indian.]

mester¹, n. An obsolete or dialectal form of *master*¹, *mister*¹.

mester², n. A variant of *mister*².

mestful, a. [Var. of mestive, with substituted suffix -ful.] Sad; gloomy. [Rare.]

Among all other birds

Most mestful birds am I:

Among all feathered fowles

I first complain and cry.

Kendall, Flowers of Epigrammes (1577). (Nares.)

mestiff, n. An obsolete variant of mastiff.

mestiver (mes'tiv), a. [OF. mestus, mestus, sad, mournful (< mære, mære, be sad, mourn), + E. -ive. Cf. mestful.] Sad; sorrowful; gloomy; dismal.

The Melancholy's mestive, and too full

Of fearfull thoughts, and cares vnrequist.

Davies, Microcosmos, p. 31. (Davies.)

mestizo (mes-tō'zō), n. [= G. mestizo, < Sp. mestizo = OF. mestis, F. métis, mixed, mongrel: see mastiff.] The offspring of a person of mixed blood; especially, a person of mixed Spanish and American Indian parentage.

To Mexico there is such a great resort, that all the towns thereabout which were formerly of Indians are now inhabited by Spaniards and Mestizos.

S. Clarke, Geographical Description, etc. (1671), p. 261.

He [Mr. Werner] also saw something of Tippoo Tip during the expeditions between the Falls and Bartelot's camp on the Aruwimi; but was not very favourably impressed by that wily mestizo.

The Academy, June 29, 1889, p. 441.

mestling¹, n. See *maslin*¹.

mestling², n. See *maslin*².

mestliont, mestlyont, n. See *maslin*².

mestome (mes'tōm), n. [NL. (Schwendener), appar. < Gr. μειρωμα, fullness, < μερόν, full.] In bot., that part of a fibrovascular bundle whose function is mainly conduction.

To the elements which impart strength to a bundle Schwendener has given the name stereome; to the other parts of the bundle, mesomes.

Goodale, Physiological Botany, p. 191.

Mesua (mes'ū-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), named after Musuah, an Arabian physician of the 8th and 9th centuries.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Guttiferae and the tribe Calophylleae, characterized by an ovary which is two-celled and contains four ovules, and by a shield-shaped stigma. They are shrubs or trees with very narrow leaves and large axillary solitary flowers. Eight species have been enumerated, all from tropical Asia, but the number is probably reducible to three. M. ferrea, one of the ironwoods, is common in the East Indies, wild and cultivated. It is a straight, erect tree with elegant foliage and large four-petaled flowers, pure white and fragrant. They afford a native dye and perfume, and are exported, mostly for the latter purpose, under the name nagkassar. The seeds yield a dark thick oil (nagkassar- or nahor-oil), used in lamps and medicinally. The hard reddish-brown wood is suitable for machinery, railroad-ties, etc.; it is also used for tool-handles and the like.

mesuaget, n. An obsolete form of message.
mesurable, a. A Middle English form of measurable.

mesuret, n. and v. A Middle English form of measure.

mesymnion (me-sim'ni-on), n.; pl. mesymnia (-ē). [NL., < Gr. μεσύνιον (see def.), < μέσος, middle, + ὑμνος, hymn: see hymn.] In anc. pros., a short colon introduced between lines in the midst of a system or stanza, especially in a hymn. See epithymium, methymnion, prothymnion.

met¹ (met). Preterit and past participle of meet¹.
met². An obsolete preterit of mete¹.

met³ (met), n. [See mete¹.] A measure of any kind; a bushel; a barrel. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

meta (mē'tā), n.; pl. metæ (-tē). [L.] In Rom. antiq., a conical column or post, or, usually, a group of three such posts, at each end of the spina of a circus, serving to mark the place of turning; a turning-post.

On the other side of the figure of the queen-goddess is a tall hippodrome meta, enriched with garlands of flowers—probably having reference to the sacred contests at the founding of a new city.

The Academy, June 15, 1889, p. 417.

meta- (met'ā). [L., etc., meta-, < Gr. μετα-, prefix, μετά, poet. μετά, Doric πέρα or πέρα, prep., with gen., in the midst of, among, between, along with; with dat. (poetical), among, with, in, besides; with acc., into the midst of, coming among, after, beyond, according to, etc.; in comp., between, after, over (denoting change, like L. trans-); = Goth. mith = AS. mid, ME. mid, with: see mid².] A prefix in words of Greek origin or formation, meaning 'among, between, with, after, beyond, over,' etc., often denoting change or transformation (like L. trans-), in which denotation it is much used in the formation of new terms in science. In zool. it generally denotes 'after' or 'beyond,' in place or time; 'hind' or 'hinder' of place; 'later,' in time, as if implying changes or transformation which required time to accomplish: generally correlated with pro- or proto- and meso-: as, Protozoa, Mesozoa, Metazoa; prothorax, mesothorax, metathorax; Prothemia and Metathemia; metacarpus and metatarsus (coming next after the carpus and tarsus), etc. In chem.: (a) It is used to form the names of aromatic compounds in which two radicals which replace hydrogen in the benzene ring are conceived of as attached to alternate carbon atoms: distinguished from ortho-, in which the attachment is to adjacent carbon atoms, and from para-, in which the attachment is to opposite carbon atoms. (b) It indicates that an oxygen acid has been formed from the corresponding ortho-acid by the withdrawal of one, two, or three molecules of water, forming mono-meta-, di-meta-, or tri-meta-acids. (c) It is somewhat loosely applied to indicate derivation or close chemical relation, as metachloral, metacetone.

metabasis (me-tab'ā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετάβασις, a passing over, shifting, change, < μετάβαίνω, pass over, < μετά, beyond, + βαίνω, go, pass: see basis.] 1. In rhet., a passing from one thing to another; transition.—2. In med., a change, as in treatment or remedies, or of air, tissue, disease, etc. Also called metabola.

metabatic (met-a-bat'ik), a. [< Gr. μεταβατικός, able to pass from one place to another, exchanging, < μετάβασις, a passing over: see metabasis.] Pertaining to the transfer of energy, especially to the passage of heat from one body to another.—Metabatic function, a function whose identity for two substances expresses the equilibrium of actual energy between them.

metabola¹ (me-tab'ō-lā), n. [NL., < Gr. μεταβολή, change, exchange, < μεταβάλλω, throw round, turn about, change, < μετά, beyond, + βάλλω, throw.] Same as metabasis, 2.

Metabola² (me-tab'ō-lā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl., < Gr. μεταβόλος, changeable.] Insects which undergo complete or entire metamorphosis or transformation, as the Diptera, Lepidoptera, Coleoptera, and Hymenoptera: in contradistinction to the Heterometabola. In some systems the Metabola are regarded as a subclass of Insecta, correlated with Hemimetabola and Ametabola. They are also called Heteromorphia and Holometabola. The three stages of such insects are those of the larva, pupa, and imago. The Metabola are divided by some into the Mandibulata and Hausellata.

Metabolia (met-a-bō'li-ā), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Metabola².

metabolian (met-a-bō'li-an), n. [< Metabola² + -ian.] A metabolic insect; one of the Metabola.

metabolic (met-a-bol'ik), a. [< Gr. μεταβολικός, changeable, < μεταβόλος, changeable, μεταβολή, change: see metabola¹.] 1. In zool.: (a) Undergoing complete metamorphosis, as an insect; of or pertaining to the Metabola. Also metabolous. (b) Changeable in form; assuming different characters; polymorphic: applied by metabolism (me-tab'ō-lizm), n. [As metabol-y + -ism.] 1. In theol., the consensus of views of some of the early fathers in regard to the eucharist, favoring an objective union of the sensible with the supersensible, or the real with the symbolical presence.—2. In poetry, a change from one meter into another.—3. In entom., metamorphosis; transformation; metabolism; transition from larva to pupa, or from pupa to imago.—4. In biol.: (a) The sum of the chemical changes within the body, or within any single cell of the body, by which the protoplasm is either renewed or changed to perform special functions, or else disorganized and prepared for excretion. Thus, the formation of the colorless blood-corpuscles, the elaboration of the digestive ferments, and the breaking up of proteids into urea and other products are examples of metabolism. Compare anabolism, catabolism.

Cohn to the Infusoria.—2. In biol., exhibiting or affected by metabolism: as, metabolic processes; metabolic changes.

To the assemblage of chemical processes, or rather to the assemblage of transformations which a constituent of the organism such as a proteid undergoes in its passage through the body, the term metabolism has been applied.

Ganges, Physiol. Chem., I. 5.

(b) Especially, retrograde metamorphosis; catabolism.

metabolite (me-tab'ō-lit), n. [As metabol-y + -ite².] A product of or substance resulting from metabolism, especially from retrograde metabolism, or catabolism.

If by disease or by artificial removal this metabolism is prevented, the incompletely metabolized pigments circulate in the blood, and staining of skin and mucous membrane, as in Addison's disease, may take place. In the urine of Addison's disease such an imperfect metabolite occurs.

Dr. C. A. MacMunn, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXIX. 251.

metabolize (me-tab'ō-liz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metabolized, ppr. metabolizing. [As metabol-y + -ize.] In biol., to subject to metabolism; transform by either assimilation or decomposition.

Occasionally an omnivore can take in everything, and digest and so metabolize it as to organize it into healthy mental tissue. They are, however, the few.

Science, IX. 264.

metabolous (me-tab'ō-lus), a. [< Gr. μεταβόλος, changeable: see Metabola².] In entom., same as metabolic. Husley, Anat. Invert., p. 366.

metaboly (me-tab'ō-li), n. [< Gr. μεταβολή, later also μεταβόλια, change, exchange: see Metabola¹.] Same as metabolism.

metabranial (met-a-brang'ki-āl), a. [< Gr. μετά, behind, + βράγχια, gills: see branchial.] Situated behind the gills: specifically applied to a posterolateral subdivision of the branchial region of the carapace of a crab, behind and to one side of the mesobranchial division, called the metabranial lobe. See cut under Brachyura.

metabrushite (met-a-brush'it), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. brushite.] In mineral., a calcium phosphate allied to brushite, found in the guano of Sombrero, West Indies.

Metacanthidae (met-a-kan'thi-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Douglas and Scott, 1865), < Metacanthus + -idae.] A family of heteropterous insects, typified by the genus Metacanthus. They have the head long, the crown quadrangular, the sides lobe-like, the first antennal joint clavate, the fourth fusiform, and the corium opaque with large transverse depressions between the strong veins.

Metacanthus (met-a-kan'thus), n. [NL. (Costa, 1848), < Gr. μετά, beyond, + κανθός, the corner of the eye: see canthus, can't¹.] The typical genus of Metacanthidae, containing a few European bugs. They are chiefly characterized by the small triangular vertical face, globose eyes, and large distant ocelli.

metacarpal (met-a-kār'pal), a. and n. [< metacarpus + -al.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the metacarpus or a metacarpal.—Metacarpal saw, a narrow-bladed saw for dividing the metacarpal (or metatarsal) bones.

II. n. One of the bones of the metacarpus. They are not more than five in number, and are reckoned as first, etc., from the radial or thumb side to the other. When reduced in number they always disappear from the sides, so that when but three are left the first and fifth are gone; when there is but one it is the third or middle metacarpal. Two or more may fuse into one bone, as in the metacarpus of a cloven-footed quadruped, as the ox. In recent birds, all of which have three ankylosed metacarpals, the compound bone is further complicated by fusion with it of certain carpal bones, constituting a carpometacarpus, like the tarsometatarsus of the foot.

metacarpale (met'a-kār-pā'le), n.; pl. metacarpalia (-li-ā). [NL.: see metacarpal.] A metacarpal bone; one of the metacarpals.

metacarpophalangeal (met-a-kār'pō-fā-lan'-jē-āl), a. [< metacarpus + phalanges + -al.]

Pertaining to the metacarpus and the phalanges.

metacarpus (met-a-kār'pus), n.; pl. metacarpi (-pī). [NL. (cf. Gr. μετακάρπιον, the part of the hand between the wrist and the fingers), < Gr. μετά, beyond, + καρπός, the wrist.] In anat., the second segment of the manus or terminal division of the fore limb of a vertebrate, considered with reference to its bony structure; the segment which comes between the carpus and the phalanges, corresponding to the metatarsus of the foot. In man the metacarpus corresponds to the part of the hand between the wrist and the fingers or thumb, and has five metacarpal bones. In the horse it is the part of the fore leg between the so-called knee and the fetlock-joint, and has but one functional bone.

metacellulose (met-a-sel'ū-lōs), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. cellulose.] Same as fungus-cellulose.

metacenter, metacentre (met-a-sen'tēr), n. [< F. métacentre, < Gr. μετά, beyond, + κέντρον, center.] The point at which an upward thrust could be equivalent to the pressure of water upon a floating body which has received a slight rotational displacement about one of the principal axes of its section of flotation. The equilibrium is stable or unstable according as the metacenter is above or below the center of gravity. The term is specifically applied to the point where the vertical line passing through the center of buoyancy of a ship, in the position of equilibrium, meets the vertical drawn through the new center of buoyancy when the ship is slightly listed to one side or the other. The term was introduced into hydrostatics by Pierre Bouguer, a French geodesist (1698–1758). Also called center of cavity.

metacentric (met-a-sen'trik), a. [< metacenter + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metacenter.

Generally speaking, decrease in metacentric height is accompanied by a lengthening of the period of an oscillation.

Encyc. Brit., XXI. 813.

metacetone (me-tas'e-tōn), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. acetone.] A substance (C₆H₁₀O) obtained by acting on acetone with sulphuric or hydrochloric acid. It is a colorless liquid having an odor of peppermint. Also called mesityl oxide.

metachemistry (met-a-kem'is-tri), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. chemistry; formed after the analogy of metaphysics.] Transcendental chemistry; the chemistry or analysis of the most obscure or abstruse things, physical or spiritual.

It [the genesis of idealism] seems an affair of race, or of metachemistry; the vital point being, how far the sense of unity, or instinct of seeking resemblances, predominated.

Emerson, Literature.

metachloral (met-a-klō'ral), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. chloral.] A white tasteless solid body, insoluble in water, formed when chloral is kept for some time in contact with strong sulphuric acid. It is a polymerid of chloral. It seems to resemble chloral hydrate in its pharmacodynamic properties.

metachocanite (met-a-kō'ā-nit), a. and n. [< NL. Metachocanites, q. v.] 1. a. Having retrorse septal funnels, as a nautiloid; belonging to the Metachocanites.

II. n. A cephalopod of the group Metachocanites.

Metachocanites (met-a-kō'ā-ni'tēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + χοάνη, a funnel: see choana, choanite.] A group of holochocanoid nautiloid cephalopods whose septal funnels are retrorse: contrasted with Prochocanites. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1883, p. 260.

metachronism (me-tak'rō-nizm), n. [= F. metachronisme; < Gr. μετάχρονος, after the time, < μετά, beyond, + χρόνος, time. Cf. anachronism.] An error committed in chronology by placing an event after its real date.

metachrosis (met-a-krō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μεταχρύνναι, change the color of a thing, < μετά, beyond, + χρύνναι, later form of χρᾶν, tinge, stain (> χρᾶν, a coloring, tinting), < χρῶν, χρᾶ, surface, skin, color.] Color-change, as that of a chameleon.

metacinnabarite (met-a-sin'a-bār-it), n. [< Gr. μετά (see meta-) + E. cinnabar + -ite².] Native mercuric sulphid, crystallizing in tetrahedral crystals, resembling those of the zinc sulphid sphalerite, also occurring massive of a black or grayish-black color. It is found with the red mercuric sulphid cinnabar in California.

metacism (met'a-sizm), n. See myticism.

metacole (met'a-sēl), n. Same as metacolia.

metacolia (met-a-sē'li-ā), n.; pl. metacoliae (-ē). [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + κολία, a hollow (ventricle).] The fourth ventricle of the brain, especially its posterior portion. Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 482.

metacolian (met-a-sē'li-an), a. [< metacolia + -an.] Of or pertaining to the metacolia.

meta-compounds. See meta-.

metacresol (met-a-kre'sol), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. cresol.] A phenol isomeric with cresol.

metacromial (met-a-kro'mi-al), a. [< metacromion + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metacromion: as, a metacromial process of the scapula.

metacromion (met-a-kro'mi-on), n.; pl. metacromia (-i). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + ἀκρόμιον, a by-form of ἀκρωμία, the point of the shoulder- blade: see acromion.) The posterior one of two processes in which the distal end of the spine of the scapula terminates in some mammals, as the shrews and rabbits.

metacyclic (met-a-sik'lik), a. [< Gr. μετά, along with, beyond, + κύκλος, circle: see cyclic.] Relating to a permutation of a number of elements in one cycle.—Metacyclic group. See *group*¹.

metæ, n. Plural of meta.

metæsthetic, metæsthetism. See metæsthetic, metæsthetism.

metafacial (met-a-fā'shal), a. [< Gr. μετά, behind, + L. facies, the face: see facial.] Situated behind or at the back of the face or facial region of the skull.—Metafacial angle of Serres. See craniometry.

metagaster (met-a-gas'ter), n. [*NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + γαστήρ, the belly: see gaster*².] The after-intestine; the secondary and in any way differentiated alimentary canal or digestive tube which is derived from an original primary intestinal cavity, or protogaster. It is the ordinary intestinal canal of vertebrates except Amphioxus.

metagastral (met-a-gas'tral), a. [< metagaster + -al.] Pertaining to the metagaster.

metagastrula (met-a-gas'trō-lā), n.; pl. metagastrulae (-læ). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. gastrula, q. v.] A secondary modified gastrula, of variable form, resulting from any kenogenetic mode of egg-cleavage in which a primitive or paligenetic process is vitiated. See cuts under gastrulation.

Three forms at least of metagastrulae are recognized—the amphigastrula, the discogastrula, and the perigastrula; they are all collectively distinguished from the archigastrula. Haeckel.

metage (mē'tāj), n. [< metel + -age.] 1. Measurement, especially of coal.

Acts have very lately passed in relation to the admeasurement of metage of coals for the city of Westminster. Dafos, Tour through Great Britain, II. 146. (Darwin.)

2. Charge for or price of measuring.

Metageitnion (met-a-git'ni-on), n. [< Gr. Μεταγεitνών, the second month of the Athenian year, said to be so called because it was the moving-month, when people 'changed their neighbors,' < μετά, over, + γειτών, neighbor.] The second month of the Athenian calendar, having twenty-nine days, and corresponding to the last part of July and the first part of August.

metagelatin, metagelatine (met-a-jel'a-tin), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. gelatin.] In photog., a substance which has been used as a preservative in a certain dry collodion process, consisting of a strong solution of gelatin boiled and cooled several times till it ceases to gelatinize and remains fluid.

metagenesis (met-a-jen'e-sis), n. [*NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, after, + γένεσις, production: see genesis*¹.] In biol., that modification of parthenogenesis or alternate generation which is exhibited when an organism passes from the egg to the imago through a series of successively generated individuals differing from one another in form: distinguished by Owen from metamorphosis, or the transformation of any one individual by the modification of its form as a whole. Metagenesis of one or another kind is exhibited by some insects, as aphids, in which the process is commonly called parthenogenesis; by various internal parasites, as Diatoma (see cuts under cercaria); and strikingly by various hydrozoans. In the last the cycle includes (1) the free-swimming impregnated ovum; (2) the fixation of this ovum to some submerged object and its development into an organism; (3) the formation by such organism of various zooids, as nutritive and generative zooids, unlike each other and unlike the parent, the whole forming a hydroid colony; and (4) the formation by generative zooids of ova, which on being set free complete the cycle. Thus, in a sertularian polyp the ovum is a free-swimming ciliated body, which on fixation develops a mouth and tentacles, and by continued gemmation produces two sets of buds, of which the generative set reproduces the free-swimming ciliated ova. In other polyps, as Corynidae, the set of generative buds themselves become detached as free medusoids like jelly-fish (see cut under medusoid), whose eggs develop not into bodies like the parent medusoid, but into the polypide or polypidom of the hydroid colony on which they were produced. In the Lucernaria a similar metagenesis occurs by fission. Herbert Spencer adopts Owen's metagenesis as one of three kinds of his agamogenesis, and considers it as (1) external, where new individuals bud from unspecialized parts of the parent, and (2) internal, as in the case of the transformations of Diatoma. See metamorphosis.

metagenetic (met'a-jē-net'ik), a. [< metagenesis, after genetic.] 1. In zool., pertaining to, characterized by, or resulting from metagenesis. Owen.—2. In mineral., subsequent in origin: said of certain twin crystals. See twin.

metagenetically (met'a-jē-net'i-kal-i), adv. In a metagenetic manner; by means of metagenesis. Darwin, Animals and Plants, p. 363.

metagenic (met-a-jen'ik), a. [< Gr. μεταγενής, born after, < μετά, after, + -γενής, born: see -genous. Cf. metagenetic.] Same as metagenetic.

metagnathism (me-tag'nā-thizm), n. [< metagnathous + -ism.] In ornith., the condition of a bird's bill when the points of the mandibles cross each other. See cut under crossbill.

metagnathous (me-tag'nā-thus), a. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + γνάθος, the jaw.] In ornith., having the tips of the mandibles crossed: as, the metagnathous bill of the red crossbill, Loxia curvirostra. See quotation under epignathous.

metagnostic (met-ag-nos'tik), a. and n. [< metagnostics.] I. a. Metaphysical; in recent use, transcending present knowledge both within and beyond the sphere of sense.

II. n. One who believes in the reality of an absolute being transcending knowledge. [Recent.]

The essayist would substitute the title of Metagnostics instead of Agnostics. J. A. Skilton, in Evolution, p. 227.

metagnosticism (met-ag-nos'ti-sizm), n. [< metagnostic + -ism.] The philosophical doctrine that there is a positive (not merely negative) consciousness of the Absolute: distinguished from agnosticism regarded as maintaining the opposite ground. [Recent.] metagnostics (met-ag-nos'tiks), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + γνωστικός, knowing (γνώσις, knowledge): see gnostic and -ics.] Knowledge transcending ordinary knowledge; metaphysics. Arug.

metagrammatism (met-a-gram'a-tizm), n. [*< Gr. μεταγραμματισμός, alteration of letters, < μεταγραφματίειν, alter letters, < μετά, over, + γράμμα(-r-), a letter: see gram*².] The transposition of the letters of a name so as to form a word or words having some reference to the person named; anagrammatism. Camden.

metagraphy (me-tag'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. μεταγράφειν, write differently, rewrite, transcribe, < μετά, over, + γράφειν, write: see graphic.] Transcription; transliteration.

His belief in the system of metagraphy as applied to non-European alphabets. Athenæum, No. 3151, p. 340.

metairie (me-tā'rē), n. [< F. métairie, < mé-tayer, one who farms on shares: see metayer.] A farm or piece of land cultivated for a share of its produce.

able, and which possesses opacity, luster of a peculiar kind (commonly called metallic, because very characteristic of the metals), conductivity for heat and electricity, and plasticity, or capability of being drawn, squeezed, or hammered with change of shape but no loss of continuity. Examples of metals possessing all these qualities, although in varying degree, are gold, silver, copper, iron, lead, and tin, all of which have been known from remote antiquity; and on the characters which they possess the idea of a metal was, and mainly still is, founded. These metals also have a high specific gravity, the lightest of them (tin) being over seven times as dense as water. Of the prehistorically known metals, gold, silver, and copper occur more or less abundantly in the native or metallic form, and must have been noticed, and in all probability utilized, in the most remote antiquity, by various nations and over widely extended areas. Iron also occurs native, especially in the form of meteoric iron, and in this way may have first become known and utilized. But iron is now, and has been from time immemorial, smelted from its ores in countries which, from almost every other point of view than the metallurgical, might properly be regarded as uncivilized. The use of iron other than meteoric was not, however, known in the New World before the advent of Europeans. Tin and lead do not occur in the metallic form in nature, unless in very minute quantity; hence, where used, these metals must have been obtained by the metallurgical treatment of their ores. In the case of tin and zinc, as well as of other metals not occurring native, it was not until long after some knowledge had been attained in regard to the practical use of their ores, either by themselves or as ingredients in various alloys, that any accurate idea was obtained of the metals themselves. Thus, brass was certainly made long before anything definite had been learned in regard to the metal zinc, and it is not at all unlikely that the same was the case with bronze and one of its constituents, tin. In addition to the six metals already mentioned, quicksilver was known to the Greeks and Romans in classical times; and this metal also occurs not infrequently in the metallic form, so that its early discovery is not a matter to excite surprise. The anomalous occurrence of quicksilver as a liquid at the ordinary temperature was the reason why neither Pliny nor Isidore nor Geber included it among the metals; nor was it so included by writers on chemistry and metallurgy until after it had been discovered that this fluid could be frozen at a not very low temperature, and that when frozen it was malleable. It was not until the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries that antimony, bismuth, and zinc became known; but their ores had long been in use, although, in the case of the two former metals, only to a very limited extent. The discovery of these metals considerably enlarged the scope of the word metallic, since it became necessary to admit that metals could be brittle; this was still further exemplified in the case of the metal arsenic, discovered in 1694 (its oxidized combinations had long been known and utilized), which, although having a metallic luster, is decidedly brittle. This brittleness of substances otherwise metallic in appearance led to their being placed in a class by themselves as "semi-metals," the idea that malleability was a necessary attribute of a metal having come down from the Arabian chemists, and maintaining its hold for many centuries. About the middle and in the latter half of the eighteenth century the number of known metals was greatly increased. In 1741 platina was discovered, but the metals which are always associated with it—osmium, iridium, rhodium, ruthenium, etc.—were not detected until much later. At about the same time as platina, nickel and cobalt were recognized as elements—that is, were first separated and distinguished from their ores, which had been long known and (in the case of cobalt, at least) utilized to a limited extent. Toward the end of the eighteenth century manganese, molybdena, tellurium, uranium, titanium, and chromium became known. About the beginning of the nineteenth century several of the metals of the platina family—palladium, iridium, osmium, rhodium—were separated from the complex alloy known as native platina. Up to this time all the known substances to which the name metal was applied were much heavier than water, and also decidedly heavier than those considered as non-metallic. Hence, as the old and long-prevailing idea that all metals were malleable had been done away with, a high specific gravity began to be considered as their most important characteristic. Thus we find Cronstedt, who was one of the earliest systematic writers on mineralogy (the first edition of his work was published in 1758), defining metals as "those mineral bodies which with respect to their volume are the heaviest of all hitherto known bodies." With the discovery, by Davy, in 1807, of the metallic nature of the bases of the alkalis a great change took place in this respect, for these substances, metallic from many points of view, especially with reference to their chemical affinities, are lighter than water, and at first, on this account, were by some chemists not admitted to rank as metals. The discovery of the metallic bases of the alkalis was followed by that of the bases of the earths—calcium, barium, and strontium, 1807; zirconium, 1824; aluminium, glucinum, and yttrium, 1828. These metals are all light as compared with the older metals, but heavy in comparison with the metallic bases of the alkalis, the lightest of which—lithium, discovered in 1818—has only a little more than half the specific gravity of water. Cadmium, another heavy metal associated with zinc in its mode of occurrence, and of some importance in the arts, was also separated from its ore in 1818. Many metals have been discovered within the past few years, all of great interest from the scientific point of view, but no one of them of economical importance, or occurring in sufficient quantity to be utilized to any extent even if possessing valuable properties. So doubtful and difficult are the chemical reactions of some of these elements that their exact number cannot be stated. Several have been worked over by chemists for years without any definite conclusion having been reached; several, after having been accepted for a while, have been dropped from the list. There are about seventy generally recognized elements (see element), although some three or four of these may still be considered as more or less doubtful. Of the seventy thirteen are decidedly non-metallic; these are sulphur, phosphorus, fluorine, chlorine, iodine, bromine, silicon, boron, carbon, nitrogen, hydrogen, oxygen, and selenium; all the other elements are considered to be metals, and selenium was formerly generally so considered, but latterly it has been decidedly included among the non-metals, and the name has been changed by some to selenion, to make it correspond with carbon, boron, and silicon, with which elements it is to a certain extent chemically affiliated. Tellurium, on the other hand, although closely related chemically to sulphur and selenium, has always been classed among the metals, chiefly because, although brittle, it has a decided metallic luster. The names of the metals, so far as is possible, all end in -um; even platinum is frequently written platinum. A division of the elements into metals and non-metals is recognized by chemists at the present time as being rather a matter of convenience from the popular point of view than as one capable of exact scientific definition. The words metallic and metal, however, cannot be dispensed with in common life and the arts, and their use can very rarely lead to any confusion. The exceptions to this general statement that the metals have a "metallic" luster, and that the non-metals do not, are, on the whole, extremely insignificant. Only in the case of selenium and phosphorus in certain of their allotropic forms could there be any question as to whether the term metallic luster could properly be used with reference to a non-metal.

2. In printing and type-founding. See type-metal.—3. The material of glass, pottery, etc., in a state of fusion.

If no tongues of flame make their appearance, the calcination is complete. The contents of the pot are then shovelled out, and allowed to cool and harden into what is technically called metal or "prussiate cake."

It was impossible to live without our king but as slaves live: that is, such as are visibly dead, and persons condemned to metals.

Jer. Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium, Ep. Ded.

Aich metal, or Aich's metal, an alloy of about two parts of zinc with three of copper, to which about two per cent. of iron is added. This alloy is very malleable at a red heat, and can be hammered, rolled, or drawn into fine wire. It has been used in Austria for cannon, and is believed to have been known to the Chinese.—Antifiction metals. See antifiction.—Babbitt metal. [Named from Isaac Babbitt, the inventor (1799–1862).] An alloy of tin with copper and antimony, used for bearings, bushings, or pillow-blocks. This alloy consists of 88 per cent. of tin, the remaining 12 per cent. being made up of the two other metals. Sometimes called babbitting.

—Base metals, in metal, the metals not classed as noble, especially lead, zinc, copper, and iron.—Bath metal. [Named from Bath, England.] A white brass consisting of 55 parts of copper and 45 of zinc. The name is also given to other combinations of the same metals.—Blue metal. (a) A well-sinkers' name for blue clay. (b) See blue.—Bowl-metal, a name given to antimony in the second stage of the English smelting process of that metal.—Britannia metal, an alloy containing tin, antimony, and copper, to which bismuth, zinc, and lead are occasionally added. The essential metal is tin, which usually constitutes nine tenths or more of the mass, the antimony and copper being added to give the desired hardness. This alloy is extensively used for table-ware, being usually, for that purpose, covered with a thin coating of silver, and sold as silver-plate. In the best plated ware, however, the silver is laid on a body of German silver.—Coarse metal, the technical name of the product of the second operation in the process of smelting mixed cupriferaous ores in Great Britain, especially at Swansea. The product of this operation, which is performed in a reverberatory furnace, is a matte or regulus containing iron and copper in combination with sulphur in about the same proportion in which they are present in copper pyrites, together with slag.—Composition metal. See composition.—Dutch metal. See Dutch.—Fusible metal, a metallic alloy that fuses at a very low temperature. Such alloys are usually composed of lead, tin, and bismuth. Among those best known are—Newton's metal, containing 8 parts of bismuth, 5 of lead, and 3 of tin, which fuses at 202°; Rose's metal, 2 parts of bismuth, 1 each of tin and lead, fusing at 201°; and an alloy of 5 parts of bismuth, 3 of lead, and 2 of tin, fusing at 197°. The addition of cadmium to alloys of bismuth, tin, and lead lowers their fusing-point considerably. Thus, if from 8 to 10 per cent. of cadmium is added to Rose's metal, the melting-point is reduced to 187°. The alloys known as Wood's and Wood and Lipinsky's metals are such alloys of cadmium, bismuth, tin, and lead. One of these, containing cadmium 4 parts, and tin, lead, and bismuth each 5 parts, melts at 150°. The addition of mercury to fusible alloys like Newton's and Rose's metals is said also to lower their fusing-point considerably.—Gathered metal. See laden metal, under laden.—Geddes's metal. Same as Aich metal.—Heavy metal. See heavy.—Kier's metal, a gun-metal composed of 100 parts of copper, 75 of zinc, and 10 of iron.—Laden metal. See laden.—Light metal, any metal of which the specific gravity is less than 5.—Magnetic metals, iron, nickel, cobalt, chromium, and manganese.—Muntz's metal. [Named from Mr. Muntz of Birmingham, the inventor.] Yellow metal; an alloy of 8 parts of copper and 2 of zinc, differing from common brass in being malleable when hot. It is cheaper and can be more easily rolled than copper, and has taken its place as the material used for sheathing, formerly one of the most important uses to which copper was put. Yellow metal is its general commercial name. Also called patent metal.—Newton's metal. See fusible metal, above.—Noble or perfect metals, gold, silver, and platinum: so called because when exposed to the air they do not oxidize like other metals, but retain their metallic luster.—Organ- or pipe-metal, an alloy of tin and lead, with or without zinc, used for the construction of organ-pipes. The value of the metal depends principally upon the proportion of tin used, less than 50 per cent. making poor metal. A fair percentage of tin is indicated by a spotted surface, hence good metal is also called spotted metal.—Patent metal. Same as Muntz's metal.—Pimple-metal. See white metal.—Point of fusion of metals. See fusion.—Prince's metal, an alloy said to have been so called because first prepared by Prince Rupert (1619–82), nephew of Charles I. of England, who invented, or at least introduced into England, the so-called "Prince Rupert's drops." There is no certainty in regard to the composition of the alloy called prince's metal. By most writers it is said to have been a kind of brass; others describe it as an alloy of copper and arsenic.—Rose's metal. See fusible metal, above.—To burn metals together. See burn.—White metal, the product of the fourth operation in the smelting of mixed cupriferaous ores (according to the English process). The object of this stage of the process is to remove the iron, and the work is done in a reverberatory furnace, the third stage having been a calcination of the coarse metal, with the object of converting the sulphuret of iron into an oxide. The product of the fourth operation is variously designated as blue, white, or pimple-metal, according to the percentage of copper contained and the peculiar appearance exhibited. Portions having a smooth lustrous fracture, and containing from 60 to 70 per cent. of copper, are designated as blue metal; those of grayish-white color, with granular fracture, and containing from 75 to 78 per cent. of copper, are called white metal. Pimple-metal is that which contains more than 78 per cent. of copper, and has its surface pimpled from the escape of sulphurous acid gas.—Wood's metal. See fusible metal, above.—Yellow metal. Same as Muntz's metal.

metal (met'al), v. t.; pret. and pp. metaled or metalled, ppr. metaling or metalling. [metal, n.] To put metal on; cover, as roads, with broken stones or metal.

The sense is much altered & the hearers conceit strangely entangled by the figure Metalepsis, which I call the farfel.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 152.

metalepsy (met'a-lep-si), n. [Gr. μετάληψις, alternation: see metalepsis.] In chem., change or variation produced by the displacement of an element or radical in a compound by its chemical equivalent: same as substitution.

metaleptic (met-a-lep'tik), a. [Gr. μεταληπτικός, capable of partaking (cf. μετάληψις, participation), < μετάληπτός, partaken in: see metalepsis and metalepsy.] 1. Pertaining to a metalepsis or participation; translativ.—2. Transverse: as, the metaleptic motion of a muscle.—3. In chem., pertaining to, resulting from, or characterized by metalepsy, or the substitution of one substance for another which has been displaced.

metaleptical (met-a-lep'ti-kal), a. [metaleptic + -al.] Same as metaleptic.

metaleptically (met-a-lep'ti-kal-i), adv. In a metaleptical manner; by transposition.

The name of promises may metaleptically be extended to comminations. Bp. Sanderson, Promissory Oaths, I. § 9.

metal-gage (met'al-gāj), n. A gage used for determining the thickness of sheet-metal. E. H. Knight.

metalline (met'al-in), n. [metal + *-ine*².] 1. A kind of thread for sewing leather, made of twisted strands of linen and brass, copper, or steel wire.—2. A compound for forming a lubricating-surface in journal-boxes. It is made up of metallic oxides, organic materials, wax, and fatty matters.

metaling, metalling (met'al-ing), n. [Verbal n. of metal, v.] The material which forms the road-bed of a macadamized road or of a railway, chiefly broken stones; road-metal.

The air is filled with a choking precipitate of the kuner, or carbonate of lime nodules, which form the metaling of the road. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 145.

metallist, n. See metallist.

metallic (me-tal'ik), a. [= F. métallique = Sp. metálico = Pg. It. metallico (cf. D. metallisch, metallisch = G. metallisch = Dan. Sw. metallisk), < L. metallicus, < Gr. μεταλλικός, of or concerning mines or metal, < μέταλλον, a mine (metal): see metal, n.] 1. Consisting of or having the characters of a metal; made up of metal or of an alloy. This word is used to indicate the condition of a metal (see metal) in which it exists by itself, and not mineralized or combined with those substances which take away its metallic character and convert it into an ore, in which the elementary substance exists, but often with characters greatly differing from those which it has when separated from its mineralizers, or reduced to the metallic form.

She said; and lo! a palace towering seems,
With Parian pillars and metallic beams.

W. King, Rufinus, or the Favourite.

Among the most metallic of the metals is a gas.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 167.

2. Characteristic of a metal: as, a metallic luster.—3. Having one or more properties resembling those of metals: as, a metallic voice.

A distinct, hollow, metallic, and clangorous, yet apparently muffled, reverberation.

Poe, Fall of the House of Usher.

Metallic-adamantine luster, a variety of luster intermediate between submetallic and adamantine, characteristic of pyrrargyrite, some cerussite and octahedrite, etc.—Metallic ammunition, bur, currency, dust, feather. See the nouns.—Metallic beetles, a collectors' name for coleopterous insects of the family Buprestidae. See cut under Buprestis.—Metallic lath. See *lathing*¹.—Metallic oxide, a compound of metal and oxygen.—Metallic paper, paper the surface of which is washed over with a solution of whiting, lime, and size. Writing done with a pewter pencil upon such paper is almost indelible.—Metallic salts, those salts which have a metal or metallic oxide for their base, as lead carbonate.—Metallic scales. See metallic feather, under feather.—Metallic standard. See standard.—Metallic tinkling, in pathol., a high-pitched tinkle heard in the lungs in pneumothorax, or in the case of a lung cavity under certain conditions.—Metallic-tissue loom. See *loom*¹.

metallical† (me-tal'i-kal), a. [metallic + -al.] Same as metallic.

Now, by electrical bodies, I understand not such as are metallical, mentioned by Pliny and the Antients.

Sir T. Brown, Vulg. Err., II. 4.

metallically (me-tal'i-kal-i), adv. As a metal; by means of or by the use of metal; with a metal; as regards metallic properties.

They [two plates of different metals] are metallically connected together. Preece and Stewerwright, Telegraphy, p. 8.

Let us conceive a metallically pure cylinder of wrought or cast iron.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV. 299.

metallicity (met-a-lis'i-ti), n. [metallic + -ity.] The condition of being a metal; metallic character or constitution.

They [the alchemists] held that mercury enters into the composition of all metals, and is the very cause of their metallicity.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 32.

metallifacure (met'al-i-fak'tūr), n. [L. metallum, a metal, + factura, a making: see facture.] The manufacture of metals. [Rare.]

metalliferous (met-a-lif'e-rus), a. [= F. metallifère = Sp. metalífero; < L. metallifer, yielding metals, < metallum, a metal, + ferre = *E. bear*¹.]

Producing or yielding metal: as, metalliferous deposits or veins; a metalliferous district.

metalliform (me-tal'i-fōrm), a. [= F. métalliforme; < L. metallum, a metal, + forma, form.] Having the form or properties of metal; like metal.

metallify (me-tal'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. metallified, ppr. metallifying. [< metal + -ify.] To convert into metal.

The Augustin process of silver extraction is only a peculiar mode of metallifying and collecting the silver of an ore after it has been by some preliminary operation converted into chloride or sulphate. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 70.

metallikon (me-tal'i-kon), n. [< Gr. μεταλλικόν, neut. of μεταλλικός, of metal, metallic: see metallio.] An English architectural surface-decoration, consisting of glass plates on which are cemented ornaments of glass, terra-cotta, etc.

metalline (met'al-in), a. [= F. métallin = It. metallino; as metal + -ine.] Of a metallic nature or quality; consisting of or like metal; containing metal: as, metalline water.

The quicksilver . . . [was] by this means brought to appear a very close and lovely metalline cylinder, not interrupted by interspersed bubbles as before.

Boyle, Works, I. 49.

metalling, n. See metaling.

metallist, metallist (met'al-ist), n. [< metal (L. metallum) + -ist.] 1. A worker in metals, or one skilled in the knowledge of metals.

The skillful metallist, that findeth and refineth those precious veins for public use, is rewarded, is honoured.

Bp. Hall, Epistles, v. 7.

2. An advocate of the use of metal (silver or gold) as currency. Compare bimetallist, monometallist.

Perhaps for this reason he has recently reaped a golden harvest by carrying out the principles of the silver metallist.

Science, VIII. 75.

metallization (met'al-i-zā'shon), n. [= F. métallisation = Sp. metallización = Pg. metallização; as metallize + -ation.] The act or process of metallizing, or forming or transforming into a metal. Also spelled metallisation.—Metallization of wood, the impregnation of wood with an inorganic substance, by which the pores become so completely filled that the wood acquires, to a certain extent, the qualities of a mineral.

metallize (met'al-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metallized, ppr. metallizing. [= F. métalliser = Sp. metallizar = Pg. metallizar; as metal + -ize.] To form or transform into metal; render metallic. Also spelled metallise.—Metallized glass. See glass.

metallochrome (me-tal'ō-krōm), n. [< Gr. μέταλλον, a metal, + χρῶμα, color.] A beautiful prismatic tinting imparted by electrolytic action to polished steel plates by depositing on them a thin film of oxid of lead.

metallochromy (met'al-ō-krō'mi), n. [As metallochrome + -y.] The art or process of coloring metals.

Metallochromy is used to produce decorative effects upon objects of copper, tombac, and brass, previously treated to a thin electro-gilding.

W. H. Wahl, Galvanoplastic Manipulations, p. 407.

metallographic (met'al-ō-graf'ik), a. [< metallo-graphy + -ic.] Of or pertaining to metallo-graphy.

metallographist (met'al-ō-grā-fist), n. [< metallo-graphy + -ist.] A writer on metallo-graphy.

metallography (met'al-ō-grā-fi), n. [= F. métallographie = Sp. metalografía = Pg. metalografia; < Gr. μέταλλον, a metal, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] 1. An account of metals, or a treatise on metallic substances; the science of metals.—2. A process of decorating metals. It consists of a simple system of printing from wooden blocks in acids, in such manner as to produce an imitation of the grain of the wood.

3. A method of engraving, allied to lithography, in which metallic plates are substituted for stones.

metalloid (met'al-oid), a. and n. [= F. métalloïde; < Gr. μέταλλον, metal, + είδος, form.] I. a. Relating to metalloids; like metal; having the form or appearance of a metal.

II. n. In chem., a term which has been variously applied: as, (a) to the metallic bases of the fixed alkalis and alkaline earths, probably in consequence of their low specific gravity; and (b) to all the non-metallic elementary substances. In the latter sense it is now used by chemists. The metalloids are thirteen in number: oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon, chlorine, bromine, iodine, fluorine, sulphur, selenium, phosphorus, boron, and silicon. The distinction between a metal and a metalloid is, however, purely artificial, being based on physical rather than chemical criteria; but, broadly, a metal may be said to differ from a metalloid in being an excellent conductor of heat and electricity, in reflecting light more or less powerfully, and in being electropositive. Though a metalloid may possess one or more of these characters, it will not be found to unite them all. Berzelius, in his classification, restricts the term metalloid to the inflammable non-metallic elements—sulphur, phosphorus, carbon, and boron. See element, 3, and metal, 1.

metalloidal (met'al-oi'dal), a. [< metalloid + -al.] Of or pertaining to a metalloid or metalloids; of the nature of a metalloid.

Long heat-waves in their action upon metalloidal molecules only produce bands and fluted spaces.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 175.

metallophone (me-tal'ō-fōn), n. [< Gr. μέταλλον, a metal, + φωνή, a sound.] 1. A piano-forte with graduated metal bars instead of strings.—2. An instrument like the xylophone, but with metallic instead of wooden bars.

metalloplastic (met'al-lō-plas'tik), a. [< Gr. μέταλλον, metal, + πλάσσειν, mold, form.] Pertaining to the arts of depositing metals or obtaining metal casts by either electric or chemical methods.

metalloscopic (met'al-lō-skop'ik), a. [< metallo-scop-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to metallo-scop-y.

Metalloscopic phenomena are most analogous to those here described.

Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 503.

metallurgy (met'al-lō-skō'pi), n. [< Gr. μέταλλον, metal, + σκοπεῖν, view.] The art of determining by external application what metals or metallic substances act most easily and favorably upon a given person. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 749.

metallotherapeutic (met'al-lō-ther-a-pū'tik), a. Pertaining to metallotherapy.

metallotherapy (met'al-lō-ther'a-pi), n. [< Gr. μέταλλον, metal, + θεραπεία, medical treatment.]

The treatment of disease by the external application of metals. First formulated as a system by Burq in 1848, and hence often called Burqism, it has been recently revived by Charcot. Simple disks of various metals are employed in contact with the external parts of the body, from which different therapeutic results are claimed. Other observers assert that all the phenomena described as following the application of metals may be produced by disks of wood, and that whatever curative results are obtained are due to mental effects, rather than to any special virtues emanating from the metals themselves.

metallurgic (met'al-lér'jik), a. [= F. métallurgique = Sp. metallurgico = Pg. metallurgico; < NL. metallurgicus, < metallurgia, metallurgy: see metallurgy.] Pertaining to metallurgy, or the art of working metals.—Metallurgic chemistry, that part of chemistry which teaches the combinations and analyses of metals.

metallurgical (met'al-lér'ji-kal), a. [< metallurgic + -al.] Relating to or connected with metallurgy; belonging to the working of metals: as, metallurgical investigations or pursuits.

metallurgically (met'al-lér'ji-kal-i), adv. By metallurgical methods; as regards metallurgy.

metallurgist (met'al-ér-jist), n. [= F. métallurgiste = Sp. metallurgista = Pg. metallurgista; as metallurgic + -ist.] One who is versed in the science of metallurgy; one who scientifically studies the operations of the smelter.

metallurgy (met'al-ér-ji), n. [= F. métallurgie = Sp. metallurgia = Pg. It. metallurgia, < NL. metallurgia, < Gr. μέταλλουργία, working metals, a miner, < μέταλλον, a mine (metal), + εργον, work.] The science of smelting. In smelting, the metals are separated by known methods from the mineralizing substances with which, with few exceptions, they naturally occur combined. Thus, the common ore of lead is galena, a combination of sulphur with that metal. The smelter treats this combination in the furnace, and the result is metallic lead. The treatment of some ores is simple and easy; that of others is difficult and complex. Smelting implies the use of fire, or separation of the metal in the dry way, but processes carried on in the humid way are not unfrequently employed in the treatment of metalloiferous ores. This is not ordinarily called smelting, but metallurgical treatment. The ores of many mining regions are treated at or near the place where they are mined, but it is not at all uncommon for ores to be carried to a great distance to be smelted. Thus, until within a few years, a large part of the copper used in the world was smelted at Swansea, in Wales, from ores brought from various countries, metallurgical skill and the command of cheap fuel making it desirable to have the ore treated there rather than at the place where it was mined. Abbreviated metall.

metalmant (met'al-man), n. [< metal + man.] A worker in metals; a coppersmith or tinman.

A smith, or a metalmant, the pot's never from his nose.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 110.

metalogic (met'al-ōj'ik), n. [< Gr. μετά, after, + E. logic.] The part of metaphysics which concerns logic.

metalogical (met'al-ōj'i-kal), a. [As metalogic + -al.] Beyond the province of logic; transcending the sphere of logic.

metal-plane (met'al-plān), n. A form of plane used to face soft metal plates by taking fine shavings from them. The angle of the cutter with the sole is adapted to the hardness of the metal to be worked.

metal-saw (met'al-sā), n. A hard steel saw with fine teeth, stretched in a frame and used for sawing metal.

metal-wheel (met'al-hwēl), n. In grinding and polishing, a lap.

metal-work (met'al-wérk), n. Work, especially artistic work, in metal.

metamathematics (met-a-math-ē-mat'iks), n. [< Gr. μετά, after, + μαθηματικά, mathematics.] The metaphysics of mathematics; the philosophy of non-Euclidean geometry and the like.

metamer (met'a-mēr), n. [See metamere.] A compound which is metameric, or exhibits the property of metamorphism.

The two methyl and ethyl metamers seem distinguishable.

Philos. Mag., XXV. 285.

metamere, n. Plural of metameron.

metameral (met'a-mēr'al), a. [< metamere + -al.] 1. Pertaining to or comprising metameres; having correspondence or agreement between parts.—2. In zool., same as metameric.

metamere (met'a-mēr), n. [Also metameron; < Gr. μετά, after, + μέρος, a part.] In zool., one of a longitudinal series of parts which are serially homologous with one another. See metameric, metamerism.

The construction of bilaterally symmetrical bodies by metamerism is common and usual in the animal kingdom, and is exhibited in such diversity of details that metameres have received several different names. The most general name is segment; but, since several morphologically distinct metameres may coalesce in one segment, the stricter term for an individual metamere, such as each morphological segment or ring of an annelid, crustacean, insect, or other articulate animal, is somite or arthromere. A morphological metamere of a vertebrate has been called a diarthromere. Compare actinomere and antimer.—Ambulacral metameres. See ambulacral.

metameric (met'a-mēr'ik), a. [As metamere + -ic.] 1. In chem., pertaining to or characterized by metamorphism.—2. In zool., of or pertaining to a metamere or metamorphism; being a metamere, or resulting from metamorphism; situated in the long axis of the body as one of a longitudinal series of like parts; segmental; somitic.

metamerically (met'a-mēr'i-kal-i), adv. So as to be metameric; in or by way of metamorphism; as a metamere.

metamerism (met'a-mēr-izm), n. [As metamere + -ism.] 1. In chem., a form of isomerism, that property of certain compound bodies by which they have the same chemical elements combined in the same proportion and with the same molecular weight, while differing in chemical properties. Thus, aldehyde and ethylene oxide have their elements in the same proportion, C₂H₄O, and the same molecular weight, 44, but are very different in their chemical properties. Two metameric bodies do not, however, belong to the same class or series of compounds. See isomerism, polymerism.

2. In zool., a metameric condition; the state of being metameric; segmentation of the body of an animal along the primary or longitudinal axis, resulting in a series of more or less similar consecutive parts which are serially homologous. See metamere, antimer.

metamerization (met'a-mēr-i-zā'shon), n. [< metamere + -ation.] Division into metameres.

A very regular internal metamerization.

Encyc. Brit., XVII. 322.

metamerize (met'a-mēr-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metamerized, ppr. metamerizing. [< metamere + -ize.] To make metameric; divide into metameres.

Although the vertebrate body is a metameric one, this archinephric duct is not a metamerized organ.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 602.

metameron (me-tam'ē-ron), n.; pl. metamera (-rā). [NL.: see metamere.] Same as metamere.

metamorous (met'a-mēr-us), a. [As metamere + -ous.] Same as metameral and metameric, 2.

A. A. W. Hubrecht, Microsc. Science, XXVII. 613.

metamery (met'a-mēr-i), n. [As metamere + -y.] The condition of being metameric; metamorphism.

A. A. W. Hubrecht, Microsc. Science, XXVII. 610.

metamorphic (met'a-môr'fik), a. [= F. métamorphique; as Gr. μετά, among (denoting interchange), + μορφή, form, + -ic. Cf. metamorphosis.] 1. Producing metamorphosis; changing the form or structure; transforming: as, a metamorphic cause or agency; metamorphic action.—2. Exhibiting metamorphosis or metamorphism; changed in form or structure; metamorphosed.—Metamorphic rocks, in geol. See metamorphism.

metamorphism (met'a-môr'fiz-m), n. [As metamorph-ic + -ism.] The process of metamor-metaph. An abbreviation of metaphysics.

metaphery (me-taf'ə-ri), n. [Gr. μεταφῆρεν, carry over, transfer: see metaphor. Cf. periphery.] In bot., the transposition or displacement of various floral organs, as when petals that are normally alternate with the sepals are placed in front of them, as rarely occurs in Fuchsia.

metaphor (met'-a-for), n. [= F. métaphore = Sp. metáfora = Pg. metáfora = It. metafora, < L. metaphora < Gr. μεταφορά, a transfer to one word of the sense of another (L. translatio), < μετα, carry over, transfer, < μετά, over, + φέρειν, carry, = E. *bear*¹.] A figure of speech by which, from some supposed resemblance or analogy, a name, an attribute, or an action belonging to or characteristic of one object is assigned to another to which it is not literally applicable; the figurative transfer of a descriptive or affirmative word or phrase from one thing to another; implied comparison by transference of terms: as, the ship spread its wings to the breeze; "Judah is a lion's whelp." Gen. xlix. 9. If Jacob had said, "it like or resembles a lion's whelp," the expression would have been a simile instead of a metaphor. A simple metaphor is contained in a single word or phrase, like those in italics above; a continued metaphor is one in which the figurative description or characterization is maintained throughout a variety of phrases or applications. See simile and trope.

What else is your Metaphor but an inuersion of sense by transport; your allegorie by a duplicite of meaning or dissimulation vnder couert and darke intendments?

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 128.

Whatever here seems beauteous, seem'd to be
But a faint Metaphor of Thee.

Cowley, The Mistress, Not Fair.

A metaphor is no argument, though it be sometimes the gunpowder to drive one home and imbed it in the memory.

Louell, Democracy.

Mixed metaphor, a figurative expression in which two or more metaphors are confused, as in the following quotation:

Where—still to use your lordship's tropes—
The level of obedience slopes
Upward and downward, as the stream
Of hydra faction kicks the beam!

T. Moore, To Lord Castlereagh.

=Syn. Comparison, Allegory, etc. See simile.

metaphoric (met-a-for'ik), a. [= F. métaphorique = Sp. metáforico = Pg. metáforico = It. metaforico, < L. metaphoricus* (in adv. metaphorice), < Gr. μεταφορικός, relating to metaphor, < μεταφορά, metaphor: see metaphor.] Same as metaphorical.

metaphorical (met-a-for'i-kal), a. [< metaphoric + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of metaphor; consisting of or abounding in metaphor; not literal: as, a metaphorical expression; a metaphorical use of words.

How dangerous it is in sensible things to use metaphorical expressions unto the people, and what absurd conceits they will swallow in their literals.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 10.

metaphorically (met-a-for'i-kal-i), adv. In a metaphorical manner or sense; by way of metaphor; not literally.

metaphoricalness (met-a-for'i-kal-nes), n. The state or quality of being metaphorical.

metaphorist (met-a-for-ist), n. [< metaphor + -ist.] One who coins or uses metaphors.

Let the poet send to the metaphorist for his allegories.

Martinus Scriblerus.

metaphosphate (met-a-fos'fāt), n. [< metaphosph(oric) + -ate.] A salt formed by the union of metaphosphoric acid with a base.

metaphosphoric (met-a-fos-for'ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, with, + E. phosphoric.] Pertaining to, produced from, or resembling phosphorus or phosphoric acid.—Metaphosphoric acid, HPO_3 , an acid obtained by burning phosphorus under a bell-glass filled with air or oxygen and absorbing the fumes in water, or by heating orthophosphoric acid to redness. When the water is evaporated, the acid is left as a soft, very deliquescent mass. The glacial phosphoric acid of commerce is metaphosphoric acid with soda as an impurity.

metaphragm (met-a-fram), n. [< NL. metaphragma, partition, < Gr. μετά, over, + φράγμα, fence, screen: see diaphragm.] In entom., the metapostscutellum, which is visible exteriorly in some insects, but in others is internal, forming a transverse partition at the base of the abdomen.

metaphragma (met-a-frag'ma), n.; pl. metaphragmata (-mā-tā). [NL.] Same as metaphragm.

metaphrase (met-a-frāz), n. [= F. métaphrase = Sp. metáfrasis = Pg. metáfrase, < NL. metaphrasis, < Gr. μετάφρασις, a translation or paraphrase, < μεταφράζειν, change from one style to another, as from poetry to prose, < μετά, over, + φράζειν, speak: see phrase. Cf. paraphrase, periphrase.] 1. A translation; specifically, a verbal translation; a close version or translation from one language into another: opposed to paraphrase.

His metaphrase of the Psalms is still in our hands.

Ep. Hall, To Mr. S. Burton.

2. A responding phrase; a repartee.

I'm somewhat dull, still, in the manly art
Of phrase and metaphrase.

Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, viii.

metaphrase (met-a-frāz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metaphrased, ppr. metaphrasing. [< metaphorase, n.] To translate literally; turn into exactly corresponding words: as, to metaphrase Latin poetry.

metaphrasis (me-taf'rā-sis), n. [NL.: see metaphrase.] Same as metaphrase.

Metaphrasis is to take some notable place out of a good Poete, and turn the same sense into meter, or into other wordes in Prose.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 93.

metaphrast (met-a-fras't), n. [= F. métaphraste = Sp. metáfrasta = Pg. metáfrastes, < Gr. μεταφράστης, one who changes from one style to another, < μεταφράζειν, change from one style to another: see metaphrasis.] A person who translates literally from one language into another.

George Sandys, Esq., the famous traveller and excellent poetical metaphrast.

Wood, Fasti Oxon., p. 1286.

metaphrastic (met-a-fras'tik), a. [< metaphrast + -ic.] Close or literal in translation.

Maximus Planudes, who has the merit of having familiarised to his countrymen many Latin classics of the lower empire, by metaphrastic versions.

Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 169.

metaphractical (met-a-fras'ti-kal), a. [< metaphrastic + -al.] Same as metaphrastic.

metaphysic (met-a-fiz'ik), a. and n. [= F. métaphysico = Sp. metáfisico = Pg. metáfisico = It. metafisico, < ML. metaphysicus, adj., from the earlier noun metaphysica, neut. pl.; as a noun, formerly also metaphysique, < F. métaphysique = Sp. metafísica = Pg. metáfisica = It. metafisica, < L. metaphysica, neut. pl. (later metaphysica, fem. pl.) as a noun, a transfer of the Greek title τὸν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά, A-N, 'the (books) after the Physics, 1-50,' applied first probably by Andronicus of Rhodes, in the 1st century B. C., to certain books of Aristotle, which were not intended to form one treatise, but which all relate to what he called πρωτὴ φιλοσοφία, first philosophy: μετά, after; φυσικά, physics: see physic, physics. The preposition or prefix came to be regarded as meaning 'beyond,' 'above,' and the title metaphysica as the name of a science 'that is above or transcends physics.' Hence mod. formations like metachemistry, metalogic, metamathematics, etc.] 1. a. Same as metaphysical.

By any metaphysick book.

N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, iv. 8.

He knew what's what, and that's as high
As metaphysic wit can fly.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I. i. 150.

II. n. Same as metaphysics.

The one part, which is physic, inquireth and handleth the material and efficient causes; and the other, which is metaphysic, handleth the formal and final causes.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

When I say metaphysic, you will be pleased to remember that all general reasoning, all politics, law, morality, and divinity, are merely metaphysic.

Horne Tooke, Diversions of Purley, II. iv.

The full treatment of the whole mass of empirical detail is impossible without a more thorough metaphysic.

Adamson, Fichte, p. 222.

metaphysicist (met-a-fiz'ik), v. t. [= F. métaphysiquer = Pg. metáfisicar = It. metafisicare, discourse metaphysically; from the noun: see metaphysic, n.] To make metaphysical. Walpole, Letters (1782), IV. 306. (Davies.)

metaphysical (met-a-fiz'i-kal), a. [< metaphysic + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to metaphysic or metaphysics; in a loose sense, philosophical; hence, highly abstruse; apart from ordinary or practical modes of thought.

Hobbes had, in language more precise and luminous than has ever been employed by any other metaphysical writer, maintained that the will of the Prince was the standard of right and wrong.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., II.

2. Relating to real being, and not merely to appearance; transcendental; hence, pertaining to unverifiable hypotheses.

Both ideas and words may be said to be true in a metaphysical sense of the word "truth," . . . i. e., really to be such as they exist.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxxii. 2.

3. Pertaining to abstractions, or modes thought of as objects, and named as if they were things; abstract.

Truth and Falsehood are odd kind of Metaphysical things to them, which they do not care to trouble their heads with.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. i.

4. Preternatural or supernatural.

The golden round,
Which fate and metaphysical aid doth seem
To have thee crown'd withal.

Shak., Macbeth, I. 5. 30.

Metaphysical abstraction. See abstraction.—Metaphysical category, a category of real being; a concept of a form of existence.—Metaphysical cognition. See practical cognition, under cognition.—Metaphysical definition, a definition by genus and difference.—Metaphysical hypothesis, in older writers, a supposition that something really exists, thus comprehending scientific hypotheses generally; by positivist writers used to denote an unverifiable hypothesis, a hypothesis concerning things in themselves as distinguished from phenomena.—Metaphysical method. See method.—Metaphysical mode of expression, the expression of a fact by means of abstract nouns, instead of concrete nouns and adjectives.—Metaphysical partition, the mental separation of anything into parts whose separate existence is impossible.—Metaphysical whole. (a) A species conceived as compounded of its genus and specific difference. (b) A whole of comprehension, or a logical term conceived as compounded of its predicates. (c) A whole of comprehension in a more general sense; a natural whole; any whole in which the subject is viewed as the whole of which the predicates are parts.

metaphysically (met-a-fiz'i-kal-i), adv. 1. From a metaphysical point of view; by metaphysical methods; as regards metaphysics.—2. Supernaturally.

The eclipse of the sunne that darkened all the earth at Christes passion, happening altogether prodigiously and metaphysically in plenilunio.

G. Hervey, Letter to Ed. Spenser (1580).

metaphysician (met-a-fiz'ian), n. [= F. métaphysicien; < metaphysic + -ian.] 1. One who is versed in the science of metaphysics.—2. One who practises the mind-cure. [Recent and vulgar.]

metaphysicist (met-a-fiz'i-sist), n. [< metaphysic + -ist.] Same as metaphysician.

metaphysics (met-a-fiz'iks), n. [Pl. of metaphysic: see -ics.] 1. The science of the inward and essential nature of things. (a) As the subject of the books of Aristotle so called, first philosophy; ontology; the analysis of the nature of being in general; the doctrine of first principles. (b) [The prefix meta-being understood as meaning 'beyond,'] Supernatural science; the doctrine of that which transcends all human experience. (c) The science of the mind treated by means of introspection and analysis, and not by experiment and scientific observation; rational psychology. (d) Any doctrine based upon presumption and not upon inductive reasoning and observation. (e) An abstract and abstruse body of doctrine supposed to be virtually taken for granted in some science: as, 'the metaphysics of geometry.' [Used frequently with the definite article, and generally connected with unpleasant associations, as being a study very dry and at the same time of doubtful truth.]

The mathematics and the metaphysics.

Fall to them as you find your stomach serves you.

Shak., T. of the S., I. 1. 87.

"How," she cried, "you love

The metaphysics!"

Tennyson, Princess, III.]

2. Philosophy in general; especially, the philosophical study of mind; psychology: so used from the time of Descartes, and especially by the Scotch school.

Metaphysics was a word formerly appropriated to the ontology and pneumatology of the schools, but now understood as equally applicable to all those inquiries which have for their object to trace the various branches of human knowledge to their first principles in the human mind.

D. Stewart, Dissertations, II. 476.

3. In the Kantian terminology, the science of God, freedom, and immortality.

Abbreviated metaph.

metaphysiological (met-a-fiz'i-ō-loy'i-kal), a. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + φυσιολογία, physiology, + -ic-al.] Beyond the province of physiology.

metaphysis (me-taf'i-sis), n. [< Gr. μετά, over, + φύσις, nature: see physic.] Change of nature: transformation; metamorphosis.

metaplasia (met-a-plā'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μετάπλασις, transformation: see metaplasia.] The conversion of an adult tissue directly into another form of adult tissue, as of hyaline cartilage into mucous tissue. This takes place principally, if not exclusively, among the tissues of the connective-tissue group.

metaplasia (me-tap'lā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετάπλασις, transformation, < μετά, over, + πλάσις, a molding, conformation, < πλάσσειν, form, mold. Cf. metaplasma.] See the quotation.

This eminent author [Haeckel] regarded the ontogeny of an individual to be divisible into three periods: first, the stages of Anaplasia, or those of progressive evolution; second, the stages of fulfilled growth and development, Metaplasia; third, those of decline, Cataplasia.

Amer. Nat., XXII. 881.

metaplasmi (met-a-plazm), n. [< L. metaplasma, < Gr. μεταπλάσμις, a transformation, the assumption of a present or nominative for the derived tenses of verbs or cases of nouns, < μεταπλάσσειν, transform, change, < μετά, over, + πλάσσειν, form, mold.] In gram.: (a) A change or transmutation in a word by adding, transposing, or retrenching a syllable or letter.

Intercalarius (but it is possible that this latter is simply a metaplasma for intercalaris). Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 89.

(b) Formation of an oblique case or cases from a stem other than that of the nominative.

metaplasma² (met'-a-plazm), n. [Gr. μετά, after, + πλάσμα, something molded: see plasm.] In bot., protoplasm containing certain carbohydrates which are eventually separated from it in the formation of cell-walls or as secretions.

The metaplasma of Hanstein, i. e. that part of the protoplasm which holds the formative material, is colored almost scarlet by Hanstein's aniline violet.

Poulsen, Bot. Micro-Chem. (trans.), p. 82.

metaplast (met'-a-plast), n. [Gr. μετά, over, + πλάστος, verbal adj. of πλάσσειν, form, mold. Cf. metaplasma.] In gram., a word or the stem of a word exhibiting metaplasma.

metaplastic (met'-a-plas'tik), a. [metaplast + -ic.] Pertaining to, exhibiting, or characterized by metaplasma.

metaplastology (met'-a-plas-tol'-ō-jī), n. [Gr. μετά, over, + πλάστος, verbal adj. of πλάσσειν, form, + Gr. -λογία, < λένω, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine or science of metaplasia.

Haeckel used also the term Anaplastology for the physiological relations of the stages of progressive growth and those of the Epacme of groups, Metaplastology for those of the adult and the Acme of groups, and Cataplastology for those of the senile stages and the Paracme of groups.

Amer. Nat., XXII, 882.

metapleur (met'-a-plōr), n. [Gr. μετά, behind, + πλευρά, the side.] A posterior part or extent of the lateral epipleura or epipleural fold of Amphioxus, behind the preoral epipleura; the atrial epipleura, corresponding in extent to the atrial cavity. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 184.

metapleural (met'-a-plō'ral), a. [metapleura + -al.] 1. In entom., posterior and lateral, as a portion of a metathoracic segment; of or pertaining to the metapleuron. 2. Of or pertaining to the metapleuron.

metapleuron (met'-a-plō'ron), n.; pl. metapleura (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, with, + πλευρόν, a rib.] In entom., the lateral or pleural division of the metathorax; a metathoracic pleuron of an insect. Each metapleuron, right and left, is divided into three sclerites—an episternum, an epimeron, and a parapteron.

metapneustic (met-ap-nūs'tik), a. [Gr. μετά, behind, + πνευστικός, of or for breathing, < πνέω, breathe: see pneumatic.] In entom., having a single pair of spiracles or breathing-orifices, situated at the anal end of the body, as certain larvae.

metapodia, n. Plural of metapodium.

metapodial (met'-a-pō'di-al), a. and n. [NL. metapodialis: see metapodialia.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the metapodialia. 2. Of or pertaining to the metapodium of a mollusk.

II. n. One of the metapodialia; a metacarpal or metatarsal bone.

metapodialia (met'-a-pō'di-ā'li-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Marsh, 1880), neut. pl. of metapodialis, < metapodium, q. v.] The bones of the metacarpus and metatarsus, taken together, and collectively considered as a segment of the fore or hind limb intervening between the mesopodialia and the phalanges. See epipodialia.

metapodium (met'-a-pō'di-um), n.; pl. metapodia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + ποῖς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] The posterior one of the three sections into which the foot of some mollusks, as gastropods and pteropods, may be divided: correlated with mesopodium and propodium.

metapolitics (met'-a-pol'i-tiks), n. [Gr. μετά, beyond, + πολιτικά, politics: see politics.] A purely speculative treatment of politics unrelated to practical questions. Coleridge.

Metapontine (met'-a-pon'tin), a. and n. [L. Metapontinus, < Metapontum, < Gr. Μεταπόντιον, a city in Italy (see def.), orig. neut. of μεταπόντιος, in the midst of the sea. < μετά, amid, + πόντος, sea.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Metapontum or Metapontium, an ancient city of Magna Græcia in Italy.

Every Athenian coin displays the owl. . . every Metapontine the corn-ear, as its chief device.

The Academy, Feb. 25, 1888, p. 189.

II. n. An inhabitant of Metapontum.

metapophysis (met-ap-ō-fiz'i-al), a. [metapophysis + -al.] Of or pertaining to a metapophysis.

metapophysis (met-a-pof'i-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + ἀπόφυσις, a process: see apophysis.] In anat., a dorsolateral apophysis developed on the prezygapophysis or anterior articular process of a vertebra, especially in the lumbar region. It corresponds to the inner tubercle of the diapophysis of a thoracic vertebra. It is sometimes very highly developed, as in the armadillo, when it assists in the support of the carapace. In man, in whom it is rudimentary yet is endogenous or enveloped from an independent center of ossification, it is found in the lumbar region, as the mammillary process or mammillary tubercle. See out under lumbar.

metapore (met'-a-pōr), n. [NL. metaporus, < Gr. μετά, behind, + πόρος, passage: see pore.] A small blind pore in the median line of the medulla oblongata immediately behind the pons Varolii; the so-called foramen of Magendie.

metaporus (me-tap'-ō-rus), n.; pl. metapori (-ri). [NL.] The metapore. B. G. Wilder.

metapostscutellar (met'-a-pōst-skū'tel-ār), a. [metapostscutellum + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the metapostscutellum.

metapostscutellum (met'-a-pōst-skū'tel'um), n.; pl. metapostscutella (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. postscutellum, q. v.] The postscutellum of the metanotum; the postscutellar sclerite of the metathorax of an insect.

metapreacutal (met'-a-prē-skū'tal), a. [metapreacutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metapreacutum.

metapreacutum (met'-a-prē-skū'tum), n.; pl. metapreacuta (-tā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. preacutum, q. v.] In entom., the preacutum of the metanotum; the preacutal sclerite of the metathorax.

metapsyche (met-ap-sī'kē), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + ψυχή, soul: see Psyche.] Haeckel's name for the hind-brain or cerebellar segment of the encephalon; the metencephalon or open-cephalon.

metapsychosis (me-tap-si-kō'sis), n.; pl. metapsychoses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. μεταψυχωσις, a transfer of soul from one body to another, < μετά, over, + ψυχωσις, a giving of life or spirit: see psychosis.] The supposed action of one mind upon another without any known physical means of communication, or its effect. See psychosis and telepathy.

It would be a grave retardation of science were it assumed that this strange metapsychosis was a medical curiosity alone.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III, 422.

metapterygial (me-tap-te-rij'i-al), a. [metapterygium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metapterygium: as, metapterygial basalia.

metapterygium (me-tap-te-rij'i-um), n.; pl. metapterygia (-ā). [NL. (Huxley, 1871), < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. pterygium, q. v.] The hindmost of several basal cartilages which the pterygium of a fish, as an elasmobranch, may present. See pterygium.

metapterygoid (met-ap-ter'i-goid), a. and n. [Gr. μετά, after, + E. pterygoid.] I. a. Coming after or situated behind the true pterygoid.

A median or pterygoquadrate portion, which grows forwards in front of the metapterygoid portion.

Stewart, Encyc. Brit., XXII, 114.

II. n. A metapterygoid bone.

metaptosis (met-ap-tō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετάπτωσις, a change, < μεταπίπτειν, change, < μετά, over, + πίπτειν, fall, > πτώσις, a falling.] In logic, the change of a proposition from being false to being true, or the reverse.

metarabin (me-tar'a-bin), n. [Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. arabin.] The gum of cherry-, plum-, and almond-trees. Its chemical relations are not yet determined.

Metarrhiptæ (met-a-rip'tē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μεταρριπτειν, turn over, turn about, < μετά, over, + ρίπτειν, throw.] An order of accephalous or conchiferous mollusks founded upon the family Tridacnidae. In these gigantic bivalves the body is apparently turned half-way round, whence the name. There is a subcentral adductor muscle, and the foot protrudes in front of the beak or umbo of the shell. Gill.

metarrhiptous (met-a-rip'tus), a. Of or pertaining to the Metarrhiptæ, or having their characters.

metascuta, n. Plural of metascutum.

metascutal (met-a-skū'tal), a. [metascutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metascutum.

metascutellar (met-a-skū'tel-ār), a. [metascutellum + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the metascutellum.

metascutellum (met'-a-skū'tel'um), n.; pl. metascutella (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + NL. scutellum, q. v.] In entom., the scutellum of the metanotum; the scutellar sclerite of the metathorax.

metascutum (met-a-skū'tum), n.; pl. metascuta (-tā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + NL. scutum, q. v.] In entom., the scutum or second division of the metanotum. The name is principally used in descriptions of Hymenoptera, Diptera, and Neuroptera, in which the metascutum generally forms an oblique or vertical surface behind the wings and above the insertion of the abdomen.

metasilicate (met-a-sil'i-kāt), n. [< metasilicic + -ate.] A salt of the hypothetical metasilicic acid H_2SiO_3 ; often called in mineralogy a bisilicate: as, calcium metasilicate (the mineral wollastonite, $CaSiO_3$ or $CaO.SiO_2$).

metasilicic (met'-a-si-lis'ik), a. [Gr. μετά, with, + E. silicic.] A word used only in the phrase metasilicic acid. See metasilicate.

metasoma (met-a-sō'mā), n.; pl. metasomata (-mā-tā). [NL.: see metasome.] Same as metasome.

metasomatic (met'-a-sō-mat'ik), a. [metasoma (-soma-) + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the metasome of a cephalopod. 2. Pertaining to or resulting from metasomatism: as, metasomatic rocks.

metasomatism (met-a-sō'mā-tizm), n. [As metasomat(osis) + -ism.] Same as metasomatosis.

metasomatosis (met-a-sō'mā-tō'sis), n. [LL., < Gr. μετά, over, + σῶμα (sōma-), body.] In lithol., a term used by a few writers on chemical geology with various shades of meaning, but chiefly in propounding certain theories of the transformation of one rock into another of a very different kind (as of limestone into granite), changes recognized as possible by but few geologists. See metamorphism.

Although the crystalline rocks . . . have been supposed to be occasionally the subject of wide-spread metasomatosis, we may properly restrict the title of a general metasomatic hypothesis to that which seeks to explain the derivation of the principal crystalline silicated rocks from limestones.

T. S. Hunt, Min. Physiology and Physiography, p. 106.

metasome (met'-a-sōm), n. [NL. metasoma, < Gr. μετά, after, + σῶμα, body.] The posterior part of the body of a cephalopod, which is enveloped in the mantle and contains the viscera. The name is also given to the posterior part of the body of bivalve mollusks, behind the mesosome and the foot, containing the posterior adductor muscle.

metastannate (met-a-stan'āt), n. [< metastannic + -ate.] A salt of metastannic acid.

metastannic (met-a-stan'ik), a. [Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. stannic.] An epithet applied to the hydrate or acid produced by digesting tin in nitric acid. It is isomeric with stannic acid, but quite different in its properties.

metastasis (me-tas'tā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μεταστάσις, a removal, change, departure, < μεταστέλλω, put in another place, change, remove, < μετά, over, + στέλλω, place: see stasis.] 1. Change of substance; conversion of one substance into another.

He considers what not unfrequently happens in distempered bodies by the metastasis of the morbid matter.

Boyle, Works, II, 197.

2. In pathol., the production of local disease in some part of the body from a focus of more or less similar disease in some other part not immediately adjacent. 3. In bot., metabolism.

metastatic (met-a-stat'ik), a. [< metastasis (-at-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to metastasis; characterized by or consisting in metastasis.

Those metastatic changes which take place in the ordinary growth of plants or the storing of reserve material.

Beesey, Botany, p. 186.

metastatically (met-a-stat'i-kal-i), adv. By metastasis.

metasternal (met-a-stér'nal), a. [< metasternum + -al.] In entom., metathoracic and sternal or ventral, as a sclerite of an insect's thorax; of or pertaining to the metasternum. — Metasternal epimera and episterna, the side pieces of the metathorax, adjoining the sternum. — Metasternal pores, minute openings at the sides of the metasternum, found in certain beetles of the family Cerambycidae. They exhale a musky odor produced by scent-organs within the body. Also called scent-pores.

metasternum (met-a-stér'num), n.; pl. metasterna (-nā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + στέρνον, breast, > NL. sternum, q. v.] 1. In anat., the hindmost segment or last sterneber of the breast-bone; the xiphisternum, in man represented by the xiphoid cartilage or ensiform appendage. 2. In entom., the sternite of the metathorax; the median part of the postpectus.

metasthenic (met-a-sthē'ik), a. [Gr. μετά, behind, + σθένος, strength, might.] Strong in the hinder parts; having the strength or weight of organization behind the middle of the body, as a kangaroo.

metastibnite (met-a-stib'nit), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. stibnite.] Antimony trisulphid, occurring as an amorphous reddish coating upon silicious sinter at the Steamboat Springs, Washoe county, Nevada.

metastoma (me-tas'tō-mā), n.; pl. metastomata (met-a-stō'mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + στόμα, mouth.] In Crustacea, a median development, often bifid, of the ventral part of a somite immediately behind the mouth. It is the so-called labium or under lip, composed of small pieces immediately below or behind the mouth. Also called hypostoma. See the quotation, and cut under cephalothorax.

On each side of, and behind, the mouth [of the crawfish] are two little elongated oval calcified plates, between which an oval process, setose at its extremity, proceeds downward and forward, and lies in close apposition with the posterior face of the mandible of its side. This is one-half of what is termed by most authors the labium; but, to avoid confusion with the labium of insects, from which it is wholly different, it may be called the metastoma.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 272.

metatarsal (met-a-tār'sal), a. and n. [< metatarsus + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the metatarsus, or to one of the bones that form it.

II. n. One of the bones of the metatarsus. They are not more than five in number, reckoned as first, etc., from the inner to the outer side of the foot. When there are fewer than five, it is always the lateral metatarsals which have disappeared, so that an animal with three metatarsals has lost the first and fifth; in one with a single metatarsal the third or middle one remains. Metatarsals may ankylose together, as two do in the metatarsus of the ox, and three in that of any recent bird: in the latter case the compound bone is further complicated by fusion with it of tarsal elements, constituting a tarsometatarsus (which see). See cut at metatarsus.—Accessory metatarsal, in ornith. See metatarsus, 1.

metatarsale (met-a-tār-sā'lē), n.; pl. metatarsalia (-lī-ā). [NL.: see metatarsal.] A bone of the metatarsus; one of the metatarsals.

metatarsalgia (met-a-tār-sal'jī-ā), n. [NL., < metatarsus + Gr. ἄλγος, pain.] In pathol., pain in the metatarsus. Lancet, No. 3423, p. 707.

metatarsē (met-a-tārs), n. [< NL. metatarsus, q. v.] The metatarsus.

metatarsi, n. Plural of metatarsus.

metatarsodigital (met-a-tār-sō-dij'i-tal), a. [< NL. metatarsus + L. digitus, finger, + -al.] Same as metatarsophalangeal.

metatarsophalangeal (met-a-tār'sō-fā-lan'jē-l), a. [< NL. metatarsus + phalanges + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metatarsus and to the phalanges: as, a metatarsophalangeal articulation or ligament.

metatarsus (met-a-tār'sus), n.; pl. metatarsi (-sī). [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + τάρσος, in mod. sense 'tarsus': see tarsus.] 1. The middle segment of the three of which the foot, or third division of the hind limb, consists, considered with special reference to its bony structure. It is the part of the foot between the tarsus and the toes, in man corresponding closely with the instep, and composed of five bones. (See cut under foot.) In a horse it is the part of the hind leg between the hock and the fetlock, and has but one functional bone. In birds it is the part popularly called the phant, and in descriptive ornithology known as the tarsus. In most birds the metatarsus is naked and scaly, and extends from the bases of the toes to the suffrago or first joint above. It usually consists of a single stout bone, representing three metatarsals fused together, and further complicated by the fusion of distal tarsal elements with its proximal end. In birds with four toes the metatarsus includes a small separate bone known as the accessory metatarsal, which is the metatarsal bone of the hallux or hind toe, the metatarsus hallucis.

2. In entom.: (a) The first one of the joints of the tarsus, when it is large or otherwise distinguished from the rest, which are then called collectively the dactylus. Also called planta, in which case the other joints are collectively known as the digitus. The peculiarly expanded and bristly metatarsus or planta of bees is known as the scopula. (b) With some authors, the hind foot; the entire tarsus of each hind leg; each of the third pair of tarsi. When this nomenclature is used, the tarsus of the middle leg is called mesotarsus and that of the fore leg protarsus. (c) The sixth joint of a spider's leg, being the first of the two which form the foot.—Flexor metatarsi. Same as peroneus tertius (which see, under peroneus).

hock and the fetlock, and has but one functional bone. In birds it is the part popularly called the phant, and in descriptive ornithology known as the tarsus. In most birds the metatarsus is naked and scaly, and extends from the bases of the toes to the suffrago or first joint above. It usually consists of a single stout bone, representing three metatarsals fused together, and further complicated by the fusion of distal tarsal elements with its proximal end. In birds with four toes the metatarsus includes a small separate bone known as the accessory metatarsal, which is the metatarsal bone of the hallux or hind toe, the metatarsus hallucis.

2. In entom.: (a) The first one of the joints of the tarsus, when it is large or otherwise distinguished from the rest, which are then called collectively the dactylus. Also called planta, in which case the other joints are collectively known as the digitus. The peculiarly expanded and bristly metatarsus or planta of bees is known as the scopula. (b) With some authors, the hind foot; the entire tarsus of each hind leg; each of the third pair of tarsi. When this nomenclature is used, the tarsus of the middle leg is called mesotarsus and that of the fore leg protarsus. (c) The sixth joint of a spider's leg, being the first of the two which form the foot.—Flexor metatarsi. Same as peroneus tertius (which see, under peroneus).

metatartaric (met'a-tār-tar'ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, with, + E. tartaric.] A word used only in the following phrase:—Metatartaric acid, an amorphous form of ordinary tartaric acid, prepared by keeping it for some time at its melting temperature.

metatatic (met-a-tat'ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, with, + τάσις ('rati-), tension, intensity, force, < τάρσις, verbal adj. of τέρω, stretch: see tend.] Relating to a coincidence of directions of stress and strain.—Metatatic isotropy, plane, etc. See the nouns.—Orthogonal or principal metatatic axes. See axis.

metatatically (met-a-tat'i-kal-i), adv. In a metatatic manner or sense.

metatela (met-a-tē'lā), n.; pl. metatelas (-lā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. tela, q. v.] The tela of the metencephalon; the inferior choroid tela; in man, a very delicate tissue of the brain, more commonly called velum medullare posterius. See tela, velum. Wilder and Gage.

Metatheria (met-a-thē'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μετά, between, + θήρ, a wild beast.] A subclass of Mammalia including the existing Marsupialia and their hypothetical extinct ancestors, as well as other mammals intermediate between marsupials and placental mammals. The marsupials are the only known examples, the term being thus equivalent to Didelphia. It is correlated with Prototheria and Eutheria.

metatherian (met-a-thē'ri-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Metatheria, or having their characters: as, a metatherian mammal; the metatherian type.

II. n. A member of the Metatheria.

metathesis (me-tath'e-sis), n. [LL., < Gr. μετάθεσις, transposition, metathesis, < μετατίθεμαι, put over, transpose, < μετά, over, + τίθεμαι, put: see thesis.] 1. In gram., transposition, more especially of the letters, sounds, or syllables of a word, as in the case of Anglo-Saxon ācsian, āscian, English ax, ask; Anglo-Saxon brīd, English bird.

The transposition of vowels and liquids—metathesis—is an ordinary and familiar phenomenon of language.

J. Hadley, Essays, p. 150.

2. In surg., a change in place of a morbid substance; an operation removing a morbid agent from one part to another, as in couching for cataract.—3. In logic, same as conversion.

metathetic (met-a-thet'ik), a. [< Metathesis (-thet-) + -ic.] Of the nature of or containing metathesis.

metathetical (met-a-thet'i-kal), a. [< metathetic + -al.] Same as metathetic.

metathoracic (met'a-thō-ras'ik), a. [< metathorax + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metathorax of an insect.—Metathoracic case, the metathoracotheca.—Metathoracic legs, the third pair of legs of any hexapod; the hind legs.—Metathoracic wings, the posterior or lower wings.

metathoracotheca (met-a-thō'ra-kō-thē'kē), n.; pl. metathoracothecae (-sē). [NL., < metathorax + θήκη, a case.]

In entom., the metathoracic case, or that part of the integument of a pupa covering the metathorax. It is generally indistinguishable in the Lepidoptera and Diptera.

metathorax (met-a-thō'raks), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + θώραξ, the chest.] In entom., the third and last segment of the thorax, succeeding the mesothorax, preceding the abdomen, and bearing the third pair of legs and the second pair of wings.—Declivity of the metathorax. See declivity.

metatome (met'a-tōm), n. [< Gr. μετά, among, between, + τμή, a cutting, < τέμνω, raise, cut.] In arch., the space between two dentils. Gwili.

metaxin (me-tak'sin), n. [< Gr. μετὰξιν, between (< μετά, between), + -in.] A distinct proteid substance entering into the composition of the fibrillar structure of chloroplastids.

metaxite (me-tak'sit), n. [< Gr. μετὰξιν, between, + -ite.] In mineral., a variety of serpentine occurring in fibrous or columnar forms with a silky luster.

metayage (me-tā'yāj; F. pron. mā-tā-yāzh'), n. [< F. métayage; as metayer + -age.] The cultivation of land on shares; the metayer system of agriculture.

Metayage—that is to say, a kind of temporary partnership or joint venture, in which the proprietor supplies the land and the seed, and the peasants do all the work with their own horses and implements.

D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 519.

metayer (me-tā'yēr; F. pron. mā-tā-yā'), n. [< F. métayer, < ML. medietarius, one who tills land for half the produce, < L. medietas (-t-), middle place, half: see moiety, mediety.] A cultivator who tills a farm or piece of ground for the owner, on condition of receiving a share of the produce, generally a half, the owner generally furnishing the whole or a part of the stock, tools, etc. This system of cultivation, called metayage or the metayer system, prevails in the central and southern parts of France and in most of Italy, and is practised to a considerable extent in the southern United States.

The principle of the metayer system is that the labourer or peasant makes his engagement directly with the landowner, and pays, not a fixed rent, either in money or in kind, but a certain proportion of the produce, or rather of what remains of the produce after deducting what is considered necessary to keep up the stock. The proportion is usually, as the name imports, one-half; but in several districts in Italy it is two-thirds. Respecting the supply of stock, the custom varies from place to place; in some places the landlord furnishes the whole, in others half, in others some particular part, as for instance the cattle and seed, the labourer providing the implements.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., II. viii. § 1.

The metayer has less motive to exertion than the peasant proprietor, since only half the fruits of his industry, instead of the whole, are his own.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., II. viii. § 2.

metaynt, n. A Middle English form of mitten.

Metazoa (met-a-zō'ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of metazoon, q. v.] All those animals which are above the Protozoa, and which in the course of their development undergo certain metamorphoses, consisting of the primary segmentation of a true egg or ovum, and the subsequent passage through an embryonic condition in which they possess at least two distinct germinal layers; animals exhibiting cellular differentiation. The Metazoa are distinguished from the Protozoa in that the substance of the body is differentiated into histogenic elements—that is to say, into cells. In all the Metazoa the ovum has the form of a nucleated cell, the first step in the process of development being the production of a blastoderm by the subdivision of that cell, the cells of the blastoderm giving rise in turn to two layers of cells, endoderm and ectoderm, between which, in most cases, a mesoderm appears, to be itself split in two layers; such a four-layered germ developing finally all the histological elements of the adult body. With the exception of certain parasites, and the extremely modified males of a few species, all these animals possess a permanent alimentary cavity lined by a special layer of endodermal cells. Sexual reproduction is the rule, and very generally the male element has the form of filiform spermatozoa. The lowest term in the series of the Metazoa is represented by the Porifera or sponges. Those of the Metazoa which possess a notochord, and in the adult state have the trunk divided into segments or myotomes, constitute the subkingdom Vertebrata; the rest are the several subkingdoms of invertebrates. Compare Protozoa. See Metazoa, and cuts under gastrulation.

metazoan (met-a-zō'an), a. and n. [< Metazoa + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Metazoa.

The Metazoan segmentation of the ovum.

Encyc. Brit., XX. 419.

II. n. A member of the Metazoa; a metazoon.

metazoic (met-a-zō'ik), a. [< Metazoa + -ic.] Pertaining to the Metazoa, or having their characters.

metazoon (met-a-zō'on), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + ζῷον, an animal.] One of the Metazoa; any animal which has a gastrula stage, or which undergoes in the course of its development a process of delamination or of gastrulation, whether by emboly or by epiboly.

If we employ the term gastrula in the broad sense, . . . it may be truly said that every metazoon passes through the gastrula stage in the course of its development.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 584.

Piers Plowman (A), viii. 145.

metelesst, a. A Middle English form of meatless.

metely, a. See meetly.

metembryo (me-tem-'bri-ō), n. [Gr. metá, after, + embryon, embryo: see embryo.] The gastrula stage of the metazoan embryo, parallel with the adult of some sponges, as ascons. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1887. See cut under gastrula.

metembryonic (me-tem-bri-on'ik), a. [Gr. metembryon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a metembryo.

metempiric (met-em-pir'ik), n. [Gr. metá, beyond, + empeiria, experience: see empiric.] One who believes in the metempirical or transcendental philosophy. Also metempiricist.

metempirical (met-em-pir'i-kal), a. [Gr. metempiric + -al.] In metaph., beyond or outside of experience; not based on experience; transcendental; a priori: opposed to empirical or experiential.

The metempirical region is the void where Speculation roams unchecked, where Sense has no footing, where Experiment can exercise no control, and where Calculation ends in impossible Quantities.

G. H. Lewes, Proba. of Life and Mind, l. 1. § 15.

metempiricism (met-em-pir'i-sizm), n. [Gr. metempiric + -ism.] In metaph., a system of philosophy based on a priori reasoning; transcendentalism.

metempiricist (met-em-pir'i-sist), n. [Gr. metempiric + -ist.] Same as metempiric.

metempsychose (me-temp-si-kōz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metempsychosed, ppr. metempsychosing. [Gr. metempsychosis.] To transfer from one body to another, as the soul; cause to undergo metempsychosis.

The souls of usurers after their death Lucian affirms to be metempsychosed, or translated into the bodies of asses, and there remain certain years for poor men to take their pennyworth out of their bones.

Peascham, Blazoning.

metempsychosis (me-temp-si-kō'sis), n. [LL. metempsychosis (rare), < Gr. μετεμψύχωσις, the transference of the soul from one body into another, < μετεμψύχω, make the soul pass from one body into another, < μετά, over, + ἐμψύχω, put a soul into, animate, ἐμψύχος, having life, < ἐν, in, + ψυχή, soul, life: see Psyche, and cf. psychosis, metapsychosis.] Transmigration of the soul; the passing of the soul of a person after death into another body, either that of a human being or that of an animal: a doctrine held by various ancient peoples and by Pythagoras and his followers, and still maintained by Brahmins and some others: also loosely used of such a transfer of the soul of a living person.

I cannot believe the wisdom of Pythagoras did ever positively, and in a literal sense, affirm his metempsychosis, or impossible transmigration of the souls of men into beasts.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 37.

The Mollah and the Christian dog

Whittier, The Haschisch.

metempsychosize (me-temp-si-kō'siz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metempsychosized, ppr. metempsychosizing. [Gr. metempsychosis + -ize.] To cause to pass after death into the body of some other living thing: said of the soul.

Isaac Walton . . . metempsychosized into a frog.

Southey, Doctor, cxxii. (Davies.)

metempsychosis (met-emp-tō'sis), n. [Gr. μετά, beyond, + ἐμψύχωσις, a falling upon, < ἐμψύχω, fall upon or in, < ἐν, in, + πύπτω, fall.] In chron., the solar equation which would be necessary to prevent the calendar new moon from happening a day too late, or the suppression of the bissextile once in 134 years. The opposite to this is the proempsychosis, or the addition of a day every 300 years and another every 2,400 years.

metencephalic (met-en-se-fal'ik or -sef'a-lik), a. [Gr. metencephalon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metencephalon, in either sense.

metencephalon (met-en-sef'a-lon), n.; pl. metencephala (-lā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + ἐνκεφαλος, the brain: see encephalon.] 1. The afterbrain; the medulla oblongata as far as the pons Varolii: synonymous with myelencephalon of Huxley and others, and macromyelom of Owen. Quain; Wilder and Gage. — 2. The cerebellar segment of the brain, the chief parts of which are the cerebellum and pons Varolii. Huxley. See cuts under brain and encephalon.

metensomatosis (met-en-sō-ma-tō'sis), n. [LL., < LGr. μετεσώματος, a putting into another body, < μετεσώματιν, put into another body, < Gr. μετά, over, + ἐσώματιν, put into a body, embody, < ἐσώματος, in the body, < ἐν, in, + σώμα, body.] The transference of the elements of one body into another body and their conversion into its substance, as by decomposition and assimilation.

Is it not indisputable that man's body . . . is composed of the very same materials, the same protein, and fat, and salinea, and water, which constitute the inorganic world — which may unquestionably have served long ago as the dead material which was vivified and utilized in the bodies of extinct creatures, and which may serve in endless metensomatosis (if the word, which has the authority of Clemens Alexandrinus, and which is now imperiously demanded by the wants of science, may be pardoned on the score of necessity) for we know not what organisms yet to come?

Farrar.

metenteron (met-en-tē-ron), n.; pl. metentera (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + έντερον, intestine: see enteron.] The enteron, in any seconddary, differentiated, or specialized state occurring from modification of its primary condition of archenteron.

metenteronic (met-en-tē-ron'ik), a. [Gr. metenteron + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metenteron.

meteogram (mē'tē-ō-gram), n. [Short for meteorogram*, < Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor (see meteor), + γράμμα, a writing: see gram.] A diagram composed of the tracings made by several self-recording meteorological instruments, as the thermograph and the barograph.

meteorograph (mē'tē-ō-gráf), n. [Short for meteorograph.] Same as meteorograph.

The meteorograph, with the anemograph.

R. Abercromby, Nature, XXXVI. 319.

meteor (mē'tē-ōr), n. [Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor (see meteor), < NL. meteora, < NL. meteora, < Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor (def. 1), usually in pl. μετέωρα, lit. 'things in the air,' neut. of μετέωρος, lifted up, on high, in air, < μετά, beyond, + ἀίρειν, lift up, raise (> ἔωρα, another form of αἰώρα, a being lifted up or suspended on high, hovering, anything suspended).] 1. Any atmospheric phenomenon.

Hail, an ordinary meteor; murrain of cattle an ordinary disease, yet for a plague to obdure Pharaoh miraculously wrought.

Sp. Hall, Invisible World, l. § 6.

Except they be watered from higher regions, and fructifying meteors of knowledge, these weeds must so lose their alimantal sappe, and wither of themselves.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., Pref.

In starry flake, and pellicle,

All day the hoary meteor fell.

Whittier, Snow-Bound.

Specifically — 2. A transient fiery or luminous body seen in or through the atmosphere, usually in its more elevated region; a shooting-star. If it reaches the surface of the earth, it is called a meteorite, formerly aérolite, and also (very rarely) uranolite.

And all their silver crescents then I saw

Like falling meteors spent, and set for ever

Under the cross of Malta.

Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, ll. 1.

The imperial ensign; which, full high advanced,

Shone like a meteor, streaming to the wind.

Milton, P. L., l. 637.

3. A small body moving in space, and of the same nature as those which become visible by encountering our atmosphere. There is reason to suppose that such bodies are very numerous, and that a large proportion of them are concentrated in swarms: it is considered very probable that a comet is only such a meteoric swarm.

meteor. An abbreviation of meteorology, meteorological.

meteor-cloud (mē'tē-ōr-klood), n. 1. A flock of small meteoroids moving in space. Also called meteoric swarm. — 2. A cloud-like train left by a meteor in the upper air. [Rare.]

meteor-dust (mē'tē-ōr-dust), n. Matter in infinitesimal particles supposed to be floating throughout free space, and gradually settling upon the surfaces of the heavenly bodies.

Sir W. Thomson . . . shows that meteor-dust, accumulating at the rate of one foot in 4,000 years, would account for the remainder of retardation.

Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 248.

meteoric (mē'tē-ōr'ik), a. [= F. météorique = Sp. meteorico = Pg. It. meteorico, < NL. meteoricus, pertaining to meteors, ML. in the air, on high, < NL. meteorum, a meteor: see meteor.] 1†. Of the upper air; ethereal; empyreal.

The fiery particles ascended to the most meteoric or highest regions. Sharon Turner, Sacred Hist. of World (tr. of Diod. Siculus), p. 23.

2. Pertaining to or of the nature of a meteor; consisting of meteors: as, meteoric stones; meteoric showers.

Our nature is meteoric, we respect (because we partake so) both earth and heaven.

Donne, Letters, xxxvii.

3. Flashing like a meteor; transiently or irregularly brilliant.

Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Shaftesbury (grandson of the first earl, the famous meteoric politician of the reign of Charles II.), was born in 1671 and died in 1713.

Craik, Hist. Eng. Lit., II. 235.

Meteoric astronomy, that branch of science which treats of meteors and meteoroids in their astronomical relations. — Meteoric iron. See iron and meteorite. — Meteoric ring, a swarm of meteoroids more or less thickly scattered along the entire orbit in which they circulate about the sun or other central body, so as to form a ring around it. The rings of Saturn are probably thus constituted. — Meteoric showers, showers of meteors or shooting-stars occurring periodically, and especially in the months of August and November. The maximum brilliancy occurs every thirty-three years, and then sometimes for four years in succession there are showers of unusual magnitude. They are now known to be connected with comets. — Meteoric stones, aérolites. See meteorite. —

Meteoric swarm. Same as meteor-cloud.—Meteoric waters, waters which accrue from condensation of the vapors suspended in the atmosphere. Thomas, Med. Dict.
meteorical (mē'tē-ōr'i-kāl), a. [< meteoric + -al.] Same as meteoric. [Rare.]

I see a resemblance of that meteoric light which appears in moorish places, that seems fire, but is nothing but a dimmy glittering exhalation. Sp. Hall, Soliloquies, xii.

Meteorinae (mē'tē-ō-rī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Meteorus + -inae.] A subfamily of Braconidae or adscite ichneumon-flies, typified by the genus Meteorus, mainly parasitic on lepidopterous insects, having the abdomen petiolate and the fore wings with three submarginal cells.

meteorism (mē'tē-ō-rizm), n. [= F. météorisme = Sp. Pg. It. meteorismo, < NL. meteorismus, < Gr. μετεωρισμός, a being raised up, swelling, < μετεωρίων, raised up, < μετεωρος, raised up: see meteor.] In pathol., flatulent distention of the abdomen; tympanitis.

meteorite (mē'tē-ōr-it), n. [< meteor + -ite.] A mineral or metallic mass of extraterrestrial origin, or which, to use the common expression, has "fallen from the heavens." Bodies of this kind were formerly often called aérolites, but meteorite is now their generally accepted name among scientific men. The fall of meteorites upon the earth is a by no means infrequent occurrence, and records of such events date back to many centuries before the present era. Traditions point to the very early use of meteoric iron for the manufacture of weapons; and it is also known that meteorites were not infrequently the objects of worship in various parts of the world. In spite of this, the fall of rocks or metals from the heavens seemed to be so improbable an event that full credence was not given by scientific men to stories of such occurrences until about the beginning of the present century, when, several falls having taken place (at Barbotan, France, 1780; Siena, 1794; Wold Cottage, Yorkshire, Eng., 1795; Salé, France, 1798; Benares, 1798; L'Aigle, France, 1803), the details of some of which were thoroughly investigated, a further denial of their genuineness became impossible. From the time of the fall at L'Aigle all doubt in the matter was abandoned. There are now several collections of meteorites, each of which contains specimens of between 300 and 400 different falls, and the whole number known is not far from 400, although it is by no means the case with all these occurrences that the specimens were seen to fall; many of them have been found on the earth's surface, but have been recognized as being extraterrestrial by their peculiar appearance and composition. The most important facts with regard to meteorites may be concisely stated as follows: They have not been found to contain any element not known to occur on the earth; they have furnished no evidence of the existence of life on the body or bodies of which they originally formed a part; they bear no indications of having been formed in the presence of water, or of the existence of water beyond the earth's atmosphere in the regions from which they came; they do exhibit abundant evidence of having had what geologists would call an "igneous origin"; they are never granitic in character, but resemble very closely certain volcanic rocks of not infrequent occurrence, with this difference, that in the case of the meteorites the iron associated with the silicate combinations exists in the metallic form, while in the terrestrial volcanic rocks it is, with rare exceptions, oxidized. Furthermore, meteorites, almost without exception, show a certain family resemblance; so that it is necessary to admit, either that they all originally formed a part of one celestial body, or else that, having come from various members of the solar system, or from other systems, these have a wonderful resemblance to each other and to the earth itself. The most obvious division of meteorites is into metallic and stony, but the passage from one class to the other is by no means abrupt one. All metallic meteorites agree in that the predominating metal is iron, with which nickel is almost invariably associated; indeed, it has not been proved that there is any meteoric iron entirely free from that metal. With the nickel cobalt is almost always found, as is the case in terrestrial combinations. Tin and copper are also frequently found in meteorites in small quantity. The precious metals have not been detected in them. Meteorites composed almost entirely of metallic (nickeliferous) iron, forming a nearly homogeneous mass, have been denominated siderolites. These, however, almost always contain irregular nodular masses of pyrrhotite, schreibersite (phosphuret of iron and nickel), either one or both, and occasionally of graphite. In a large proportion of the meteoric irons, etching the polished surface with an acid develops the so-called "Widmannstätten figures." The development of these figures on the polished surface of a mass of iron found upon the earth's surface, and in regard to the time of whose fall nothing was known, was formerly considered to be sufficient evidence of the celestial origin of such a mass, especially if, in addition, the presence of nickel could be shown by chemical analysis. While most of the metallic masses thus referred have almost certainly been correctly classed among the meteorites, there may be cases in which such reference has not been justifiable, since it is now known that all celestial irons do not give the Widmannstätten figures, while the iron found in large quantity and over a wide area, associated with and embedded in basalt, near Ovilak in Greenland, contains nickel, and gives, when etched, figures which have generally been considered as Widmannstätten, although others have denied that they could properly be so denominated. The terrestrial origin of the Ovilak iron is, however, now generally admitted, although for a considerable time after its discovery this was not the case. The wide extent of the area over which this iron occurs, and its peculiar intimate association with the minerals of which the basalt is made up, forbid the idea that the metal could have fallen from above into lava in process of eruption, which was at first the favorite theory of its origin. Next in order to the siderolites come the pallasites, so named from the fact that a large meteorite of this class was in 1772 discovered in Siberia by the distinguished traveler Pallas. Under the name of pallasites are comprehended those meteorites which consist of a spongy or vesicular mass of iron, the cavities of which are in most cases partly or entirely filled with olivin, with which various other minerals are frequently associated, enstatite and bronzite being the most common, while chromite is of not infrequent occurrence. Both siderolites and pallasites belong to the class of metallic meteorites. By far the larger part of the stony meteorites are included under the designation of chondrites. In these the iron is distributed in fine particles through a more or less intimate mixture of silicates, with which chromite and magnetic pyrites are frequently associated, the silicates being chiefly olivin and bronzite. The name chondrite has reference to the fact that in this class of meteorites the material of which they are composed occurs in the form of rounded grains (chondri). The chondritic meteorites have, however, a quite varied structure, in some few cases passing into a breccia; they have been divided into numerous subgroups in accordance with these structural variations. Most of the stony meteorites contain iron disseminated through their mass in grains or nodules; but there are a few which are destitute of such metallic particles. There are also a few stony meteorites which do not exhibit any traces of a chondritic structure: the minerals of which these are made up do not, however, differ very essentially from those occurring in the chondrites. There are also a few very anomalous meteorites which contain carbonaceous matter associated with the stony chondritic material. This carbon is not graphitic, but is combined with hydrogen and oxygen, the product resembling to a certain extent that resulting from the decay of organic matter, but no traces of vegetable tissue have been discovered in these carbonaceous meteorites, which are only five or six in number. One or two interesting facts remain to be mentioned. The first is that since the phenomena of meteorites began to be observed and studied there have been extremely few falls of metallic meteorites. Of all the meteoric irons in the various collections, those of Hraschina in Austria (1751), of Dickson county, Tennessee (1855), of Braunau in Bohemia (1847), and a few others (in all probably about nine), are the only ones positively known to have fallen; all the others are considered meteoric on account of their peculiar appearance and chemical composition. The observed falls of stony meteorites, on the other hand, are numerous. Another remarkable fact is that all the meteorites which are known to have fallen are of infinitesimally small size as compared with the earth. In the fall of L'Aigle some 2,000 to 3,000 stones were estimated to have reached the earth, and of these the largest weighed only seven or eight pounds. The largest meteorites of which the fall was observed are that of Ensisheim (1492), which weighed about 280 pounds, that of Juvinas (1821), 242 pounds, and that of Emmett county, Iowa (1879), when a considerable number of stones fell, the largest of them weighing 437 pounds. Some masses of iron believed to be meteorites, the date of whose fall is unknown, are much larger than this, but still utterly insignificant in size, not only as compared with the earth or its satellite, but even with the smallest celestial body of which anything is definitely known, namely the outer satellite of Mars, which has been estimated at from five to twenty miles in diameter. The mass of iron on the river Bendegó in Brazil has been variously estimated at from seven to ten tons in weight; that of Tucuman (Campo del Cielo) is said to weigh fifteen tons. The Santa Caterina iron appears to be still larger, having been estimated at twenty-five tons; but doubts have been expressed as to whether this is really of celestial origin.—Neumann's lines, structural lines described by J. G. Neumann as occurring in the Braunau meteorite.

meteoritic (mē'tē-ō-rit'ik), a. [< meteorite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a meteorite or to meteorites.

The bright lines from the interspaces, now at their minimum and containing vapours at a very high temperature, . . . balance the absorption of the meteoritic nuclei. Nature, XXXVIII, 79.

meteorize (mē'tē-ō-riz), v. [< meteor + -ize.] To take the form of a meteor; ascend in vapors.

To end the dewy may meteorize and emit their finer spirits. Evelyn, Pomona, l.

meteorograph (mē'tē-ō-rō-gráf), n. [= F. météorographe = Sp. meteorógrafo, < Gr. μετεωρον, a meteor, + γραφειν, write.] An instrument that combines the registering apparatus of a barograph, thermograph, anemograph, etc., in such a manner as to obtain on the same sheet a continuous record of the variations of the several meteorological elements.

meteorographic (mē'tē-ō-rō-gráf'ik), a. [= F. météorographique = Sp. meteorográfico; as meteorograph-y + -ic.] Pertaining to meteorography.

meteorography (mē'tē-ō-rō-gráf'i), n. [= F. météorographie = Sp. meteorografía, < Gr. μετεωρον, a meteor, + -γραφία, < γραφειν, write.]

Meteorology; specifically, the registration of meteorological phenomena.

meteoroid (mē'tē-ō-roid), n. [< Gr. μετεωρον, a meteor, + ειδος, form.] A body traveling in space, and of the same nature as those which on entering the earth's atmosphere become visible as meteors.

meteoroidal (mē'tē-ō-roi'dal), a. [< meteoroid + -al.] Pertaining to meteoroids or meteorors.

This remarkable group of planetoidal or meteoroidal bodies forms a tolerably wide zone or ring between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter. Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 29.

meteorolite (mē'tē-ō-rō-lit), n. [= F. météorolithe = Pg. meteorolithe, < Gr. μετεωρον, a meteor, + λίθος, a stone.] Same as meteorite.

meteorologic (mē'tē-ō-rō-loj'ik), a. [= F. météorologique = Sp. meteorológico = Pg. It. meteorológico, < NL. meteorologicus, < Gr. μετεωρολογικός, pertaining to meteorology, < μετεωρολογία, meteorology: see meteorology.] Same as meteorological.

Every extensive region [has] its own meteorologic conditions. H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 7.

meteorological (mē'tē-ō-rō-loj'ik), a. [< meteorologic + -al.] Of or pertaining to weather; atmospheric; specifically, of or pertaining to the science of meteorology.—Meteorological curve, a line or diagram which presents graphically the successive actual or mean values of any meteorological element.—Meteorological elements, the fundamental data of meteorological observations: namely, the temperature, pressure, humidity, and electrical potential of the air; the rate of evaporation; the amount and kind of precipitation; the direction and velocity of the wind; the kind, direction of motion, and velocity of clouds; the duration of sunshine; and the intensity of solar and terrestrial radiation.—Meteorological table. (a) A statistical table of meteorological data: also called meteorological register. (b) A table for correcting or reducing meteorological observations.

meteorologically (mē'tē-ō-rō-loj'ik-i), adv. In a meteorological aspect; with reference to meteorological conditions; by means of meteorology, or according to meteorological principles or methods.

meteorologist (mē'tē-ō-rōl'ō-jist), n. [= F. météorologiste = Sp. meteorologista; as meteorology + -ist.] One who is versed in meteorology; an expert in the conduct and discussion of meteorological observations; a student of the laws of atmospheric motions and phenomena.

meteorology (mē'tē-ō-rōl'ō-jī), n. [= F. météorologie = Sp. meteorología = Pg. It. meteorologia, < NL. meteorologia, < Gr. μετεωρολογία, a treatise on meteors or celestial phenomena, < μετεωρολόγος, speaking of meteors or celestial phenomena, < μετεωρον, a meteor (τὰ μετεωρα, celestial phenomena), + λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science which treats of the motions and phenomena of the earth's atmosphere; the scientific study of weather and climate, their causes, changes, relations, and effects. Abbreviated meteor.

In sundry animals we deny not a kind of natural meteorology, or innate presentation both of wind and weather. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 10.

Optical meteorology, the science of the luminous phenomena of the atmosphere.—Practical or applied meteorology, the study of the bearing and effect of weather and climate on human interests. It embraces especially: (1) weather forecasts; (2) medical meteorology, or the relation of weather and climate to health and disease; and (3) agricultural meteorology, or the relation of climate and weather to vegetable growth.—The new or higher meteorology, the explanation of the motions of the atmosphere, and the origin and development of storms, by deductive mathematical processes based on the laws of hydrodynamics and thermodynamics.—Theoretical meteorology, the study of the physics and mechanics of the atmosphere, and the cosmical influences affecting terrestrial atmospheres.

meteoromancy (mē'tē-ō-rō-man'si), n. [< Gr. μετεωρον, a meteor, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination by meteoric phenomena.

meteorometer (mē'tē-ō-rō-m'ē-tēr), n. [< Gr. μετεωρον, a meteor, + μετρον, a measure.] An apparatus for automatically transmitting from a local station, and showing or recording at a central station, the various weather items, such as direction of wind, rainfall, barometric pressure, temperature, etc. It is usually operated by electricity.

meteoroscope (mē'tē-ō-rō-skōp), n. [= F. météoroscope = Sp. meteoroscopio = Pg. meteoroscopia = It. meteoroscopo, < Gr. μετεωροσκόπιον, an instrument for taking observations of the heavenly bodies, < μετεωροσκοπος, observing the heavenly bodies, < μετεωρον, a meteor, pl. celestial phenomena, + σκοπειν, view.] An instrument formerly in use for finding the angular distances of heavenly bodies. Diderot.

And know what planet is in Casimil.

T. Tomkies (?), Albumazar, II. 5.

meteoroscopy (mē-tē-or'ō-skō-pi), n. [= F. météoroscopie = Sp. meteoroscopia; as meteoroscope + -y.] The use of the meteoroscope.

meteorous (mē-tē-or-us), a. [< Gr. μητέωρος, raised, on high; see meteor.] Having the nature of a meteor; meteoric.

The cherubim descended; on the ground
Gliding meteorous, as evening mist Risen from a river o'er the marsh glides.

Milton, P. L., xii. 629.

We must conclude that there are meteorous beings, whose eccentric orbits we know not how to describe.

I. D'Irassé, Amen. of Lit., II. 390.

meteor-system (mē-tē-or-sis'tem), n. A flock of small bodies moving together in space and acting upon each other by their mutual attractions and influences of various kinds.

Meteorus (mē-tē-ō-rus), n. [NL. (Haliday, 1835), < Gr. μητέωρος, a meteor; see meteor.] An important genus of hymenopterous parasites, typical of a subfamily Meteorinae, with many European and American species. M. hyphantria is a parasite of the fall web-worm, Hyphantria cunea, of the United States.

metepencephalic (met-ep-en-se-fal'ik or -sef'-a-lik), a. [< metepencephalon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metepencephalon.

metepencephalon (met-ep-en-sef'a-lon), n.; pl. metepencephala (-lā). [NL., < met(encephalon) + epencephalon.] A segment of the encephalon between the myelon and the mesencephalon; the metencephalon and epencephalon together considered as one segment. B. G. Wilder.

metepicæle (met-ep-i-sēl), n. [< met(encephalon) + epicæle.] The cavity of the metepencephalon; the fourth ventricle. Also metepicælia. Wilder, N. Y. Med. Jour., March 21, 1885, p. 327.

metepimeral (met-e-pim'g-ral), a. [< metepimeron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metepimeron.

metepimeron (met-e-pim'g-ron), n.; pl. metepimeræ (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + NL. epimeron, q. v.] In entom., the epimeron of the metathorax; the epimeral sclerite of the metapleuron.

metepisternum (met-ep-i-stēr'num), n.; pl. metepisterna (-nā). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + NL. episternum, q. v.] In entom., one of the metathoracic episterna.

meter¹ (mē'tēr), n. [Formerly also meeter; < ME. meter, < AS. metere* (cf. metend, a measurer) (= D. meter = MLG. meter = OHG. mezari, mezzari, MHG. mezzar, G. messer = Sw. mätare, a measurer), < metan, measure: see *mete*¹. In the second sense, 'that which measures, an instrument for measuring,' as in gas-meter, water-meter, etc., the word is partly confused in composition with the L. metrum, < Gr. μέτρον, a measure, which is the word involved in the unitary compounds gasometer, electrometer, geometer, diameter, perimeter, etc.: see *meter*², *meter*³. 1. One who measures; a measurer: as, a coal-meter; a land-meter. [Rare.]

But the sultan, the weigher, the meter of grants, will not suffer us to acquiesce in the judgment of the prince.

Burke, Letter to a Noble Lord.

2. That which measures, or is used for measuring; specifically, an instrument that records or indicates automatically the quantity, force, or pressure of a fluid passing through it or actuating it: used in composition, as in gas-meter, water-meter (see these words), or alone when the fluid to be measured, as gas or water, is understood.—3. In fishing, one of the two reinforcing ropes of a seine or gill-net, of which one is attached to the upper edge and carries the floats, and the other to the lower edge and bears the weights or sinkers.—Dry meter, a gas-meter employing a bellows-like apparatus and no liquid.—Electric meter. See electric.—Electromagnetic-control meters, electrical measuring-instruments (such as ampere- or volt-meters) the indications of which are controlled by the magnetic field produced by an electromagnet. In current instruments the electromagnet is usually excited by the current to be measured.—Grain-meter, any one of a variety of automatic grain-measuring machines, by which a stream of grain flowing from a chute or hopper is received, and the quantity discharged is indicated. Most of these grain-meters are automatic weighing-machines, the standard weight of a bushel of the grain being the unit of the scale of measurement, or, if the indications are in pounds, the latter divided by the weight of a bushel at once gives the delivery in bushels.—Magnetic-control meters, electromagnetic-control meters with permanent magnets substituted for electromagnets.—Spring-control meters, electrical measuring-instruments in which the indications are controlled by the elastic resistance of a spring. (See also ampere-meter, coulomb-meter, joule-meter, volt-meter.)

meter¹ (mē'tēr), v. t. [< *meter*¹, n.] To measure by means of a meter; test by the use of a meter.

It was found that the real proportions of air and gas were not determinable, except by metering both.

Science, III. 497.

(a) Rhythm in language; rhythmic language as measurable by prosodic times or uttered syllables; more specifically, arrangement of language in a succession of rhythmic movements, readily appreciable as such by the ear; verse, as opposed to prose. Meter in this sense is the subject-matter of the science of metrics. (b) Measured verse or rhythmic language; rhythmic language as determined by or divided into fixed measures. (1) A measure, foot, or dipody. See measures. [Rare.] (2) A line, verse, or period in ancient metrics; specifically, a monocolic verse or a docolic (or tricollic) period, as opposed to a hypermetron. Meters are called monometers, dimeters, trimeters, etc., according to the number of measures in a verse, also acatalectic, catalectic, brachycatalectic, etc., meters, according to the completeness or incompleteness of the feet or measures. (3) A kind of verse; a particular variety of poetic rhythm, as expressed by the kind of feet of which the verse consists: as, iambic, dactylic, Ionic meter; a particular form of metrical composition: as, Alcaic meter, elegiac meter. In ancient metrics meters were called monod, pure, or simple meters when they consisted of one kind of foot throughout, compound or epimithetic meters when composed of cola of different kinds of feet, mixed meters when uniting different kinds of feet within the same colon.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 58.

Rhyme being no necessary adjunct or true ornament of poem or good verse, in longer works especially, but the invention of a barbarous age, to set off wretched matter and lame meter.

Milton, P. L., Pref.

Metre may be defined to be a succession of poetical feet arranged in regular order, according to certain types recognized as standards, in verses of a determinate length.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xxv.

2. In music, the division of a composition into parts of equal time-value and of similar essential rhythmic structure. The smallest part thus indicated is that between successive primary accents, and is called a measure; in printed music this is marked by a bar before each primary accent. But meter includes also, in a general way, the division of a piece into equal and similar parts of more than one measure, such parts being called phrases or strophes. In this sense musical meter has obvious analogies with meter in verse, though the analogies cannot always be pressed with safety, especially as the nomenclature is not strictly parallel. (See *metrics*², 2.) Rhythm may be distinguished from meter in that it deals primarily with the accents and the typical and actual accentual patterns, which meter gathers into groups and sections in accordance with their time-value. This distinction, however, is not always observed or even acknowledged. Sometimes the meaning of the term is reversed, rhythm being made a matter of time, and meter one of accent. Sometimes, too, the two terms are made entirely interchangeable.

3. In Eng. hymnology, a pattern of versification, including the structure of the prosodical feet used, the grouping of those feet into lines, and the grouping of lines into stanzas or strophes, popularly called verses. See foot and versification. According to the kind of feet used, meters are usually either iambic, trochaic, or dactylic. The principal iambic meters are: Common Meter (C. M.), having alternately eight and six syllables to the line; Long Meter (L. M.), having eight syllables to the line; and Short Meter (S. M.), having two lines of six syllables, followed by one of eight, and then by another of six. Each of these meters has properly four lines to the stanza, so that their syllabic scheme is as follows: C. M., 8, 6, 8, 6; L. M., 8, 8, 8, 8; S. M., 6, 6, 8, 6. Each of them may also be doubled, so as to make eight-lined stanzas, the meter then being called Common Meter Double (C. M. D.), Long Meter Double (L. M. D.), or Short Meter Double (S. M. D.). Long meter may also have six lines to the stanza, and is then called Long Meter, Six Lines, or Long Particular Meter (L. P. M.), with the syllabic scheme 8, 8, 8, 8, 8, 8. Other meters of this class are Common Particular Meter (C. P. M.), 8, 6, 8, 6, 8, 6; Short Particular Meter (S. P. M.), 6, 6, 6, 6, 6, 6; Hallelujah Me-

It was intended to be one ten-millionth part of the earth's meridian quadrant, and to be 443,296 lines of the toise of Peru, from which it really differs by a very small amount. The meter is equal to 39.37027 inches according to Professor Rogers, and to 39.36985 inches according to General Comstock. A new meter has been established by the principal nations, which is defined by the length at the melting-point of ice between two lines drawn on a bar of platinum, which is to be kept at the International Bureau of Weights and Measures at the pavillon de Breteuil near Sèvres, France. This new meter is to be as nearly as possible of the same length as the old one. Abbreviated m.

meterage (mē'tēr-āj), n. [< *meter*¹ + -age.] 1. The act of measuring.—2. Measurement; the result of measuring.—3. A charge for measuring.

meterer¹ (mē'tēr-ēr), n. [< *meter*² + -er.] One who writes in meter; a poet. Drayton.

meterly¹ (mē'tēr-li), adv. [ME. metrely; < *meter*² + -ly.] Metrically.

Bible of 1551, Ezek. xl. 5.

meter-prover (mē'tēr-prō'vēr), n. A registering holder, or a gas-tank of known capacity, used for testing the accuracy of gas-meters.

meter-wheel (mē'tēr-hwēl), n. A drum or hollow wheel with several chambers, to which air or other gas is admitted through a tube in the axle. In use, the wheel is immersed in water above its axis, and the gas, filling each chamber successively, causes the chamber filled to rise and the wheel to revolve, when the gas is discharged above the level of the water by an opening. The chambers are of known capacity, and the revolutions of the wheel are recorded on dials. Such wheels are used in gas-meters, in which the pressure of the gas flowing through the meter gives the driving power.

metesels¹, n. [ME., < AS. mete, meat, + sēl, time.] Dinner-time. Halliwell.

metesthetic (met-es-thet'ik), a. [Also metæsthetic; < Gr. μετά, after, + αἰσθητός, verbal adj. of αἰσθάνεσθαι, perceive: see archæsthetic.] Pertaining to the hypothesis of metesthetism.

metesthetism (met-es'the-tizm), n. [Also metæsthetism; < metesthetic + -ism.] The monistic hypothesis that consciousness is an attribute of matter, and a product of the evolution of matter and force: opposed to archæsthetism.

metestick (mēt'stik), n. Naut., a stick fixed on a board at right angles, used to measure the height of the hold of a ship, and to level the ballast.

metewand (mēt'wond), n. [Formerly also metewand; < ME. metewand; < *mete*¹ + wand.] A measuring-staff, yardstick, etc.; any rod or stick used to measure length. [Archaic.]

He reformed the olde vntrue measures, and made a measure by the length of his own arme, which was then called vlna, an elle, and now the same is called a yard, or a metewand.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 302.

methal (meth'al), n. [< meth(yl) + al(cohol).] Same as methylic alcohol (which see, under alcohol).

methane (meth'an), n. [< meth(yl) + -ane] A hydrocarbon (CH₄) belonging to the paraffin series, a colorless, odorless gas which may be reduced to a liquid by extreme pressure and cold. It is innocuous when breathed in moderate quantity. It burns with a slightly luminous flame, and when mixed with seven or eight volumes of air explodes violently. It occurs in nature in the emanations of volcanoes and petroleum-wells. It also occurs in large quantity in the coal-measures, and when mixed with air constitutes the dreaded fire-damp of the miners. Also called marsh-gas.

methanometer (meth-ā-nom'e-tēr), n. [< meth-ane + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An apparatus, devised by Monnier, to determine and indicate automatically the quantity of marsh-gas (methane) in coal-mines. It depends upon the change of level of the mercury in a manometer-tube in which carbon dioxide is formed by the combination of the gas with the oxygen of the air under the action, for example, of an electric spark.

It is not my fault if I fill them out nectar and they run to metheglin. B. Jonson, Masque of Hymen.

O'er our parch'd tongue the rich metheglin glides.
Gay, To a Lady, l.

methemoglobin (met-hē-mō-glō'bīn), n. [< Gr. μερά, with, + E. hemoglobin.] A modification of hemoglobin, into which it can be reconverted. It differs from hemoglobin in that its combined oxygen is not displaced by carbon monoxide nor given up in a vacuum.

methemoglobinemia (met-hē-mō-glō-bi-nē'mī-ā), n. [< methemoglobin + Gr. αἷμα, blood.] In pathol., the presence of methemoglobin in the blood. Med. News, LIII. 240.

methemoglobinuria (met-hē-mō-glō-bi-nū'ri-ā), n. [< methemoglobin + Gr. οὖρον, urine.] In pathol., the presence of methemoglobin in the urine.

methene (meth'-ēn), n. [< meth(yl) + -ene.] Same as methylene.

meth (meth'-ēr), n. [Cf. meth², meath, *mead*¹.] A drinking-vessel formerly in use, especially intended for drinking mead or metheglin. The vessels identified as methers are of wood, cut out of a single piece, having a capacity of from one to three pints.

Meth, from specimen in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin, Ireland.

The Dunvegan cup, a meth of yew covered with silver mounts.
S. K. Cat. Spec. Exhib., 1862, No. 902.

methinks (mē-things'), v. impers.; pret. methought. [< ME. me thinketh, < AS. mē thynceth, it seems to me: see *me*¹ and *think*².] It seems to me; it appears to me. See *me*¹ and *think*².

method (meth'od), n. [= OF. methode, F. méthode = Sp. método = Pg. metodo = It. metodo = D. G. Dan. methode = Sw. metod, < LL. methodus, methodos, a way of teaching or proceeding, < Gr. μέθοδος, a going after, pursuit, investigation, inquiry, method, system, < μετά, after, + ὁδός, way.] 1. Orderly regulation of conduct with a view to the attainment of an end; systematic procedure subservient to the purpose of any business; the use of a complete set of rules for carrying out any plan or project: as, to observe method in business or study; without method success is improbable: in this and the next two senses only in the singular.

Though this be madness, yet there is method in't.
Shak., Hamlet, II. 2. 308.

Horace still charms with graceful negligence,
And without method talks us into sense.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 654.

The particular uses of method are various: but the general one is, to enable men to understand the things that are the subjects of it.

Bentham, Introductio ad Moralem et Legalem, xvi. 1, note. Where the habit of Method is present and effective, things the most remote and diverse in time, place, and outward circumstance are brought into mental contiguity and succession, the more striking as the less expected.

Coleridge, Method, § II. (Encyc. Dict.)

2. A system, or complete set, of rules of procedure for attaining a given end; a short way to a desired result; specifically, in logic, a general plan for setting forth any branch of knowledge whatever; that branch of logic which teaches how to arrange thoughts for investigation or exposition.

Method hath been placed, and that not amiss, in logic, as a part of judgment: . . . the doctrine of method containeth the rules of judgment upon that which is to be delivered.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

Method is procedure according to principles.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason (tr. by Meiklejohn), p. 516.

3. Any way or manner of conducting any business.

In this method of life it was once his fate to approach a clear fountain.

Bacon, Moral Fables, III.

4. A plan or system of conduct or action; the way or mode of doing or effecting something: as, a method of instruction; method of classification; the English method of pronunciation.

Therefore to know what more thou art than man, . . .

Another method I must now begin.
Milton, P. R., IV. 540.

Let such persons . . . not quarrel with the Great Physician of souls for having cured them by easy and gentle methods.

South, Sermons, IX. 1.

Still less respectable appears this extreme concern for those of our own blood which goes along with utter unconcern for those of other blood, when we observe its methods.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 71.

5. In music: (a) Manner of performance; technique; style. (b) A manner or system of teaching. (c) An instruction-book, systematically arranged.—Acroamatic, analytic, antecedent, method. See the adjectives.—Arbogast's method. [Named after the inventor, the Alsatian mathematician Louis François Antoine Arbogast, 1759–1808, who himself named it the calculus of derivations.] A method for the development of the function of a function according to the powers of the variable of the latter function.—Baconian method. See Baconian.—Catechetical method, the method of teaching by questions addressed to the memory.—Centrobatic method. See centrobatic.—Comparative method, any method of investigation which rests upon the comparison of several groups of objects.—Compositive method. Same as synthetic method.—Correlative method. See correlative.—Deductive method. See deductive.—Definitive or divisive method. See divisive.—Dialogic method. See dialogic.—Differential method. (a) A method of estimating the value of a physical quantity by comparing it with another of the same kind the value of which is known and estimating the difference. See differential, and differential galvanometer. (b) A method, introduced by Frischen, in duplex telegraphy for eliminating the effect of the transmitted current on the instruments at the transmitting station while leaving them available to record any message received at the same time. See telegraphy.—Epidemic, erotematic, Eulorian, exoscopic, expectant method. See the adjectives.—Euler's method of elimination. See elimination.—Genetic, graphical, historical method. See the adjectives.—Horner's method of approximation. See approximation.—Idiopathic method. Same as epidemic method.—Inductive or experimental method, a method which depends upon making new observations.—Introspective method. See introspective.—Lagrangean, lunar, magistral method. See the adjectives.—Manoe's method, a method of measuring the electrical resistance of a circuit in which there is an electromotive force. See resistance.—Metaphysical or subjective method, one which rests on the assumption that the possibilities of thought are coextensive with the possibilities of things.—Method of adhesions. See the quotation.

At the recent meeting of the British Association, Dr. E. B. Tylor read an interesting paper on the laws of marriage and descent, illustrative of his ingenious method of studying ethnological phenomena. All myths and customs, on a close study, may by analysis be disintegrated, and are found to consist of certain elements. Dr. Tylor arranges these elements statistically, and, by inquiring which occur simultaneously among various peoples, proves that certain groups of such elements belong genetically together. This he calls the method of adhesions.

Science, XII. 211.

Method of agreement, that method of experimental inquiry in which, some experiment being tried under a great variety of circumstances and found always to yield the same result, it is inferred that this result would be reached under all circumstances.—Method of approaches. See approach.—Method of avoidance, a method of experimentation in which the circumstances of the observation are specially chosen so that one usual source of error does not enter into the result.—Method of compensation, a method in which a source of error of unknown amount is got rid of by a special mechanical contrivance.—Method of concomitant variations, the method in which the known quantities on which the results of an experiment depend are made to vary with a view to ascertaining the values of the unknown quantities.—Method of correction, a method of experimentation in which a source of error is allowed for by calculation. This differs from the method of residues only in that the nature of the causes of the residual phenomena are known, and only their quantities remain to be determined.—Method of difference, that method in which an experiment is tried under conditions seeming to differ in but one material circumstance, and the difference in the two results is ascribed to that circumstance.—Method of dimensions, divisors, exclusions, fluxions. See dimension, divisor, etc.—Method of exhaustion, the method of approximation to the area of a curvilinear figure by means of inscribed and circumscribed polygons.—Method of increments, of indivisibles, of infusion, of limits. See increment, indivisible, etc.—Method of least squares. See square.—Method of residues. (a) That method of experimental inquiry in which from an observed quantity is subtracted the effects of known causes in order that the effects of unknown causes may be studied by themselves. (b) A method invented by Cauchy of treating the integral calculus. See residual.—Method of reversal, a method in which two experiments are made under different circumstances, in such a way that their results can be combined by calculation, so that the error shall be determined and eliminated.—Natural method, a method in which the order of nature is observed. See Jussieu.—Null-method, a method of measurement in which the equality of two physical quantities is indicated when, on performing a specified operation, no effect is produced on the testing apparatus: for example, the Wheatstone bridge method of measuring electrical resistance.—Progressive method. Same as synthetic method.—Regressive or resolutive method. Same as analytic method.—Scientific method, a method of investigation proceeding in a scientific manner, and setting out from fundamental and elementary principles: especially, the method of modern science.—Socratic method, the method of teaching by questions addressed to the understanding.—Subjective method. Same as metaphysical method.—Symbolical method. (a) A method in which symbols of operations are treated as if they were symbols of quantities. (b) A method in which, in analytical geom., the functions which vanish on straight lines, etc., are represented by single letters. (c) In algebra, a method in which, by the aid of umbrae, quantities are written as powers of polynomials.—Synthetic, progressive, or compositive method, a method in which we set out with general principles and proceed to deduce their consequences.—Tabular or tabellary method, the method of exhibiting the divisions of a subject by tables.—Total method, the method of a whole science; partial method, the method of a particular part of a science.—Universal or general method, a method applicable to all problems, or to a very wide class of problems; special or particular method, one applicable to a small class of problems.

methodic (me-thod'ik), a. [= F. methodique = Sp. metódico = Pg. metódico = It. metodico (cf. D. G. methodisch = Dan. methodisk), < LL. methodicus, following a method (medici methodici, physicians known as methodists), < Gr. μεθοδικός, working by rule, following a method, systematic (οἱ μεθοδικοί, physicians known as methodists), < μέθοδος, a method: see method.] Pertaining to or characterized by method; conformed or conforming to a method: as, the methodic principle or sect in medicine.

The legislator whose measures produce evil instead of good, notwithstanding the extensive and methodic inquiries which helped him to decide, cannot be held to have committed more than error of reasoning.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 77.

Methodic doubt. See *doubt*¹.

methodical (me-thod'i-kal), a. [< methodic + -al.] Characterized by or exhibiting method; disposed or acting in a systematic way; systematic; orderly: as, the methodical arrangement of objects or topics; methodical accounts; a methodical man.

When I am old, I will be as methodical as a hypocrite as any pair of lawn sleeves in Savoy.

Shirley, Grateful Servant, II. 1.

I have done it in a confused manner, and without the nice divisions of art; for grief is not methodical.

By. Atterbury, Sermons, I. vi.

methodically (me-thod'i-kal-i), adv. In a methodical manner; according to a method; with method or order.

methodics (me-thod'iks), n. [Pl. of methodic: see -ics.] The science of method; methodology.

methodisation, methodise, etc. See methodization, etc.

methodism (meth'od-izm), n. [< method (see Methodist) + -ism.] 1. The principle of acting according to a fixed or strict method; the system or practice of methodists: as, methodism in medicine, or in conduct.

This system [of medical doctrine] was known as methodism, its adherents as the methodici or methodists.
Encyc. Brit., XV. 802.

Specifically—2. [cap.] The doctrines and polity of the Methodist Church. See Methodist Church, under Methodist.

Methodist (meth-'od-ist), n. and a. [< method + -ist.] 1. n. 1. [l. c.] One who is characterized by strict adherence to method; one who thinks or acts according to a fixed system or definite principles; one who is thoroughly versed in method.

The finest methodists, according to Aristotle's golden rule of artificial bounds, condemn geometrical precepts in arithmetic or arithmetical precepts in geometry as irregular and abusive.

G. Harvey, Pierce's Supererogation.

The great thinkers of all times have been strict methodists.
Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 123.

2. One of a sect of ancient physicians who practised by method or theory. Compare Dogmatist, 2.

As many more
As methodist Musus kild with hellebore
In autumn last.

Marston, Scourge of Villainy, Sat. 1.

The methodists agreed with the empirics in one point, in their contempt for anatomy; but, strictly speaking, they were dogmatists, though with a dogma different from that of the Hippocratic school.
Encyc. Brit., XV. 802.

3. A member of the Christian denomination founded by John Wesley (1703-91). The name was first applied to Wesley and his companions by their fellow-students at Oxford on account of their methodical habits in study and in religious life.

Thus Bath yields a continued rotation of diversions, and people of all ways of thinking, even from the libertine to the methodist, have it in their power to complete the day with employment agreeable to their taste and disposition.

Life of Quin (reprint 1887), p. 50.

Dialectic Methodists, a name given to certain Roman Catholic priests of France, during the seventeenth century, who opposed by argument the doctrines of the Huguenots. Also called Romish or Papish Methodists.—Free Methodists, a Methodist denomination in the United States, established in 1880 at Pekin in New York. Its members place especial emphasis upon the doctrines of entire sanctification and eternal punishment. They rigidly enforce the rule for simplicity of dress, and prohibit the use of choir or musical instrument in church service; they have abandoned episcopacy, and have one superintendent elected every four years.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Methodism or the Methodists; belonging to or agreeing with the general body of Methodists: as, Methodist principles; a Methodist church.—The Methodist Church, a Christian body existing in several distinct church organizations, the most important of which are that known in England as the Wesleyan and that known in the United States as the Methodist Episcopal Church. These two bodies do not differ materially in doctrine, worship, or ecclesiastical organization. They are evangelical, and Arminian in theology. Their worship is generally non-liturgical. Each Methodist society, or local church, is organized in classes, under class-leaders; the different societies, which are sometimes grouped in circuits, are combined in districts, each of which is, in the United States, under the superintendence of a presiding elder. The American churches also have bishops, who are not diocesan, but itinerant, possessing concurrent jurisdiction over the whole church. The highest ecclesiastical court is the General Conference, which meets every fourth year. In the United States lay delegates have been admitted to the Conference since 1872, and in England since 1880, before which dates the Conference was a purely clerical body. Other Methodist churches are: The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, Calvinistic in theology, formed from the Countess of Huntingdon's Connection, which is Congregational in polity; the Methodist New Connection, which gives a larger degree of power to the laity than does the Old Connection; the Bible Christians; the Primitive Methodists; the United Methodist Free Churches, a combination of three pre-existing Methodist organizations; and the Wesleyan Reform Union. All the above are British organizations. In the United States, the Methodist Episcopal Church exists in two geographical divisions, the Methodist Episcopal Church (North), and the Methodist Episcopal Church (South). There is also an African Methodist Episcopal Church, an African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, the Union American Methodist Episcopal Church—all composed entirely of colored Methodists; the Evangelical Association, popularly though inaccurately termed German Methodists, or Albrites, from the name of their founder; the United Brethren in Christ, which is essentially though not nominally a Methodist body; the Methodist Protestant Church, which rejects episcopacy; and the Wesleyan Methodist Connection of America. In Canada several of the Methodist bodies have been consolidated into a single organization, called the Methodist Church of Canada. All these Methodist bodies agree in having a consolidated ministry for each body, each minister being subject to change of parish within certain definite periods. This feature of their economy is called "the itinerancy." methodistic (meth-'od-'is-'tik), a. [< methodist + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to methodism or methodists; characterized by or exhibiting strict adherence to method; hence, strict or exacting, as in religion or morals.

Then spare our stage, ye methodistic men!
Byron, Hints from Horace.

2. [cap.] Of or pertaining to the Methodist Church; characteristic of the Methodists or Methodism: as, Methodistic principles or practices.

In connection with the Methodistic revival.
Is. Taylor, Wesley and Methodism, p. 106.

Methodistical (meth-'od-'is-'ti-'kal), a. [< methodistic + -al.] Same as Methodistic, 2.

The precise number of methodistical marks you know best.
Bp. Livingston, Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists Compared, p. xii.

methodistically (meth-'od-'is-'ti-'kal-i), adv. In a methodistic manner; specifically [cap.], after the manner of the Methodists; as regards Methodism.

methodization (meth-'od-'i-'zā-'shon), n. [< methodize + -ation.] The act or process of methodizing or reducing to method; the state of being methodized. Also spelled methodisation.

The conceptions, then, which we employ for the colligation and methodization of facts do not develop themselves from within, but are impressed upon the mind from without.
J. S. Mill, Logic, IV. ii. § 2.

methodize (meth-'od-'iz), v.; pret. and pp. methodized, ppr. methodizing. [< method + -ize.] I. trans. To reduce to method; dispose in due order; arrange in a convenient manner.

The wisdom of God hath methodized the course of things unto the best advantage of goodness.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., l. 30.

Science . . . is simply common sense rectified, extended, and methodized.
J. Platts, Cosmic Philos., I. 124.

II. intrans. To be methodical; use method. The mind . . . is disposed to generalise and methodize to excess.

Coleridge, Method, § 1.

Also spelled methodise.

methodizer (meth-'od-'i-'zēr), n. One who methodizes. Also spelled methodiser.

He was a careful methodizer of his knowledge.

Scudder, Noah Webster, p. 215.

methodological (meth-'od-'ō-'lō-'j-i-'kal), a. [< methodology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to methodology.

If there were several competing methods of geometry . . . geometers would inevitably be involved at the outset of their study in methodological discussion.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 5.

methodologist (meth-'od-'ō-'lō-'j-i-'st), n. [< methodology + -ist.] One who is versed in or treats of methodology.

methodology (meth-'od-'ō-'lō-'j-i), n. [< Gr. μέθοδος, method, + -λογία, -logia, speak: see -ology.]

1. A branch of logic whose office it is to show how the abstract principles of the science are to be applied to the production of knowledge; the doctrine of definition and division; in a broader sense, the science of method in scientific procedure.

That part of logic which is conversant with the perfection, with the well-being of thought is the doctrine of method—methodology.

Sir W. Hamilton, Lectures on Logic, xxiv.

The rival originators of modern Methodology, Descartes and Bacon, vie with each other in the stress that they lay on this point: and the latter's warning against the "notions male terminatæ" of ordinary thought is peculiarly needed in ethical discussion.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 318.

2. A treatise on method.

methomania (meth-'ō-'mā-'ni-'ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μέθνη, strong drink (see mead), + μανία, madness.] In pathol., an irresistible morbid craving for intoxicating substances; dipsomania.

Dipsomania is a form of physical disease, and it has been aptly defined as an uncontrollable and intermittent impulse to take alcoholic stimulants, or any other agent . . . which causes intoxication—in short, a methomania.
E. C. Mann, Psychol. Med., p. 354.

methought (mē-'thāt'), Preterit of methinks.

methridatum, n. See methrididatum.

methule (meth-'ūl), n. Same as methyl.

methy (meth-'i), n.; pl. methies (-iz). A name of the burbot.

methyl (meth-'il), n. [< Gr. μέθυ, mead, + ἵλη, wood.] The hypothetical radical (CH₃) of wood-spirit and its derivatives. It is analogous to ethyl in its chemical relations.—Methyl alcohol, green, mercaptan. See alcohol, etc.

methylal (meth-'il-'al), n. [< methyl + al (alcohol).] Methylene dimethyl ether, CH₂(OCH₃)₂, a liquid product of the oxidation of methylic alcohol. It has a pleasant odor, and by oxidation passes into formic acid.

methylamine (meth-'il-'am-'in), n. [< methyl + amine.] A colorless gas (NH₂CH₃), having a strong ammoniacal odor, and resembling ammonia in many of its reactions. It may be regarded as ammonia (NH₃) in which the radical methyl (CH₃) has been substituted for a hydrogen atom. When brought in contact with a lighted taper it burns with a livid yellowish flame. Methylamine may be condensed to a liquid; it has not been solidified. It is exceedingly soluble in water, and forms, with acids, crystallizable salts.

methylate (meth-'il-'āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. methylated, ppr. methylating. [< methyl + -ate.]

To mix or impregnate with methylic alcohol or methyl.—Methylated spirit, spirit of wine or alcohol containing ten per cent. of wood-naphtha (methylic alcohol). The naphtha communicates a disagreeable flavor, which renders the spirit unfit for drinking. It is of much use in the arts as a solvent, for preserving specimens, in the manufacture of varnishes, for burning in spirit-lamps, etc.

methyl-blue (meth-'il-'blō), n. A coal-tar color prepared by treating spirit-blue (see spirit-blue, 2) with methyl chlorid. It is used to dye light-blue tints on silk, and possesses a purer tone than spirit-blue.

methylconine (meth-'il-'kō-'nin), n. [< methyl + conine.] One of the alkaloids found in commercial conine.

methylcrotonic (meth-'il-'krō-'ton-'ik), a. In chem., used only in the following phrase:—Methylcrotonic acid. Same as cevadilic acid (which see, under cevadilic).

methylene (meth-'i-'lēn), n. [< methyl + -ene.] A bivalent hydrocarbon radical (CH₂) which does not exist free, but occurs in many compounds, as methylene iodide, CH₂I₂. Also called methene.

methylene-blue (meth-'i-'lēn-'blō), n. A coal-tar color prepared by treating dimethylaniline successively with hydrochloric acid, sodium nitrite, sulphureted hydrogen, common salt, and zinc chlorid. It is used in dyeing, and produces fast blues on cotton, leather, and jute, but not on wool or silk. It is also an important bacterioscopic reagent.

methylic (me-'thil-'ik), a. [< methyl + -ic.] Containing or related to the radical methyl.—Methylic alcohol, ether, etc. See the nouns.

methyl-salicylic (meth-'il-'sal-'i-'sil-'ik), a. Containing methyl in combination with salicylic acid.—Methyl-salicylic acid, the methyl ester of salicylic acid, and the chief ingredient of wintergreen-oil, from Gaultheria procumbens, a colorless, agreeably smelling oil which forms salts that are easily decomposed.

methyl-violet (meth-'il-'vi-'ō-'let), n. A coal-tar color produced by the direct oxidation of pure dimethylaniline with chlorid of copper. Also called Paris violet.

methymnion (meth-'im-'ni-'on), n.; pl. methymnia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μεθύμνιον, < μεθύω, after, + ὕμνος, hymn.] In anc. pros., a short colon after an antistrophe.

methysis (meth-'i-'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέθυσος, drunkenness, < μεθύω, to be drunken with wine.] In pathol., drunkenness; intoxication.

metic (met-'ik), n. [Irreg. for metec*, < L. metecus, < Gr. μέτροικος, a resident alien, prop. adj., changing one's abode, < μετρέω, over (denoting change), + οἶκος, house, abode: see economy.] An emigrant or immigrant; specifically, in ancient Greece, a resident alien who in general bore the burdens of a citizen, and had some of the citizen's privileges; hence, any resident alien.

To all men, rich and poor, citizens and metics, the comparative excellence of the democracy . . . was now manifest.
Grote, Hist. Greece, VI. 2.

The Patricians, as distinguished from the Patres, formed an aristocracy as compared with their freedmen or other dependents, or with the metics or strangers that sojourned among them, or with the alien population that were permitted, on terms more or less hard, to cultivate their lands.
W. E. Hearn, Aryan Household, p. 192.

meticulous (mē-'tik-'ū-'lus), a. [= F. meticuleux, < L. meticulosus, full of fear, < metus, fear.] Timid; over-careful.

Melancholy and meticulous heads. Sir T. Browne.
A stylist of Plato's super-subtle and meticulous consistency.
Amer. Jour. Philol., IX. 299.

meticulously (mē-'tik-'ū-'lus-li), adv. Timidly. Move circumspectly, not meticulously.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., l. 33.

metif (mē-'tif), n. [< F. metif, OF. mestif, of mixed breed: see mastiff, and cf. mestee, mestizo.] The offspring of a white person and a quadroon.

meting¹ (mē-'ting), n. [ME. meting, < AS. metung, verbal n. of metan, mete: see mete.] Measuring.

meting², n. A Middle English form of meeting.
meting³, n. [ME. metynge, < AS. mæting, verbal n. of mætan, dream: see mete.] A dream.

Joseph . . . he that redde so
The kynges metynge, Pharo.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 282.

Metis (mē-'tis), n. [< Gr. Μῆτις, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and sometimes called the mother of Athens; a personification of μῆτις, wisdom, prudence.] 1. In Gr. myth., a goddess personifying prudence, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and first wife of Zeus.—2. The ninth of the planetoids in the order of discovery, first observed by Graham at Markree, Ireland, in April, 1848.—3. A genus of crustaceans.—4. A genus of mollusks. Adams, 1858. metis (mā-tēs'), n. [F.: see metizo.] 1. Same as metizo.—2. In the Dominion of Canada, a half-breed of French and Indian parentage.

I am aware that the mixture of French and Indian blood has produced the well-known class of metis, half-breeds, members of which are found here and there throughout Canada, but these are comparatively few in numbers.

Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 151.

metecious (me-tē'shius), a. [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + οίκος, a house.] Heterocous.

metecism (me-tē'sizm), n. [< metecious + -ism.] Heterocism.

metoleic (met-ō'lē-ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, with, after, + Ε. oleic.] Related to oleic acid or olein.—Metoleic acid, a liquid acid resulting from the action of sulphuric acid on oleic acid.

Metonic (me-ton'ik), a. [< Meton, < L. Meton, Meton (see def.).] Of or pertaining to Meton, an ancient Athenian astronomer.—Metonic cycle. See cycle.—Metonic year. See year.

metonymic (met-ō-nim'ik), a. [= Pg. metonymico = It. metonimico, < Gr. μετωνυμικός, belonging to metonymy, < μετωνυμία, metonymy: see metonymy.] Pertaining to or of the nature of metonymy; used by way of metonymy.

metonymical (met-ō-nim'ik-əl), a. [< metonymic + -al.] Same as metonymic.

Intricate turnings, by a transumptive and metonymical kind of speech, are called meanders.

Drayton, Rosamond to King Henry, note 2.

metonymically (met-ō-nim'ik-əl-i), adv. By metonymy.

metonymy (me-ton'i-mi), n. [= F. métonymie = Sp. metonimia = It. metonimia, metonimia, < L.L. metonymia, < Gr. μετωνυμία, a change of name (in rhet., as defined), < μετά, after, + ὄνομα, Æolic ὄνομα, name: see onym.] In rhet., change of name; a trope or figure of speech that consists in substituting the name of one thing for that of another to which the former bears a known and close relation. It is a method of increasing the force or comprehensiveness of expression by the employment of figurative names that call up conceptions or associations of ideas not suggested by the literal ones, as Heaven for God, the Sublime Porte for the Turkish government, head and heart for intellect and affection, the town for its inhabitants, the bottle for strong drink, etc. See synecdoche.

These and such other speeches, where ye take the name of the Author for the thing it self, or the thing containing for that which is contained, & in many other cases do as it were wrong name the person or the thing. So nevertheless as it may be understood, it is by the figure metonymia, or misnamer.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 151.

metope (met'ō-pē), n. [= F. métrope = Sp. metopa = Pg. It. metopa, < L. metopa, < Gr. μετόπη, the space between the triglyphs of a frieze, < μετά, between, + ὀπή, an aperture, hollow.] 1. In arch., a slab inserted between two triglyphs of the Doric frieze, sometimes, especially in late work, cut in the same block with one triglyph or more. It was so called because in the primitive Doric, of which the later triglyphs represent the ends of the ceiling-beams, the metopes were left open as windows, and were thus literally apertures between the beams. The metopes were characteristically ornamented with sculpture in high relief, but they were frequently left plain, or adorned simply with painting. See cuts under Doric, monotriglyph, and temple.

Actaeon and Artemis.—Metope from the southern temple of the eastern plateau of Selinus.

2. In zool., same as facies. Hurley.

metopic (me-top'ik), a. [< Gr. μετωπικόν, the forehead, front, lit. the space between the eyes, < μετά, between, + ὤψ (ὤπ-), eye.] Of or pertaining to the forehead: as, a metopic suture.—Metopic point, a point midway between the greatest protuberances of the right and left frontal eminences. See craniometry.—Metopic suture, the median suture uniting the two halves of the frontal bone, present in early life and sometimes visible in adult skulls. Also called frontal suture.

Metopidius (met-ō-pid'i-us), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1832), < Gr. μετωπίδιος, equiv. to μετωπιαίος, of or pertaining to the forehead, < μετωπικόν, the forehead: see metopic.] A genus of Indian and African grallatorial birds of the family Pardalidae or Jacaniidae, characterized by the laminar expansion of the radius and the reduction of the spur on the wing. There are several species, as M. africanus, M. indicus, and others.

metopiam (met'ō-pizm), n. [< metop-ic + -ism.] That character of an adult skull presented in the persistence of a frontal or metopic suture.

metoposcopic (met'ō-pō-skop'ik), a. [= F. métoposcopique; as metoposcop-y + -ic.] Relating to metoposcopy.

metoposcopical (met'ō-pō-skop'ik-əl), a. [< metoposcopic + -al.] Same as metoposcopic.

A physiognomist might have exercised the metoposcopical science upon it (a face). Scott, Abbot, xxxii.

metoposcopist (met'ō-pos'kō-pist), n. [< metoposcop-y + -ist.] One versed in metoposcopy.

Aplon speaks of the metoposcopists who judge by the appearance of the face. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 4.

metoposcopy (met'ō-pos'kō-pi), n. [= F. métoposcopie = Sp. metoposcopia = Pg. It. metoposcopia, < Gr. μετωπικόν, the forehead, front, + σκοπεῖν, view.] The study of physiognomy; the art of discovering the character or the dispositions of men by their features or the lines of the face.

Other signs (of melancholy) there are taken from physiognomy, metoposcopy, chiromancy.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 39.

metosteon (me-tos'tē-on), n.; pl. metostea (-ē). [NL., < Gr. μετόστέον, after, + ὀστέον, a bone.] In ornith., the posterior lateral piece or special ossification of the sternum, behind the pleurosternon, on each side of the lophosternon. See cut under carinate.

metovum (me-tō'vum), n.; pl. metova (-vā). [NL., < Gr. μετόν, after, + L. ovum (= Gr. ὄν), egg: see ovum.] A meroblastic egg, ovum, or ovule which has acquired its store of food-yolk, or been otherwise modified from its original primitive condition as an egg-cell or protovum. Also called after-egg and deutovum.

metralgia (mē-tral'jī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μήτρα, womb, + ἀλγος, pain.] In pathol., pain in the womb.

metran (met'ran), n. The abuna; the head of the Abyssinian or Ethiopic church.

metre¹, n. See *meter*².

metre², n. See *meter*³.

metrectopia (met-rek-tō'pi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μήτρα, womb (see metrix), + ἐκτοπία, out of place: see ectopia.] Displacement of the womb. Thomas, Med. Diet.

metrectopic (met-rek-top'ik), a. [< metrectopia + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with metrectopia.

metrete, n. [ME., < L. metreta, < Gr. μετρητής, an Athenian measure for liquids (about 9 English gallons), < μετρέω, measure, < μέτρον, a measure: see *meter*³.] An ancient liquid measure. The Attic, Macedonian, and Spanish metrete was about 40 liters, or 10½ United States gallons. The Laconian and Eginetan measure was about 55 liters. In Egypt the artaba was sometimes called a metrete.

Of finest must in oon metrete,
Or it be atte the state of his fervence,
VIII unce of grounden wermode in a shete
Dependant honge, and XLII dayes swete;
Thenne oute it take.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 203.

metric¹ (met'rik), a. [< NL. metricus, < Gr. μετρικός, taken in the lit. sense 'pertaining to measure,' < μέτρον, measure: see *meter*³, and cf. metric², metric³.] Quantitative; involving or relating to measures of distance, especially in different directions. See geometry.

metric² (met'rik), a. and n. [I. a. = F. métrique = Sp. métrico = Pg. It. metrico (cf. D. metrisk, metrisk = G. metrisk = Dan. Sw. metrisk), < L. metricus, < Gr. μετρικός, pertaining to meter

(of verse), < μέτρον, meter: see *meter*². II. n. = F. métrique = Sp. métrica = Pg. It. metrica = G. Dan. Sw. metrisk, < NL. metrica, < Gr. μετρική (sc. τέχνη), the art of meter, prosody, fem. of μετρικός, pertaining to meter: see above.] I. a. Having meter or poetic rhythm; pertaining to meter or to metrics; metrical.

Healed with his metric fragments of rustic wisdom.

J. S. Blackie.

II. n. Same as *metrics*².

Let the writer on metric write the poet's scores mathematically.

Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVI. 87.

metric³ (met'rik), a. [< F. métrique (= Sp. métrico = Pg. It. metrico (after F.), < NL. metricus, pertaining to the system based on the meter, < μέτρον, a meter: see *meter*³, and cf. metric¹, metric².] Pertaining to that system of weights and measures of which the meter is the fundamental unit.—Metric system, the system of measurement of which the meter is the fundamental unit. First adopted in France (definitely in 1793), it is in general use in most other civilized countries, except the English-speaking countries, and is now almost universally adopted for scientific measurements. Its use is permitted in Great Britain, and was legalized in the United States in 1866. The meter, the unit of length, was intended to be one ten-millionth part of the earth's meridian quadrant, and is so very nearly. Its length is 39.370 inches. (See *meter*³.) The unit of surface is the are, which is 100 square meters. The theoretical unit of volume is the stere, which is a cubic meter. The unit of volume for the purposes of the market is the liter, which is the volume of 1 kilogram of distilled water at its maximum density, and is therefore intended to be 1 cubic decimeter. For 10 times, 100 times, 1,000 times, and 10,000 times one of the above units, the prefixes deca-, hecto-, kilo-, and myria- are used. For $\frac{1}{10}$, $\frac{1}{100}$, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the respective units, deci-, centi-, and milli- are prefixed. The micron, adopted by the international commission, is one millionth of a meter. The following is a complete table of equivalents:

1 myriameter	= 5.4 nautical miles, or 6.21 statute miles.
1 kilometer	= 0.621 statute mile, or nearly $\frac{5}{8}$ mile.
1 hectometer	= 109.4 yards.
1 decameter	= 0.497 chain, or 1.968 rods.
1 meter	= 39.37 inches, or nearly 3 feet 3½ inches.
1 decimeter	= 3.937 inches.
1 centimeter	= 0.3937 inch.
1 millimeter	= 0.03937 inch, or 1-25.4 inch.
1 micron	= $\frac{1}{25,400}$ inch.
1 hectare	= 2.471 acres.
1 are	= 119.6 square yards.
1 centiare (or square meter)	= 10.764 square feet.
1 decastere	= 13 cubic yards, or about 2½ cords.
1 stere (or cubic meter)	= 1.307 cubic yards, or 35.3 cubic feet.
1 decistere	= 3½ cubic feet.
1 kiloliter	= 1 tun 12 gallons 2 pints 2 gills old wine-measure.
1 hectoliter	= 22.01 imperial gallons, or 26.4 United States gallons.
1 decaliter	= 2 gallons 1 pint 2½ gills imperial measure, or 2 gallons 2 quarts 1 pint ½ gill United States measure.
1 liter	= 1 pint 3 gills imperial, or 1 quart ½ gill United States measure.
1 deciliter	= 0.704 gill imperial, or 0.845 gill United States measure.
1 millier	= 1 ton avoirdupois less 35 pounds.
1 metric quintal	= 2 hundredweight less 3½ pounds, or 220 pounds 7 ounces.
1 kilogram	= 2 pounds 3 ounces 4½ drams avoirdupois.
1 hectogram	= 3 ounces 8½ drams avoirdupois.
1 decagram	= 154.32 grains troy.
1 gram	= 15.43234874 grains.
1 decigram	= 1.5432 grains.
1 centigram	= 0.15432 grain.
1 milligram	= 0.015432 grain.

Closely connected with the metric system was the proposed division of the right angle or circular quadrant into 100 equal parts instead of 90 degrees; but this has not met with favor, mainly because the name degrees was retained, introducing a risk of confusion. See *gram*².

metrical¹ (met'ri-kal), a. [< metric¹ + -al.] Pertaining to measurement, or the use of weights and measures; employed in or determined by measuring: as, a metrical unit of length or quantity; the metrical systems of the ancients.

If we agree to accept a precise metrical quantity of one metal as our standard.

Jevois, Money, p. 60.

Metical diagram. See diagram.—Metical property or proposition. See descriptive property, under description.

metrical² (met'ri-kal), a. [< metric² + -al.] Pertaining to or characterized by poetical measure or rhythm; written in verse; metric: as, metrical terms; the metrical psalms.

The Poesie metrical of the Grecians and Latines came to be much corrupted and altered.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 7.

metrically (met'ri-kal-i), adv. In a metrical manner; measuredly; as regards meter.

metrician (mē-trish'an), n. [< metric² + -ian.] A writer of verse; one who is skilled in meters.

Ye that bene metricians me excuse.

Court of Love, l. 30.

These Latin metricians . . . seem in their scanning of poetry to have beat time in the same way.

J. Hadley, Essays, p. 97.

metricist (met'ri-sist), n. [< metric² + -ist.] A metrical writer; a metrician.

Counterpoint, therefore, is not to be achieved by the metricist, even though he be Pindar himself.

Encyc. Brit., XIX. 262.

metrics¹ (met'riks), n. [Pl. of metric¹: see -ics.] The philosophical and mathematical theory of measurement.

metrics² (met'riks), n. [Pl. of metric²: see -ics.]

1. The art of versification.—2. The science or doctrine which treats of rhythm in language and its employment in poetic composition. Both as an art and as a science metrics is a branch of rhythmic, and relates to rhythm in language as music or harmonics does to musical rhythm, and orcheistics (regarded as an art or science by the ancients) to rhythm in the movements of the body. It is a distinct science from grammar in its proper sense, the only department of which approaching metrics is that called prosody—that is, the study of quantity or the determination of longs and shorts in spoken language. As a matter of convenience grammars have added to this elementary or empiric treatises on versification, and so in traditional and popular usage prosody is made equivalent to metrics. In metrical composition the unit is the time (mora) or the syllable. In the nomenclature of modern metrics syllables combine into feet or measures, these into lines, and lines into stanzas or strophes. In the more exact and complete terminology of ancient metrics times or syllables combine into feet or measures, measures into cola, lines (verses), or periods, periods into systems or strophes, strophes into pericopes, and lines, periods, systems, or pericopes into poems. Also metric.

Metridium (mē-trid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μετρίδιος, < μέτρα, womb: see matrix.] A genus of sea-anemones. M. marginatum is the commonest sea-anemone of the New England coast, found in abundance Sea-anemone (Metridium marginatum), open and closed.

In quiet tide-pools on rocks and submerged timber. When full-blown or distended with water this actinia may be eight or ten inches in diameter.

metrification (met'ri-fi-kā'shon), n. [< metri- + -ation (see -fication).] The making of verses; a metrical composition. [Rare.]

Should I flounder awhile without a tumble
Through this metrification of Catullus.
Tennyson, Hendecasyllables.

metrifier (met'ri-fi-ēr), n. A metrist; a versifier.

metrify (met'ri-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. metrified, ppr. metrifying. [OF. metrisier, < ML. metrificare, write in meter, < L. metrum, meter (see meter²), + facere, make: see -fy.] To compose meters or verses.

In metrifying his base can not well be larger than a metre of six. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 70.

Metriinae (met-ri-i'nē), n. pl. [< Metrius + -inae.] A group of beetles of the family Carabidae, typified by the genus Metrius, having the body not pedunculate, the posterior coxae separated, the prosternum prolonged at the tip, and the mandibles with a setigerous puncture. Also Metriini, as a tribe of Carabine.

metrist (mē'trist), n. [= Sp. metrlista, < ML. metrlista, a writer in meter, a poet, < L. metrum, meter: see meter² and -ist.] One who is versed in poetic meter or rhythm; a metrical writer; a metrician.

Coleridge himself, from natural fineness of ear, was the best metrist among modern English poets.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 267.

metritis (mē-tri'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέτρα (see matrix), womb, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the uterus, especially of its middle coat.

Metrius (met'ri-us), n. [NL., < Gr. μετρίος, of moderate size, < μέτρον, measure: see meter².] The typical genus of Metriinae, founded by Eschscholtz in 1829. M. contractus is a Californian species found in woods under stones.

metrocarcinoma (mē-trō-kār-si-nō'mā), n.; pl. metrocarcinomata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. μέτρα, womb, + καρκίνωμα, a cancer: see carcinoma.] In pathol., carcinoma of the uterus.

metrochrome (met'rō-krōm), n. [< Gr. μέτρον, a measure, + χρώμα, color.] An instrument for measuring colors.

metrocracy (mē-trok'rā-si), n. [< Gr. μέτρον, mother, + -κρατία, < κρατείν, rule.] Rule by the mother of the family.

The theory which regards metrocracy and communal marriage as a stage through which the human race in general has passed. The Academy, Feb. 15, 1888, p. 136.

metrograph (met'rō-gráf), n. [< Gr. μέτρον, a measure, + γράφειν, write.] An apparatus for measuring and recording the rate of speed of a railway locomotive at any moment, and the time of arrival at and departure from each station.

metrolacon (met-rō-i'a-kon), n.; pl. metrolaca (-kā). [LL., also metrolacum, < Gr. μετρώακον, neut. of μετρώακός, equiv. to μετρώος, of a mother, specifically of Cybele as the mother of the gods, < μέτρον, mother: see mother¹.] In pros., same as galliambus.

metrological (met-rō-loj'i-kal), a. [< metrology + -ical.] Of or pertaining to metrology.

metrologist (met-rō-lō-jist), n. [< metrology + -ist.] A student of or an expert in metrology.

metrology (met-rō-lō-jī), n. [= F. métrologie = Sp. metrologia = Pg. It. metrologia, < Gr. μέτρον, a measure, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.]

The science of weights and measures. It has two parts, one relating to the art of weighing and measuring, and the other accumulating facts in regard to units of measure which are now or have formerly been in use.—Documentary metrology, the science of ancient weights and measures based upon the study of monuments, especially of standards in regard to which there is sufficient evidence that they were intended to represent certain measures.—Historical metrology, the investigation of the weights and measures of the past, and especially of the ancients. It is divided into documentary and inductive metrology.—Inductive metrology, that based upon the measurement of a large number of objects in regard to any one of which there is little or no evidence that it was intended to have any exact measure.

metromaniac (met-rō-mā-ni-ak), a. [< metromania + -ic.] Characteristic of or affected with metromania; excessively fond of writing verses.

He seems to have [suddenly] acquired the facility of versification, and to display it with almost metromaniac eagerness.

W. Taylor, Survey of German Poetry, I. 188. (Davies.)

metrometer¹ (met-rom'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. μέτρον, measure, + μέτρον, measure.] Same as metronome.

metrometer² (met-rom'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. μέτρα, the womb, + μέτρον, measure.] Same as hystero-meter.

metronome (met'rō-nōm), n. [= F. métronome, < Gr. μέτρον, a measure, + νόμος, law: see nome³.] A mechanical contrivance for marking time, especially as an aid in musical study or performance.

In its usual form it consists of a double pendulum (oscillating on a pivot near its center), the lower end of which is weighted with a ball of lead, while the upper end carries a weight of brass that may be moved up or down. When the latter weight is moved up, the rate of oscillation is slower; when it is moved down, the rate is faster. The upper end of the pendulum is graduated, so that any desired number of oscillations per minute can be secured. The whole is connected with clock-work having a strong spring, whereby the oscillation may be maintained for several minutes, and each oscillation may be marked by a distinct tick or clack. The invention of the metronome was claimed by J. N. Maelzel in 1816, but it is probable that he only adapted and introduced it to general use.

The instrument is used for recording the tempo desired by a composer, and also as a means of teaching beginners the habit of keeping strict time. Its use is indicated in printed music by the metronomic mark (which see, under mark). Sometimes an attachment is added for striking a bell at every second, third, fourth, or sixth oscillation, so as to mark primary accents: such a metronome is called a bell-metronome. Various other metronomes have been invented, most of which are based upon the pendulum principle. Abbreviated M.

Maelzel's Metronome.

metronomic (met-rō-nom'ik), a. [< metronome + -ic.] Pertaining to a metronome, or to tempo as indicated by a metronome.—Metronomic mark. See *mark*¹.

metronomy (met-rōn'ō-mi), n. [< metronome + -y.] The act, process, or science of using a metronome, or of indicating tempo by reference to a metronome.

metronymic (met-rō-nim'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. μετρονυμικός, named after one's mother, < μέτρον, mother, + ὄνομα, Æolic ὄνομα, name: see onym. Cf. matronymic, patronymic.] 1. a. Derived from the name of a mother or other female ancestor: correlative to patronymic: as, a metronymic name.

II. n. A maternal name; a name derived from the mother or a maternal ancestor.

Of metronymics, as we may call them, used as personal descriptions, we find examples both before and after the Conquest. E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, v. 280.

metroperitonitis (mē-trō-per'i-tō-ni'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέτρα, the womb, + NL. peritonitis, q. v.] In pathol., inflammation of the uterus and peritoneum.

metrophlebitis (mē'trō-flē-bi'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέτρα, the womb, + NL. phlebitis, q. v.] Inflammation of the veins of the womb.

metropole (met'rō-pōl), n. [OF. metropole, F. métropole: see metropolis.] A metropolis. Halliwel.

Dublin being the metropole and chief city of the whole land, and where are his majesties principall and high courts. Holinshed, Ireland, an. 1578.

metropolis (mē-trop'ō-lis), n. [= F. métropole = Sp. metrópoli = Pg. It. metropoli, < LL. metropolis, < Gr. μετρόπολις, a mother state or city (a state or city in relation to its colonies), also a capital city, < μέτρον, = E. mother, + πόλις, state, city: see police.] 1. In ancient Greece, the mother city or parent state of a colony, as Corinth of Coreya and Syracuse, or Phocæa of Massalia (Marseilles), the colony being independent, but usually maintaining close relations with the metropolis.

This Sidon, the ancient Metropolis of the Phœnicians (now called Saito), in likelihood was built by Sidon.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 90.

Colonies may be regarded as independent states, attached to their metropolis by ties of sympathy and common descent, but no further.

W. Smith, Dict. Greek and Roman Antiq., p. 314.

2. Later, a chief city; a seat of government; in the early church, the see or chief city of an ecclesiastical province.

We stopped at Pavia, that was once the metropolis of a kingdom, but at present a poor town.

Addison, Travels in Italy.

3. In modern usage: (a) Specifically, the see or seat of a metropolitan bishop.

That so stood out against the holy church,
The great metropolis and see of Rome.

Shak., K. John, v. 2. 72.

Marcanopolis lost its metropolitan rights, though it still continued a See; and Debelus or Zagara became the Metropolis of the province.

J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 44.

(b) The capital city or seat of government of a country, as London, Paris, or Washington. (c) A chief city; a city holding the first rank in any respect within a certain territorial range: as, New York is the commercial metropolis of the United States.—4. In zoögeog. and bot., the place of most numerous representation of a species by individuals, or of a genus by species; the focus of a generic area. See generic.

metropolitan (met-rō-pol'i-tan), a. and n. [= F. métropolitain = Sp. Pg. It. metropolitano, < LL. metropolitanus, of a metropolis, < metropolis, a metropolis: see metropolis.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a metropolis, in any sense; residing in or connected with a metropolis: as, metropolitan enterprise; metropolitan police.

The eclipse

That metropolitan volcanoes make,
Whose Stygian throats breathe darkness all day long.

Couper, Task, III. 727.

2. Of or pertaining to the chief see of an ecclesiastical province: as, a metropolitan church.

A bishop at that time had power in his own diocese over all other ministers there, and a metropolitan bishop sundry prebendancy above other bishops.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. § 8.

Very near the metropolitan church there are several pieces of marble entablatures and columns.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. 1. 253.

Metropolitan district. See district.

II. n. 1. A citizen of the mother city or parent state of a colony. See metropolis, 1.

Both metropolitans and colonists styled themselves Hellenes, and were recognized as such by each other.

Grote, Hist. Greece, II. 315.

2. Eccles.: (a) In the early Christian church, the bishop of the municipal capital of a province or eparchy, who had a general ecclesiastical tial superintendence over the bishops and churches of his province, confirmed, ordained, and when necessary excommunicated the bishops, and convened and presided over the provincial synods. The superiority in rank of the bishops of the principal sees was so early established that many authorities have held that the office of metropolitan (including also under this title the primates of patriarchal sees) was of apostolic origin. In the developed organization under the Christian emperors a metropolitan ranked above an ordinary bishop and below a patriarch or exarch. In medieval times the power of most of the metropolitans in western countries became much diminished, while that of the diocesan bishops and the pope was relatively increased. See archbishop and primate.

By consent of all churches, . . . the precedence in each province was assigned to the Bishop of the Metropolis, who was called the first Bishop, the Metropolitan.

Barrow, The Pope's Supremacy.
The bishops [of Cyprus] were . . . subjected to the Latin metropolitan, who was bound to administer justice among them. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 167.

(b) In modern usage, in the Roman Catholic and other episcopal churches, any archbishop who has bishops under his authority.

These be, lo, the very prelates and byshoppes metropolitans and postles of theyr sects. Sir T. More, Works, p. 1091.

The archbishops of Canterbury and York are both metropolitans. Hook.

An Oath of obedience to the metropolitan . . . was added to the Oath of Supremacy. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xvi.

(c) In the Greek Church, the bishop of the municipal capital of a province, who is in rank intermediate between a patriarch and a bishop or titular archbishop.

At length the gilded portals of the sanctuary are reopened, and the Metropolitan, attended by the deacons, comes forward, carrying the Holy Eucharist. Harper's Mag., LXXIX, 197.

3†. A chief city; a metropolis.

It [Amiens] is . . . the metropolitan of Picardy. Coryat, Crudities, I, 15.

Metrosideros (mē'trō-si-dē'rē-ō), n. pl. [< NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1865), < Metrosideros + -ea.] A subtribe of plants of the natural order Myrtaceæ, the myrtle family, typified by the genus Metrosideros. It is characterized by many free stamens, arranged in one or many series, or connate in clusters, opposite the petals, myrtle-like or large and feather-veined leaves, and flowers almost always in corymbs or short racemes. It embraces 11 genera and about 60 species, which are found principally in Australia and New Caledonia.

Metrosideros (mē'trō-si-dē'ros), n. [< NL. (Banks, 1788), < Gr. μήτρα, the pith or heart of a tree, lit. womb, + σίδηρος, iron: see siderite.] A genus of plants of the natural order Myrtaceæ and the tribe Septospermeæ, type of the subtribe Metrosiderææ. They are trees or shrubs, sometimes climbers — a few climbing when young, and independent when old. The ovules are arranged in many series, and horizontal or ascending; the leaves are opposite and feather-veined; the flowers are usually showy, prevailing red, strongly marked by their crown of very numerous long erect stamens, and borne in dense terminal three-forked cymes. There are about 20 species, growing chiefly in the Pacific islands, from New Zealand to the Sandwich Islands, one species each in tropical Australia, the Indian archipelago, and South Africa. M. vera is the iron-tree of Java, and M. robusta the rata of New Zealand. Various species are known in cultivation. Nine fossil species of this genus have been described, chiefly from the European Tertiary, but one occurs in the Middle Cretaceous of Greenland.

Ironwood (Metrosideros vera).

(Rottböll), < Gr. μήτρα, the pith or heart of a tree, + ξύλον, wood.] A genus of palms, known to older writers as Sagus (Blume), of the tribe Lepidocaryæ and the subtribe Calameæ. They bear fruit but once, and are characterized by robust stems and branching spikes. They are large trees with terminal suberect pinnately cut leaves having opposite linear-lanceolate segments; the spadix has a coriaceous prickly spathe. Seven species are known, indigenous in the Malay archipelago, New Guinea, and the Fiji Islands. M. levis and M. Rumphii, natives of Siam, the Malayan islands, etc., are the proper sago-palms. The former grows from 25 to 60 feet high, and has a rather thick trunk, covered with leaf-scars, which bears a graceful crown of large pinnate leaves, from the center of which arise the pyramidal flower-spikes. The latter is a much smaller tree, further distinguished by the sharp spines borne on its leaves and flower-sheaths. These trees flower when about fifteen years old, and require nearly three years to ripen their fruit, after which they die. (See sago.) M. Rumphii is a littoral tree which forms dense growths; M. levis grows in swamps. M. amicarum, a species in the Friendly Islands, yields seeds which serve as a vegetable ivory.

mews¹ (mūz), n. pl. [Formerly also mues; pl. of *mew*⁴, n., 4.] 1. The royal stables in London, so called because built where the mews of the king's hawks were situated; hence, a place where carriage-horses are kept in large towns.

The Mews at Charing-cross, Westminster, is so called from the word Mew, which in the falconer's language is the name of a place wherein the hawks are put at the moulting time, when they cast their feathers. The king's hawks were kept at this place as early as the year 1877, an. 1 Richard II.; but A. D. 1587, the 27th year of Henry VIII., it was converted into stables for that monarch's horses, and the hawks were removed.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 96.

There was some disturbance last night in consequence of the mob assembling round the King's mews, where the rest of the battalion that had marched to Portsmouth still remained.

Greville, Memoirs, June 16, 1820.

mezuzah (me-zō'zh), n.; pl. mezuzoth (-zoth).

[Heb.] Among the Jews, an emblem consisting of a piece of parchment, inscribed on one side with the words found in Deut. vi. 4-9 and xi. 13-21, on the other with "Shaddai," "the Almighty," and so placed in a small hollow cylinder that the divine name is visible through an opening covered by a glass. This cylinder is affixed to the right-hand door-post in Jewish houses. The Jews believed that the mezuzah had the virtue of an amulet in protecting a house from disease and evil spirits.

Every pious Jew, as often as he passes the mezuzah, in leaving the house or in entering it, touches the divine name with the finger of his right hand, puts it to his mouth, and kisses it, saying in Hebrew "The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore" (Ps. cxli. 8).

mezzo (med'zō), a.; fem. mezza (med'zā). [It., < L. medius, middle: see *mid*¹, medium.] In music, middle; half; mean; moderate. Abbreviated M.—Mezza manica, a half-suit in violin-playing.—Mezza orchestra, with but half the instruments of an orchestra.—Mezza voce, with but half the voice; not loud.—Mezzo forte, moderately loud. Abbreviated mf.—Mezzo piano, moderately soft. Abbreviated mp.—Mezzo punto. Same as Gueuse lace (which see, under lace).—Mezzo-soprano, a voice or a voice-part of a compass between those of the soprano and the alto; a low soprano, especially one with a larger, deeper natural quality than a true soprano.—Mezzo-soprano clef, a C clef when placed on the second line of the staff.—Mezzo staccato, moderately or half staccato.—Mezzo-tenore, a voice or a voice-part of a compass between those of the tenor and the bass; a low tenor: more usually called a barytone, though the latter is rather a high bass than a low tenor.

mezzo-rilievo (med'zō-rē-lyā'vō), n. [It., < mezzo, middle, half, + rilievo, relief: see relief.] 1. In sculp., relief higher than bas-relief but lower than alto-rilievo; middle relief.—2. A piece of sculpture in such relief.

mezzotint (mez'ō- or med'zō-tint), n. [It. mezzotinto, < mezzo, middle, half, + tinto (< L. tinctus), painted, pp. of tingere, paint: see tint, tinge.] A method of engraving on copper or steel of which the essential feature is the burnishing and scraping away, to a variable extent, of a uniformly roughened surface consisting of minute incisions, accompanied by a bur, produced by an instrument called a cradle or rocker. This surface is left nearly undisturbed in the deepest shadows of the subject, but is partially removed in the middle tints, and completely in the highest lights. Thus treated, the plate, when inked, prints impressions graded in light and shade according to the requirements of the design, from a rich velvety and perfectly uniform black up through every variation of tone to brilliant white, or showing, when desirable, the sharpest contrasts between the extremes. This style of engraving, invented by Van Slegen, a Dutchman, in 1643, though erroneously ascribed to his pupil Prince Rupert, has been pursued with most success in England. The defect of the process is that it does not admit of clear and sharp delineation of forms; hence in modern practice the outline of the design is strongly etched with acid before the cradle is used, and texture is often given to the finished plate by lines produced by dry-point etching.

This afternoon Prince Rupert shew'd me with his own hands a new way of graving call'd Mezzo Tinto.

Evelyn, Diary, March 13, 1661.

Mezzotint print, in photog., a picture having some resemblance in texture, finish, or effect to a mezzotint engraving. See the quotation.

Others modify the effects and soften their paper prints by interposing a sheet of glass, of gelatin, of mica, or of tissue paper between the negative and the paper; in this way are made the so-called Mezzotint Prints.

Lea, Photography, p. 194.

mezzotint (mez'-ō- or med'-zō-tint), v. t. [mez- + zō-tint, n.] To engrave in mezzotint; represent in or as if in mezzotint.

How many times I had lingered to study the shadows of the leaves mezzotinted upon the turf.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 54.

Painted by Kneller in 1716, and mezzotinted a year later by Smith.

Scribner's Mag., III. 542.

mezzotinter (mez'-ō- or med'-zō-tin-tēr), n. An artist who works in mezzotint; an engraver of mezzotints.

1700. Mr. John Smith: The best mezzotinter, . . . who united softness with strength, and finishing with freedom.

Walpole, Catalogue of Engravers, V. 202.

mezzotinto (med-zō-tin'tō), n. and v. Same as mezzotint.

mf. In music, the abbreviation of mezzo forte.

M. P. H. An abbreviation of Master of Fox-hounds.

M. ft. [Abbr. of L. mistura fiat: mistura, mixture; fiat, 3d pers. sing. subj. pres. of feri, be done: see fiat.] In phar., let a mixture be made: used in medical prescriptions.

Mg. In chem., the symbol for magnesium.

M. G. (a) An abbreviation of Major-General.

(b) In musical notation, an abbreviation of the French main gauche (left hand), indicating that a note or passage is to be played with the left hand.

Mgr. An abbreviation of Monsignor or of Monsieur.

M. H. G. An abbreviation of Middle High German. In the etymologies in this work it is written more briefly MHG.

mho (mō), n. [A reversed form of ohm.] A term proposed by Sir William Thomson for the unit of electrical conductivity. It is the conductivity of a body whose resistance is one ohm.

rhometer (mom'e-tēr), n. [mho + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring electrical conductivities.

mi (mē), n. [It., etc., orig. taken from the first syllable of L. mira: see gamut.] In solmization, the syllable used for the third tone of the scale. In the scale of C this tone is E, which is therefore sometimes called mi in France, Italy, etc. — Mi contra fa, in medieval music, the interval of the tritone, "the devil in music": so named because it occurred between mi (B) of the "hard" hexachord and fa (F) of the "natural" hexachord: see hexachord and tritone. Also called el contra fa.

miana-bug (mi-an'g-bug), n. [Miana, a town in Persia, + E. bug.] A kind of tick, Argas persicus, of the family Ixodidae, whose bite is very painful and said to be even fatal. See Argas.

miaouli (mi-ou'li), n. [Malay (f).] The volatile oil of Melaleuca flaviflora. It closely resembles cajeput-oil.

miargyrite (mi-ār'ji-rīt), n. [Gr. μίαν, less, + ἀργύρος, silver, + -ite.] In mineral., a sulphid of antimony and silver, occurring in monoclinic crystals of an iron-black color with dark cherry-red streak.

miarolitic (mi-ar-ō-lit'ik), a. [Gr. μίαν, stained, impure, + λίθος, stone.] A word introduced by Rosenbusch to designate the structure of rocks of the granitic family, where the magma in assuming a crystalline character has shrunk in dimensions so as to leave numerous small cavities, giving the mass a structure somewhat analogous to that commonly designated as saccharoidal, as in the case of metamorphic limestone, and also to that to which the name drusy is sometimes applied.

mias (mi'as), n. [Malay.] A native name of the orang-outang. The natives distinguish three kinds, mias papayan, mias kassar, and mias rombi, which are, however, not scientifically determined to be different from one another. A. R. Wallace.

miaskite, miaskite (mi-as'kit), n. [Miask, in Siberia, where the rock is found, + -ite.] In petrog. See aeolite-syenite.

miasm (mi'azm), n. [F. miasme = Sp. Pg. It. miasma, < NL. miasma, < Gr. μίαν, stain, pollution (cf. μιάω, stain), < μάλειν, stain, dye, taint, pollute.] Same as miasma.

The plague is a malignant fever, caused through pestilential miasms insinuating into the humoral and consistent parts of the body.

Harvey, Consumptions.

miasma (mi-az'mā), n.; pl. miasmata (-mā-tā). [NL.: see miasm.] The emanations or effluvia arising from the ground and floating in the atmosphere, considered to be infectious or otherwise injurious to health; noxious emanations; malaria. Also called aërial poison.

miasmal (mi-az'māl), a. [< miasm + -al.] Containing miasma; miasmatic: as, miasmal swamps.

miasmatic (mi-az-mat'ik), a. [= F. miasmaticus = Sp. miasmático = Pg. It. miasmatico, < NL. miasma (t): see miasm.] Pertaining to or of the nature of miasma; affected, caused by, or arising from noxious effluvia; malarious: as, miasmatic exhalations; miasmatic diseases; a miasmatic region. — Miasmatic fever. See fever.

miasmatical (mi-az-mat'ik-āl), a. [< miasmatic + -al.] Same as miasmatic.

miasmatis (mi-az-mā-tist), n. [< miasma (t) + -ist.] One who is versed in the phenomena and nature of noxious exhalations; one who makes a special study of diseases arising from miasmata.

miasmatus (mi-az'mā-tus), a. [< miasma (t) + -ous.] Generating miasma: as, stagnant and miasmatus pools.

miasmology (mi-az-mol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. μίαν, (see miasm) + λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A treatise on miasma; the science that treats of miasmata. Imp. Dict.

miasmous (mi-az'mus), a. [< miasma + -ous.] Miasmatic; miasmatic.

The miasmata, where swamps and woods cover cities and fields, and some herds of wild cattle and their half savage keepers are the only occupants of a fertile but miasmous desert.

J. P. Mahaffy, Harper's Mag., LXVIII. 902.

Miastor (mi-as'tor), n. [NL., < Gr. μίαν, a guilty wretch, also an avenger, < μάλειν, stain, defile, pass. intrans. defilement: see miasm.] A remarkable genus of nemoceros dipterous insects of the family Cecidomyiidae, having moniliform eleven-jointed antennae, short two-jointed palpi, and the wings with three veins, the middle one of which does not reach the apex. M. metroloas is an example. This species reproduces asexually. The larvae, which are found under bark, develop within themselves other similar larvae, which again reproduce themselves, until this chain of asexual reproduction ends by the passing of the larva to the pupa state, from which sexual individuals arise to pair and lay eggs for a fresh generation in the usual way. Meinert, 1864.

miau, miaw (mi-ow, miā), v. i. Variant forms of mew. Minsheu.

miaul (mi-āl'), v. i. [= F. miauler: see mew.] To cry as a cat; mew.

I mind a squalling woman no more than a miauling kitten.

Scott.

There was a cat trying to get at the pigeons in the coop. It clawed and miauled at the lattice-work of lath.

Howells, Annie Kilburn, xxix.

mica¹ (mi'kā), n. [= OF. (and F.) mie = It. mica, < L. mica, a crumb, grain, little bit. Hence ult. miche and mie: see mie.] A crumb; a little bit. E. Phillips, 1706.

mica² (mi'kā), n. [= F. mica = Sp. Pg. mica, a mineral, < NL. mica, a glittering mineral (see def.), < L. mica, a crumb (cf. mica¹), prob. applied to the mineral on the supposition that it was related to L. micare, shine, glitter.] 1. One of a group of minerals all of which are characterized by their very perfect basal cleavage, in consequence of which they can be separated easily into extremely thin, tough, and usually elastic laminae. They occur in crystals with a prismatic angle of 120° but more commonly in crystalline aggregates, often of large plates, but sometimes of minute scales, having a foliated structure, the folia being generally parallel, but also concentric, wavy, and interwoven, and also arranged in stellate or plumose and sometimes almost fibrous forms. In crystallization the micas belong to the monoclinic system, but they approximate very closely in form in part to the orthorhombic system (e. g., muscovite), in part to the rhombohedral system (e. g., biotite). The micas are silicates of aluminum with other bases, as iron, calcium, magnesium, potassium, sodium, lithium; in some kinds fluorine is present in small amount. The prominent varieties are—muscovite or common potash mica, the light-colored mica of granite and similar rocks, and paragonite, which is an analogous soda species; biotite, or magnesia mica (including meroxene and anomite, distinguished according to the position of the optic axial plane), the black or dark-green mica of granite, hornblende rocks, etc.; phlogopite, the bronze-colored species common in crystalline limestone and serpentine rocks; lepidomelane, a black mica containing a large amount of iron; and lepidolite, the rose-red or lilac lithia mica occurring commonly in aggregates of scales. (See further under these names.) The micas enter into the composition of many rocks, including the crystalline rocks, both metamorphic and volcanic (as granite, gneiss, mica-schist, trachyte, diorite, etc.), and sedimentary rocks (as shales and sandstones), sometimes giving them a laminated structure. In the sedimentary rocks they are in most cases derived from the disintegration of older crystalline rocks. Mica (muscovite) is often used in thin transparent plates for spectacles to protect the eyes in various mechanical processes, in reflectors, instead of glass in places exposed to heat, as in head-lights and stove- and lantern-lights, and even for windows in Russia (hence called Muscovy glass). Ground to powder, it is combined with varnish to make a glittering coating for wall-papers, and is used also in preparing a covering for roofs, and as a packing and lubricator for machinery. It is often vulgarly called islinglass. The so-called brittle micas include a number of species, as margarite, sebertite (clintonite), etc., which are related to the true micas, but are characterized by their brittle folia. 2. In the preparation of kaolin for use in the manufacture of porcelain, one of the second set of channels through which a mixture of water and suspended clay washed out by the water from the broken clay-bearing rock is slowly passed to obtain the deposition of flakes of mica and other foreign substances, and thus to purify the clay, which is finally allowed to subside in a series of pits or tanks. Each of the first set of channels through which the mixture is passed for the settling of the coarser flakes of mica, etc., is called a drag. This set of channels is collectively called the drags, and the second set the micas. See porcelain and kaolin. — Copper mica. Same as chalcophyllite. — Lithia mica. Same as lepidolite. — Mica-powder, giant-powder in which mica in fine scales takes the place of the silicious earth. Blaser, Mod. High Explosives, p. 363.

mica-. A prefix frequently used in lithology when the rock in question contains more or less mica in addition to the other usual constituents. Thus, mica-syenite, a rock differing very little from ordinary syenite; mica-trap, nearly the same as minette, etc.

micaceous (mi-kā'shū), a. [= F. micacé = Sp. micáceo = Pg. It. micaceo, < NL. "micaceus", < mica, mica: see mica².] 1. Pertaining to or containing mica; resembling mica or partaking of its properties, especially that of occurring in foliated masses consisting of separable laminae: as, micaceous structure. — 2. Figuratively, sparkling. Davies. [Rare.]

There is the Cyclopean stile of which Johnson is the great example, the sparkling or micaceous possessed by Hazlitt.

Southey, The Doctor, Interchapter xxii.

Micaceous iron ore. See iron. — Micaceous rocks, rocks of which mica is the chief ingredient, as mica-slate and clay-slate. — Micaceous schist, mica-schist.

Micaria (mi-kā'ri-ā), n. Same as Macaria.

mica-schist (mi'kā-shist'), n. A rock made up of quartz and mica, with a more or less schistose or slaty structure. The relative proportion of the two minerals differs often very considerably even in the same mass of rock. The usual mica in a typical mica-schist is the species called muscovite; this, however, is sometimes replaced to a certain extent by biotite or paragonite. Mica-schist passes readily into talc-schist and chlorite-schist; and when feldspar is added to the other constituents of the rock it becomes gneiss. It is one of the most abundantly distributed of the so-called crystalline or metamorphic rocks, and, with granite, gneiss, and the other members of the schist family, forms the main body of the rocks formerly designated as primitive.

mica-slate (mi'kā-slāt'), n. The common name of the rock now usually designated by lithologists as mica-schist.

mice, n. Plural of mouse.

mice-eyed (mis'id), a. Keen-eyed; sharp-sighted.

A legion of mice-eyed decipherers.

Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 177). (Davies.)

micella (mi-sel'ā), n.; pl. micellæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of L. mica, a crumb, grain: see mica¹.] One of the hypothetical crystalloid bodies or plates supposed by Nägeli to be the units out of which organized bodies, more particularly plants, are built up. These micellæ were supposed to be aggregates of larger or smaller numbers of chemical molecules, and were determined by the optical properties exhibited by cell-walls, starch-grains, and various proteid crystalloids. From their optical properties it was concluded further that they were biaxial crystals, and they were assigned, as a probable form, that of parallelepipedal prisms with rectangular or rhomboid bases.

Crystalline doubly refracting particles or micellæ, each consisting of numerous atoms and impermeable by water.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 12.

micellar (mi-sel'ār), a. [< micella + -ar.] Pertaining or relating to micellæ.

Naegeli's micellar hypothesis. Science, VIII. 571.

Mich. An abbreviation of Michaelmas.

michaelite (mi'kel-it), n. [< Michael (St. Michael), an island of the Azores, where it is found + -ite.] In mineral., a white, pearly, fibrous variety of opal.

Michaelmas (mik'el-mas), n. [ME. Michelmesse, Mychelmesse, Mihelmas, Mihelmasse, Myhelmasse, < Michel (< F. Michel, < Heb. Mīkhā'el, a proper name, signifying 'who is like God')]

+ masse, messe, mass: see mass.] 1. A festival celebrated by the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican, and some other churches on September 29th, in honor of the archangel Michael. The festival is called in full the Festival or Feast of St. Michael and All Angels. It appears to have originated in a local celebration or celebrations, and seems to have already existed in the fifth century. The Greek Church dedicates November 8th to St. Michael, St. Gabriel, and All Angels; the Armenian and Coptic churches also observe this day.

For lodes and lories luthere and goode,
Fro Myhel-masse to Myhel-masse ich fynde mete and drynke.
Piers Plowman (C), xvi. 215.

2. September the 29th as one of the four quarter-days in England on which rents are paid.

And when the tenants come to pay their quarter's rent,
They bring some fowl at Midsummer, a dish of fish in Lent,
At Christmas a capon, at Michaelmas a goose.
Gaucigny (1575), quoted in Chambers's Book of Days, II. 290.

All this, though perchance you read it not till Michaelmas, was told you at Micham, 15th August, 1807.
Donne, Letters, x.

Michaelmas daisy. See daisy.—Michaelmas head-cour. See head-cour.—Michaelmas moon, the harvest moon. Jamieson. [Scot.]

Michaelsonite (mik'-el-son-it), n. [Named after C. A. Michaelson, a Swedish chemist.] In mineralogy, a rare mineral found in the zirconsyenite of Norway; it is related to allanite.

miche¹ (mich), v. i. [Formerly also mych, myche; also meech, meach, and mooch, mouch; < ME. michen, moochen, mouchen, < OF. muchier, mucier, musier, mucer, musser, F. musser, hide, conceal oneself, skulk.] 1. To shrink from view; lie hidden; skulk; sneak.

Straggle up and downe the countrey, or miche in corners amongst theyr frenedes idlye, as Carougha, Bardes, Jesters.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

You, sir, that are micheing about my golden mines here.
Chapman, Mask of Middle Temple and Lincoln's Inn.

I never look'd for better of that rascall
Since he came micheing first into our house.
Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness.

2. To be guilty of anything sly, skulking, or mean, such as carrying on an illicit amour, or pilfering in a sneaking way. See micher.

What made the Gods so often to trowant from Heauen, and mych heere on earth, but beaute?
Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 279.

miche², a. and n. A Middle English form of much.

miche³, n. See mitch.

michelt, a. and n. See mickle.

Michelangelesque (mi-kel-an-jel-esk'), a. [Michelangelo (see def.) + -esque.] Pertaining to Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475-1564), a famous Italian sculptor, painter, and architect; resembling the style of Michelangelo, or belonging to his school.

Michelangelism (mi-kel-an-jel-izm), n. [Michelangelo (see def.) + -ism.] The manner or tendencies in art of Michelangelo Buonarroti. See Michelangelesque.

It shuns the Scylla of nullity and bad taste only to fall into the Charybdis of Michelangelism.
C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 250.

Michelia (mi-kē'li-ä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), named after Micheli, a Florentine botanist of the early part of the 18th century.] A genus of plants of the natural order Magnoliaceae and the tribe Magnolieae, characterized by introrse anthers, by having the cluster of pistils raised on a stalk, and by the many-seeded carpels. They are trees having much the appearance of magnolias, but with the flowers usually smaller and (with one exception) axillary, whereas magnolia-flowers are terminal. About 12 species are known, natives of tropical and mountainous Asia. The most noteworthy species are M. excelsa, the champ, and M. champaca, the champak, both valuable economically, the latter a sacred tree in India. See champ and champak.

michellewyite (mē-shel-lev'i-it), n. [Named after M. Michel Lévy, a French mineralogist.] A mineral having the composition of barite, barium sulphate, and probably that species, but believed by the describer to belong to the monoclinic system. It is found in a massive cleavable form occurring in a crystalline limestone near Perkins' Mill, Templeton, Province of Quebec, Canada.

michert, n. [Also meecher, meacher; < ME. mycher, mecher; < miche¹ + -er¹.] One who skulks or sneaks; a truant; a mean thief.

Chyld, be thou lye nother no theffe;
Be thou no mecher for myscheffe.
Babees Book (E. E. T. 8.), p. 401.

Shall the blessed sun of heaven prove a micher, and eat blackberries?
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., II. 4. 450.

michery (mich'er-i), n. [ME. micherie, < OF. mucherie*, < muchier, mucher, etc., hide, skulk: see miche¹.] Theft; pilfering; cheating.

Nowe thou shalt full sore able

That like stelling of miche¹.

Gower, Conf. Amant., v.

miching (mich'ing), n. [Also meeching, meaching; < ME. michynge; verbal n. of miche¹, v.] The act of skulking or sneaking; the act of pilfering or cheating.

For no man of his counsaile knoweth

What he male gette of his michynge.

Gower, Conf. Amant., v.

Oph. What means this, my lord?

Ham. Marry, this is miching mallecho; it means mischief.

Shak., Hamlet, II. 2. 149.

We never, in our whole school course, once played truant; but other boys did, and the process was freely talked of among us. We called it miching, pronouncing the i in mich long, as in mile.

P. H. Gosse, Longman's Mag.

miching (mich'ing), p. a. [Also meeching, meaching; prp. of miche¹, v.] Skulking; sneaking; dodging; pilfering; mean.

Sure she has some meeching rascal in her house.

Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, IV. 1.

A cat . . . grown fat

With eating many a miching mouse.

Herrick, His Grange, or Private Wealth.

But I ain't o' the meechin' kind, thet sets an' thinks fer weeks
The bottom's out o' th' univarse cos their own gillpout

Lovell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., p. 13.

"How came the ship to run up a tailor's bill?" "Why, them's mine," said the cap'n, very meeching.

S. O. Jewett, Deephaven, p. 159.

micken (mik'en), n. [Origin obscure.] The herb spiguel: also called Highland micken. See Meum². [Scot.]

mickle (mik'l), a. and n. [I. a. Also dial. muckle, meikle; < ME. mikel, mekel, mukel, mykel (also assimilated michel, mechel, mukel, mochel, > ult. E. much), < AS. micel, mycel = OS. mikil = OLG. mikil, MLG. michel = OHG. michil, mihhil, MHG. michel = Icel. mikill, mykill = Goth. mikils, great, = Gr. μέγας (megal-), great, akin to L. magnus, great (OL. majus, great), compar. major: see main², magnitude, etc., major, mayor, etc. II. n. < ME. mikel, etc., mochel, etc.; partly (in sense of 'size') < AS. micel*, mycel, size (= OHG. michili, greatness, size, = Goth. mikilei, greatness), < micel, mycel, great; and partly the adj. used as a noun: see I. Mickle is a more orig. form, now obs. or dial., of the word which by assimilation and loss of the final syllable has become much: see muck.] I. a. 1. Great; large.

A! mercyfull maker, full mekil es thi mighte.

York Plays, p. 8.

He has tane up a meikle stane,

And fang't as far as I cold see.

The Wee Wee Man (Child's Ballads, I. 126).

O mickle is the powerful grace that lies

In herbe, plants, stones, and their true qualities.

Shak., R. and J., II. 3. 15.

2. Much; abundant.

O cruell Boy, alas, how mickle gall

Thy beaufull shaft mingles thy Meil withall!

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Magnificence.

There was never mee meikle allier clinked in his purse

Scott, Waverley, xviii.

Let me laugh awhile, I've mickle time to grieve.

Keats, Eve of St. Agnes, xiv.

II. n. 1. Size; magnitude; bigness.

A wonder wel-farynge knyght, . . .

Of good mochel, and ryght yonge therto.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, I. 454.

2. A great deal; a large quantity: as, many lilles make a mickle.

mickle¹, v. t. [ME. mikelen, muclen, muclien, also assimilated muchelen, < AS. micelian, miclian, also gemiclian (= OHG. mikhilōn = Icel. mikla = Goth. mikiljan), become great, make great, magnify, < micel, great: see mickle, a. Cf. much, v.] To magnify.

mickleness (mik'l-nes), n. [ME. mekilnesse, < AS. micelnes, mycelnes, < micel, great: see mickle and -ness.] Bigness; great size.

After this ther com sponne thame thame a grete multitude of swyne, that ware alle of a wonderfulle mekilnesse, with tuakes of a cubett lenthe.

MS. Lincoln A. 1. 17, f. 23. (Halliwell.)

micky (mik'i), n.; pl. mickies (-iz). [A dim. of Mike, a familiar abbreviation of Michael, a favorite name among Irishmen, from that of St. Michael. Cf. Pat, Paddy, similarly derived from the name of St. Patrick.] 1. An Irish boy. [Slang, U. S.]—2. A young wild bull. [Australian.]

There were two or three Mickies and wild heifers, who determined to have their owner's heart's blood.

A. C. Grant, Bush-life in Queensland, I. 227.

mico (mē'kō), n. [S. Amer.] 1. A small squirrel-like monkey of South America, one of the marmosets or ostitis, of the genus Hapale or Jacchus. H. argentatus is white, with black tail and flesh-colored face and hands.—2. [cap.] A genus of marmosets based on this species.

Miconia (mi-kō'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1798), named after D. Micon, a Spanish botanist.] A large genus of South American plants of the natural order Melastomaceae and type of the tribe Miconieae. It is characterized by terminal inflorescence, 4- or 8-parted flowers with obtuse petals, and a calyx which has a cylindrical tube and usually a 4- to 8-lobed limb. They are trees or shrubs, with very variable foliage, and white, rose-colored, purple, or yellowish flowers, which are small, and grow in terminal or very rarely lateral clusters. About 490 species have been enumerated, all confined to tropical America. Quite a number are cultivated for ornament. They sometimes receive the name of West Indian currant-bush.

Miconiess (mi-kō-ni'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1828), < Miconia + -ess.] A tribe of New World plants, belonging to the natural order Melastomaceae, typified by the genus Miconia. It is characterized by a berry-like or coriaceous fruit, which breaks open irregularly; by the leaves not being grooved between the primary nerves; and by the anthers opening by one or two pores or alits, with the connective usually having no appendages. The tribe includes 25 genera and nearly 1,000 species, all of which are indigenous to tropical America.

micostalis (mi-kos-tā'lis), n.; pl. micostales (-lēz). [NL. (Wilder and Gage), < F. micostal (Straus-Dureckheim), supposed to stand for microcostal, < Gr. μικρός, small, + L. costa, rib: see costal.] A muscle of the fore leg of some animals, as the cat, corresponding to the human teres minor.

micrander (mik-ran'dér), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + άνδρ (androp-), male.] A dwarf male plant produced by certain coniferoid algae. The androspores, which are peculiar sspores produced non-sexually in special cells of the parent plant, fix themselves (after swarming) upon the female plant and produce these very small male plants.

Micrastur (mik-ras'tér), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + L. astur, a species of hawk: see astur.] A genus of hawks of the family Falconidae and subfamily Accipitrinae, established by G. R. Gray in 1841, having the tarsus reticulated behind and the nostrils circular with a centric tubercle. It is peculiar to America, the species ranging from southern Mexico to Bolivia and Peru.

Micrathene (mik-ra-thē'nē), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + Αθήνη, Athens: see Athene.] A genus of Strigidae established by Coues in 1866; the elf-owls. It includes the most diminutive of owls, with small weak bill and feet, relatively long rounded wings, square tail with broad rectrices, tarsi feathered only above, the feet elsewhere covered with bristles, and middle toe with claw as long as the tarsus. The type and only species is M. whitneyi, an insectivorous owl of arboreal habits, found in the southwestern United States and parts of Mexico. It is only about six inches long. Also called Micropallas.

micraulic (mik-rā'lik), a. [NL. micraulicus, < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. aula, aula: see aula, 2.] Having the aula small; specifically, of or pertaining to micraulica.

micraulica (mik-rā'li-kä), n. pl. [NL.: see micraulic.] Animals whose aula is small and whose cerebral hemispheres are vertically expanded. They are amphibians, dipnoans, reptiles, birds, and mammals. Wilder, Amer. Nat., Oct., 1887, p. 914.

Micrembryae (mik-rem-brī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1880), < Gr. μικρός, small, + εμβρυον, a germ: see embryo.] A series of dicotyledonous apetalous plants. It is characterized by an ovary consisting of a single carpel or of several united or distinct carpels, by the ovules being solitary or rarely several in each carpel, and by the seed having copious fleshy or starchy albumen and a very small embryo. It includes 4 orders (Piperaceae, Chloranthaceae, Myrtaceae, and Monimiaceae), 59 genera, and nearly 1,800 species.

micrencephalous (mik-ren-sef'a-lus), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + ἐγκέφαλος, the brain.] Small-brained; having a small brain.

micristology (mik-ris-tol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. histology.] The science which treats of the minutest organic fibers. Thomas, Med. Diet.

micro (mī'krō), n. [Gr. μικρο-, as used in Microcoleoptera, etc.] In entom., any small insect. Thus, Microcoleoptera are small beetles, Microdiptera are small flies, etc.; and in familiar language, when the meaning is sufficiently determined by the connection, such words are abbreviated to micro. When not so determined, micro always means one of the Microlepidoptera.

micro- (usually mī'krō, but also, better, mik'rō). [L., etc., micro-, < Gr. μικρός, also σμικρός, small, little.] An element of Greek origin, meaning 'small, little'; specifically, in physics, a prefix indicating a unit one millionth part of the unit it is prefixed to: as, microfarad, microhm, etc.:

in lithol., indicating that the structure designated is microscopic in character, or that it is so minutely developed as not to be recognized without the help of the microscope, e. g. micro-granitic, micropegmatitic, microgranulitic. See these words.

micro-audiphone (mī'krō-ā'di-fōn), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. audiphone.] An instrument for reinforcing or augmenting very feeble sounds so as to render them audible.

Microbacterium (mī'krō-bak-tē'ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + βακτήριον, a little stick: see bacterium.] In some systems of classification, a tribe or division of Schizomycetes, containing the single genus Bacterium, and characterized by having elliptical or short cylindrical cells.

microbal (mī'krō-bāl), a. Same as microbial.

But now we have antiseptics of the track and careful covering of the wound to guard against microbial invasion. Medical News, LII. 506.

microbe (mī'krōb), n. [F. microbe (C. Sedillot, 1878) (NL. microbion), intended to mean 'a small living being,' but according to the formation 'short-lived' (cf. Gr. μικρός, short-lived, < Gr. μικρός, small, little, + βίος, life.) A minute living being not distinguished, primarily, as to its animal or vegetable nature. The term is most frequently applied to various microscopic plants or their spores (particularly Schizomycetes), and further has come to be almost synonymous with bacterium. Taken in this latter sense, microbes are regarded as essentially polymorphous organisms, adapting themselves to varied conditions of existence, which in turn influence the form taken by them. For this reason their classification has often varied, since their distinction into genera and species does not yet rest on precise data. Micrococcus, Spirillum, Bacillus, Leptothrix, Bacterium, Vibrio, Spirillum, and Mycobacterium are the genera or form-genera under which most of the forms are known. They are instrumental in the production of fermentation, decay, and many of the infectious diseases affecting man and the lower animals.

Micrococcus prodigiosus.

Micrococcus of Chicken Cholera.

microbia, n. Plural of microbion.

microbial (mī'krō'bi-āl), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + βίος, life.] Of or pertaining to microbes; caused by or due to microbes. Also microbal.

There is a considerable difference found in the microbial richness of the air in different places in the country. Nineteenth Century, XXII. 244.

microbian (mī'krō'bi-an), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + βίος, life.] Microbial.

His definition of pellagra is therefore this: "a microbial malady, due to a poisoning produced by a pathogenic bacillus." Lancet, No. 3449, p. 707.

microbic (mī'krō'bik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + βίος, life.] Microbial.

The theory of the microbic causation of the disorder. Medical News, LII. 376.

microbicide (mī'krō'bi-sid), n. [NL. microbion, microbe, + L. -cida, a killer, < cædere, kill.] A substance that kills microbes.

Sulphur is well known as a powerful microbicide long recommended in pulmonary diseases. Medical News, L. 366.

microbiological (mī'krō-bi-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + βίος, life, + -λογία, -logy.] Of or pertaining to microbiology: as, microbiological research.

Microbiological study of the lochia. Medical News, XLVIII. 147.

microbiologist (mī'krō-bi-ō-lōj'ist), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + βίος, life, + -λογία, -logy, + -ιστής, -ist.] One who studies or is skilled in microbiology; one versed in the knowledge of minute organisms, as microbes.

Ideas which are just now very prominent in the minds of microbiologists. Science, V. 73.

microbiology (mī'krō-bi-ō-lōj'i), n. [NL. microbion, microbe, + Gr. -λογία, -logy, speak: see -ology.] The science of micro-organisms; the study of microbes.

There was great reason for creating in the Faculty of Sciences the chair of microbiology. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 341.

microbion (mī'krō'bi-on), n.; pl. microbia (-ē). [NL.: see microbe.] Same as microbe.

These [reports] . . . by no means demonstrate that the active principle of cholera resides in a microbion, or that the particular microbion has been discovered. Science, IV. 145.

microcaltrop (mī'krō-kal'trops), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. caltrop.] A sponge-apicule of minute size, having the form of a caltrop. Also microcalthrops. W. J. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 417.

Microcameræ (mī'krō-kam'ē-rē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + L. camera, chamber: see chamber.] 1. A subtribe of choristidan sponges having the chambers small: opposed to Macrocameræ. Lendenfeld, 1886.—2. A tribe of cerata sponges with small spherical ciliated chambers and opaque ground-substance. Lendenfeld.

microcamerate (mī'krō-kam'ē-rāt), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + L. camera, chamber: see chamber.] Having small chambers; specifically, of or pertaining to the Microcameræ, in either sense.

Microcebus (mī'krō-sē'bus), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + κεῖβος, a long-tailed monkey: see Cebus.] A genus of small prosimian quadrupeds of the family Lemuridae and subfamily Galagininae, containing such species as the pygmy lemur, M. smithi, and the mouse-lemur, M. murinus; the dwarf lemurs.

Microcentri (mī'krō-sen'trī), n. pl. [NL. (Thomson, 1876), < Gr. μικρός, small, + κέντρον, point, spur: see center.] One of two prime sections of the parasitic hymenopterous family Chalcididae, containing the seven subfamilies which have the tarsi three- or four-jointed (usually four-jointed, rarely heteromerous), anterior tibiae with a slender short straight spur, and antennæ usually few-jointed. They are nearly all of small size.

Microcephala (mī'krō-sēf'ā-lā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of microcephalus, < Gr. μικροκεφαλος, small-headed: see microcephalous.] In Latreille's system, the fifth section of brachelytrous pentamerous Coleoptera. They have no evident neck, the head being received in the thorax as far as the eyes; the thorax is trapeziform, widening from before backward; the body is comparatively little elongated; the mandibles are of moderate size; and the elytrum often covers more than half of the abdomen. The species live on flowers, fungi, and dung. Also Microcephali.

microcephalia (mī'krō-sēf'ā-lī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μικροκεφαλος, small-headed: see microcephalous.] Same as microcephaly.

microcephalic (mī'krō-sēf'ā-līk or -sēf'ā-līk), a. [As microcephalous + -ic.] Having an unusually small cranium. Specifically—(a) In craniom., having a cranium smaller than a certain standard. A capacity of 1,850 cubic centimeters is taken by some as the upper limit of microcephaly. (b) In pathol., having a head small through disease or faulty development, producing idiosyncrasy or less extreme.

microcephalism (mī'krō-sēf'ā-lizm), n. [Gr. μικροκεφαλία + -ism.] A microcephalic condition.

microcephalous (mī'krō-sēf'ā-lus), a. [= F. microcephale = Pg. microcephalo, < NL. microcephalus, < Gr. μικροκεφαλος, small-headed, < μικρός, small, + κεφαλή, head.] Having a small head. Specifically—(a) Having the skull small or imperfectly developed. (b) In zool., of or pertaining to the Microcephala.

Microcephalus (mī'krō-sēf'ā-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. μικροκεφαλος, small-headed: see microcephalous.] 1. In entom.: (a) A South American genus of caraboid beetles, with about 6 species, having securiform terminal joints of both maxillary and labial palpi. (b) A genus of nemocerous dipterous insects of the family Chironomidae. Van der Wulp, 1873.—2. A genus of reptiles. Lesson.—3. [l. c.] In pathol.: (a) A microcephalic person. (b) Microcephaly.—4. [l. c.] In teratol., a monster with a small, imperfect head or cranium.

microcephaly (mī'krō-sēf'ā-lī), n. [NL. microcephalia, q. v.] The condition or character presented by a small or imperfectly developed head.

Microchaeta (mī'krō-kē'tā), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + χαίτη, a mane: see chaeta.] A genus of earthworms. M. rapti is a gigantic South African earthworm, four or five feet long, of greenish and reddish coloration. Beddard, 1886.

microcharacter (mī'krō-kar'ak-tēr), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + χαρακτήρ, character: see character.] Any zoological character derived from microscopic or other minute examination.

microchemical (mī'krō-kem'i-kal), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, minute, + E. chemical.] Of or pertaining to microchemistry: as, microchemical reactions; microchemical experiments: distinguished from macrochemical.

Microchemical examination shows that it performs a complex function. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 274.

microchemically (mī'krō-kem'i-kal-i), adv. By microchemical processes; by means of or in accordance with microchemistry.

microchemistry (mī'krō-kem'is-trī), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, minute, + E. chemistry.] Minute chemical investigation; chemical analysis or investigation applied to objects under the microscope.

Microchiroptera (mī'krō-kī-rop'tē-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Chiroptera, q. v.] A suborder of Chiroptera, including the insectivorous or animalivorous (rarely frugivorous or blood-sucking) bats. They have a simple stomach (except Desmodus); a large Spigelian and generally small caudate lobe of the liver; the tail contained in the interfemoral membrane when present, or freed from its upper surface; the rim of the ear incomplete at the base of the auricle; the index-finger rudimentary or wanting and without a claw; the palate not produced back of the molar teeth; and the molar teeth cuspidate. The group includes all bats except the family Pteropodidae (which constitutes the suborder Megachiroptera), inhabiting most parts of the world, and falling into two large series, the vespertilionine alliance and the emballonurine alliance, the former of three families, the latter of two. Antimurina, Entomophaga, and Insectivora are synonyms of Microchiroptera.

microchiropteran (mī'krō-kī-rop'tē-ran), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Microchiroptera.

II. n. One of the Microchiroptera; any bat except a fruit-bat.

microchiropterous (mī'krō-kī-rop'tē-rus), a. Same as microchiropteran.

microchoanite (mī'krō-kō'ā-nīt), a. and n. [NL. Microchoanites.] I. a. Having short septal funnels, as a nautiloid; belonging to the Microchoanites.

II. n. A member of the Microchoanites.

Microchoanites (mī'krō-kō'ā-nī'tēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + χοάνη, a funnel: see choana, choanite.] A group of ellipsochoanoid nautiloid cephalopods whose septal funnels are short. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1883, p. 260.

microchronometer (mī'krō-krō-nom'ē-tēr), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + χρόνος, time, + μέτρον, measure: see chronometer.] An instrument for registering very small periods of time, such as the time occupied by the passage of a projectile over a short distance: a kind of chronograph. Also called, corruptly, micronometer.

Microciona (mī'krō-sī'ō-nā), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + κίον (κίον), a pillar.] A genus of fibrosilicious sponges of the division Echinodermata. M. prolifera is a common sponge on the Atlantic coast of the United States, growing in tide-pools in sheeted or branched masses of orange-red color.

microclastic (mī'krō-klas'tik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κλαστός, broken, < κλᾶν, break: see clastic.] An epithet applied to a clastic or fragmentary rock or breccia made up of pieces of small size. Naumann. [Rare.]

microcline (mī'krō-klin), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κλίνας, incline: see cline, clinic.] A feldspar identical in composition with orthoclase, but belonging to the triclinic system. Thin sections often exhibit a peculiar grating-like structure in polarized light, due to double twinning. Much of the potash feldspar called orthoclase is really microcline, and the beautiful green feldspar called Amazon stone is here included. See feldspar and orthoclase.

Section of Microcline as seen in polarized light.

Micrococcus (mī'krō-kok'us), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + κόκκος, a berry, kernel: see coccus.] 1. A genus of Schizomycetes (fission-fungi or bacteria), and the only one of the tribe Sphaerobacteria. It is characterized by globular or oval slightly colored cells, either formed by transverse division into filaments of two or several chaplet-like articulations, or united in families, or segregated in gelatinous masses, all destitute of spontaneous movement but exhibiting a simple molecular tremor. Its species are divided into three physiological groups — chromogenes, producing coloring matter, as in "red milk" (M. prodigiosus, figured under microbe), or "golden yellow" (M. luteus); zymogenes, producing various fermentations, as in animal and vegetable infusions (M. crepusculum) or urine (M. ureae); and pathogenes, producing diseases. Variola, vaccinia, septicaemia, erysipelas, gonorrhoea, and other forms are believed to be produced by micrococci. 2. [l. c.; pl. micrococci (-si).] Any member of this genus.

Micrococcus of Diphtheria.

By the specific term micrococcus is understood a minute spherical or slightly oval organism (Sphaerobacterium, Cohn), that like other bacteria divides by fission (Schizomycetes), and that does not possess any special organ, cilium or flagellum, by using which it would be capable of moving freely about.

E. Klein, Micro-Organisms and Disease, p. 37.

Microcoleoptera (mī-křō-kō-lē-op'te-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Coleoptera, q. v.] In entom., the smaller kinds of beetles collectively considered.

microconidium (mī-křō-kō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. microconidia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. conidium.] A conidium of small size as compared with others produced in the same species.

Microconidia [of Hypomyces] or conidia proper very copious. Cooke, Handbook Brit. Fungi, p. 776.

microcosm (mī-křō-kōzm), n. [F. microcosmos = Sp. microcosmos = Pg. It. microcosmo, < LL. microcosmus (Boëthius), < LG. μικρόκοσμος, a little world, < Gr. μικρός, small, + κόσμος, world.] 1. A little world or cosmos; the world in miniature; something representing or assumed to represent the principle of universality: often applied to man regarded as an epitome, physically and morally, of the universe or great world (the macrocosm).

If you see this in the map of my microcosm, follows it that I am known well enough too? Shak., Cor., II. 1. 68.

The ancients not improperly styled him [man] a microcosm, or little world within himself.

Bacon, Physical Fables, II., Expt.

Some told me it [a mountain] was fourteen miles high; it is covered with a very microcosmos of cloudlets.

Coryat, Cruities, I. 91.

In the dark dissolving human heart,
And holy secrets of this microcosm,
Dabbling a shameless hand with shameful jest.

Tennyson, Princess, III.

Each particle is a microcosm, and faithfully renders the likeness of the world.

Emerson, Discipline.

2. A little community or society.

And now the hour has come when this youth is to be launched into a world more vast than that in which he has hitherto sojourned, yet for which this microcosm has been no ill preparation.

Dierack.

microcosmic (mī-křō-kōz'mik), a. [= F. microcosmique; as microcosm + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a microcosm or to anything that is regarded as such. — Microcosmic salt, $\text{HNaNH}_4\text{PO}_4 + 4\text{H}_2\text{O}$, a salt of soda, ammonia, and phosphoric acid, originally obtained from human urine. It is much employed as a flux in experiments with the blowpipe.

microcosmical (mī-křō-kōz'mi-kal), a. [microcosmic + -al.] Same as microcosmic. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 3. microcosmography (mī-křō-kōz-mog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. μικρόκοσμος, microcosm, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write. Cf. cosmography.] The description of man as a "little world."

microcosmology (mī-křō-kōz-mol'ō-ji), n. [Gr. μικρόκοσμος, microcosm, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A treatise on the microcosm, specifically on the human body, or on man.

microcosmos (mī-křō-kōz'mos), n. Same as microcosmus, 1.

microcosmus (mī-křō-kōz'mus), n. [LL. (in defs. 2 and 3, NL.), < Gr. μικρόκοσμος, a little world: see microcosm.] 1. Same as microcosm, 1.—2. A tunicate, ascidian, or sea-squirt: applied by Linnæus in 1735, and recently revived by Heller as a generic name.—3. [cap.] A genus of coleopterous insects. Chaudoir, 1878.

microcoulomb (mī-křō-kō-lom'), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. coulomb.] One millionth of a coulomb. See coulomb.

microcoustic (mī-křō-kōs'tik), a. and n. [Irreg. < Gr. μικρός, small, + ἀκουστικός, pertaining to hearing: see acoustic.] 1. a. Serving to augment weak sounds; of or pertaining to an instrument for augmenting weak sounds.

2. n. An aural instrument designed to collect and augment small sounds, for the purpose of assisting the partially deaf in hearing.

microcrith (mī-křō-křith), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κρήνη, barley: see cřith.] In chem., the unit of molecular weight, denoting the weight of the half-molecule of hydrogen.

microcrystalline (mī-křō-křis'ta-lin), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κρυστάλλινος, crystalline: see crystalline.] Minutely crystalline: said of crystalline rocks of which the constituents are individually so minute that they cannot be distinguished from each other by the naked eye; cryptocrystalline. Many lithologists use microcrystalline and cryptocrystalline as synonymous. Rosenbusch, however, uses the former term to designate that structure of the ground-mass in which the constituent minerals can, with the aid of the microscope, be specifically determined, and the latter for a structure which can be recognized as crystalline, but in which the individual components cannot be specifically identified.

microcrystallitic (mī-křō-křis'ta-lit'ik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κρυστάλλος, crystal, + -ιτις + -ic.] A term used by Geikie to designate a devitrification product in which this process has been carried so far that little or no glass-base appears, the original glassy substance having become changed into an aggregation of crystallites or "little granules, needles, and hairs." See microfelsitic.

microcyst (mī-křō-sist), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κύστις, the bladder, a bag, pouch.] In Myxomycetes, the resting state of swarm-spores, which become rounded off and invested with a delicate membrane, or sometimes only with a firm border, and may return again under favorable conditions to a state of movement. See Myxomycetes, swarm-spore.

microcyte (mī-křō-sit), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κύτος, a hollow, cavity: see cyte.] 1. A small cell or corpuscle.

The microcytes. Very small bodies, for the most part colourless, freely suspended in the plasma.

Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 123.

2. A small blood-corpuscle, in size from 2 to 6 micromillimeters, found, often in large numbers, in many cases of anemia.

microcythemia (mī-křō-si-thē'mi-ā), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + κύτος, a hollow (see microcyte), + αἷμα, blood.] That condition of the blood in which there are many corpuscles of diminished size.

microcytosis (mī-křō-si-tō'sis), n. Microcythemia.

microdactylous (mī-křō-dak'ti-lus), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + δάκτυλος, finger: see dactyl.] Having short or small fingers or toes.

microdentism (mī-křō-den'tizm), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + L. den(t)-is, = E. tooth, + -ism.] Smallness of the teeth.

Microdentism — mere smallness of the teeth — was chronicled in fourteen of the hundred cases.

Lancet, No. 3432, p. 1152.

micro-detector (mī-křō-dē-tek'tor), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. detector.] A sensitive galvanoscope.

Microdiptera (mī-křō-dip'te-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Diptera.] In entom., the smaller kinds of flies collectively considered.

Microdon (mī-křō-don), n. [NL. (Meigen, 1803), < Gr. μικρός, small, + ὄδους (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.]

1. In entom., an important genus of syrphid flies, containing a few European and about 20 North American species. They are large, nearly bare, usually short and thick-set, with flattened scutellum and short wings, in which there is a stump of a vein in the first posterior cell from the third longitudinal vein. The larvae are remarkable objects, resembling shells, and have twice been described and named as mollusks. M. globosus is an example.

2. In ichth., a genus of pyenodont fishes of the Cretaceous period. Agassiz, 1833. — 3. In conch., a genus of bivalve mollusks. Conrad, 1842.

microdont (mī-křō-dont), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + ὄδους (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] Having short or small teeth.

The microdont races are the low-caste natives of central and southern India; the Polynesian; the ancient Egyptians; mixed Europeans not British; and the British.

Science, IV. 538.

micro-electric (mī-křō-ē-lek'trik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. electric.] Having electric properties in a very small degree. — Micro-electric metrology, the measurement of minute electric quantities.

microfarad (mī-křō-far'ad), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. farad.] The practical unit of electrical capacity, equal to the millionth part of a farad. It is the capacity of about three miles of an Atlantic cable.

microfelsite (mī-křō-fel'sit), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. felsite.] In lithol., a base or ground-mass having a microfelsitic structure. See microfelsitic.

microfelsitic (mī-křō-fel-sit'ik), a. [microfelsite + -ic.] The designation suggested by Zirkel for a devitrified glass when the devitrification has been carried so far that the hyaline character is lost, but not far enough to give rise to the development of distinctly individualized mineral forms. Other lithologists have used this word with different shades of meaning. Rosenbusch defines it as follows: "This substance, which is distinguished from micro- and crypto-crystalline aggregates by the absence of any action on polarized light, and from what may properly be called glass by not being entirely without structure and by being decidedly less transparent, I call microfelsite or the microfelsitic base."

microfoliation (mī-křō-fō-li-ā'shon), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. foliation.] Microscopic foliation, or that which is not distinctly recognized by the naked eye: a term used by Bonney in discussing the effect of pressure in Paleozoic sedimentary rocks. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 44.

Microgadus (mī-křō-gā'dus), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Gadus, q. v.] A genus of Atlantic Tomcod, or Frost-fish (Microgadus tomcod).

(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission.)

small gadoid fishes, established by Gill in 1865; the tomcods. M. tomcodus is a well-known species of the Atlantic coast of the United States; M. proximus is its representative on the Pacific coast.

Microgaster (mī-křō-gas'ter), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804), < Gr. μικρός, small, + γαστήρ, stomach: see gaster.] 1. A notable genus of parasitic hymenoptera of the family Braconidae, giving name to the subfamily Microgasterinae. They are characterized by the three submarginal cells of the fore wings (the second one often incomplete), and by having the hind tibial spurs more than half the length of the tarsi. Many are known from Europe and North America, as M. subcompletus of the former country, which is parasitic on various lepidopterous larvae.

2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Microgasterinae (mī-křō-gas-te-ri'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Microgaster + -inae.] A large subfamily of Braconidae, typified by the genus Microgaster, having the mesonotal sutures invisible and the large marginal cell reaching to the end of the wing. There are many species, of 6 genera, the largest one of which, Apanteles, has 60 species in Great Britain alone. Their larvae parasitize many insects, especially lepidopterous larvae, issuing from the body of the host and spinning cocoons either singly or in mass. A. glomeratus is an abundant parasite of the cabbage-worm, Pieris rapae, both in Europe and in North America.

microgeological (mī-křō-jē-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [microgeology + -ic.] Pertaining to microgeology; dependent on or derived from the use of the microscope in relation to geology: as, microgeological investigations.

microgeology (mī-křō-jē-ō-lō-ji), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. geology.] That department of the science of geology whose facts are ascertained by the use of the microscope.

Microglossa (mī-křō-glos'ā), n. [NL., also Microglossus, Microglossum, < Gr. μικρός, small, + γλῶσσα, the tongue: see glossa.] In ornith., a genus of cockatoos of the family Cacatuidae, established by Geoffroy in 1809. It contains the great black cockatoo, as M. aterrimus, goliath, and aleo, all inhabitants of New Guinea and other islands of the Papuan region.

microglossia (mī-křō-glos'i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + γλῶσσα, the tongue: see glossa.] Congenital smallness of the tongue.

Microglossidae (mī-křō-glos'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Microglossa + -idae.] A family of psittacine birds, the black cockatoos: synonymous with Cacatuidae.

Microglossinae (mī-křō-glo-si'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Microglossa + -inae.] A subfamily of Cacatuidae, represented by the genus Microglossa, and containing the black cockatoos.

microgonidial (mī-křō-gō-nid'i-āl), a. [microgonidium + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a microgonidium.

microgonidium (mī'krō-gō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. microgonidia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. gonidium.] A gonidium of small size as compared with certain others produced by the same species.

The latter form [of Chlorococcum] is said to arise from the former by internal cell-division, which results in the production of "gonidia" of two sizes, the larger being termed macrogonidia, and the smaller microgonidia.

Bessey, Botany, p. 212.

microgram (mī'krō-gram), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. gram².] The millionth part of a gram, being about 1/100,000 of a grain troy.

microgranite (mī'krō-gran'it), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. granite.] In petrog. See quartz-porphry.

microgranitic (mī'krō-grā-nit'ik), a. [< microgranite + -ic.] Pertaining to microgranite.—Microgranitic structure. See quartz-porphry.

microgranulitic (mī'krō-gran-ū-lit'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. granulitic.] In lithol., an epithet applied by Lévy to a form of granitoid structure which is so finely crystallized that it cannot be recognized by the naked eye, but which, under the microscope, is revealed as being made up of crystalline individuals each having its own independent orientation, so that in polarized light it presents the appearance of a brilliantly colored mosaic. The microgranulitic structure, as this term is used by Lévy, differs from the micropogmatitic in the crystalline individuals of the latter having all one common orientation.

micrograph (mī'krō-grāf), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + γράφειν, write.] Same as micropantograph.

micrographer (mī'krō-grā-fēr), n. [< micrograph + -er.] One who is versed in micrography.

micrographic (mī'krō-grāf'ik), a. [= F. micrographique; as micrography + -ic.] Of or pertaining to micrography.

micrographist (mī'krō-grā-fist), n. [< micrograph + -ist.] One who is skilled in micrography; a micrographer.

micrography (mī'krō-grā-fī), n. [= F. micrographie = Sp. micrografía = It. micrografia, < Gr. μικρός, small, + γράφειν, write. Cf. Gr. μικρογραφία, 'write small,' i. e. with a short vowel.] The description of objects too small to be discerned without the aid of a microscope.

Microhierax (mī'krō-hī'e-raks), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ἵεραξ, a hawk, falcon: see Hierax.] A genus of very small hawks of the family Falconidae, established by R. B. Sharpe in 1874; the falconets; the finch-falcons. It contains the diminutive species usually referred to the genus Hierax, which name is preoccupied in another department of zoölogy. The range of the genus includes southern Asia, Java, Sumatra, Borneo, etc. There are several species, as M. coerulescens, fringillarius, melanoleucus, and erythrogonys.

microhm (mī'krōm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. ohm.] An electrical unit equal to the millionth part of an ohm.

microlepidopter (mī'krō-lep-i-dop'tēr), n. In entom., an insect of one of the families included in the Microlepidoptera.

Microlepidoptera (mī'krō-lep-i-dop'tē-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Lepidoptera, q. v.] The smaller and more simply organized moths, including, generally, the smaller Pyralidae, the Tortricidae, the Tineidae, and the Pterophoridae. These insects do not constitute a natural division, and the name is merely used for convenience, the other members of the order being distinguished as Macrolepidoptera, or simply as Lepidoptera.

microlepidopteran (mī'krō-lep-i-dop'tē-ran), a. and n. I. a. Microlepidopterous.

II. n. A microlepidopter.

microlepidopterist (mī'krō-lep-i-dop'tē-ris't), n. [< Microlepidoptera + -ist.] One who is versed in the natural history of Microlepidoptera.

microlepidopterous (mī'krō-lep-i-dop'tē-rus), a. [< Microlepidoptera + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the microlepidoptera.

Microllicia (mī'krō-lis'i-ā), n. [NL. (Don, 1823), so called as having the leaves usually small; < Gr. μικρός, small, + ὄλος, universal, general, < ὅλος, all.] A genus of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae and type of the tribe Microllicieae, characterized by very unequal stamens with beaked or tube-bearing anthers, the connective elongated at the base, and by the calyx-lobes being shorter than the tube. They are erect branching undershrubs, usually not more than a foot or two high, with small leaves, which are generally glandular-dotted, and solitary, commonly rose-purple or white flowers, which are axillary or sometimes terminal. There are about 95 species, natives of Brazil, Guiana, and Peru. A few are sometimes found in greenhouses.

Microllicieae (mī'krō-li-sī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Triana, 1871), < Microllicia + -eae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Melastomaceae and the suborder Melastomeae, characterized by the cylindrical or angular capsule, conical or convex at the apex, by the connective often being produced below the anther-cells, and by oblong or ovoid seeds. The tribe embraces 15 genera, Microllicia being the type, and about 250 species, all of which are found in tropical America.

microlite (mī'krō-lit), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λίθος, stone: see -lite.] 1. A mineral related to pyrochlore, occurring in regular octahedrons having a brownish color and a resinous luster. It is essentially a niobate of calcium. It was first found at Chesterfield in Massachusetts, in minute crystals (whence the name), later in Virginia in larger crystals sometimes weighing several pounds.

2. Same as microlith: an incorrect use.

microliter (mī'krō-lē'tēr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. liter.] The millionth part of a liter.

microlith (mī'krō-lith), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λίθος, stone.] A name proposed by Vogelsang, in 1867, to designate the "microscopic acicular components of rocks"; a "microscopic individual" (Zirkel). The usage of later lithologists differs considerably in the application of this term. By some it is regarded as the equivalent of crystallite, which is properly an aggregation of microscopic globular forms (globulites). By others crystallites are considered as differing from microliths in that the latter have the internal structure of true crystals, while in the former this cannot be recognized. Elongated or lath-shaped forms and such as resemble an hour-glass in shape are those now most generally designated as microliths; if curved or more or less twisted or hair-like, they are frequently called trichites. Microliths are most frequently seen in rocks of igneous origin, and are especially abundant as products of the devitrification of the glassy lavas. The feldspars, hornblende, augite, and apatite are minerals most commonly found assuming this form.

microlithic (mī'krō-lith'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λίθος, a stone, + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to or consisting of small stones: opposed to megalithic.

The cognate examples in the microlithic styles afford us very little assistance.

J. Ferguson, Rude Stone Monuments, p. 47.

2. In lithol., pertaining to or characterized by microliths.

microlitic (mī'krō-lit'ik), a. [< microlite + -ic.] Same as microlithic, 2.

micrological (mī'krō-loj'i-kal), a. [< *micrology*² + -ic-al.] Characterized by minuteness of investigation.

Of that equanimity, circumspection, patience of research, intellectual discipline, and equipment of micrological scholarship, without which it is given to no man to be a philologist, he has, unhappily, made the most perfunctory provision.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 350.

micrologically (mī'krō-loj'i-kal-i), adv. In a micrological manner; by means of exact attention to minute details.

If things are to be scanned so micrologically.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 277, note.

micrology¹ (mī'krōl'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology. Cf. *micrology*².] That part of science which is dependent on microscopic investigations; micrography.

micrology² (mī'krōl'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. μικρολογία, the quality of being careful about trifles, < μικρολόγος, careful about trifles, penurious, capacious, lit. gathering little things, < μικρός, small, little, + λέγειν, gather: see -ology. Cf. *micrology*¹.] Undue attention to minute, unimportant matters; minute erudition.

There is less micrology . . . in his erudition.

Roberts, W. Taylor, II. 146. (Davies.)

Micromastictora (mī'krō-mas-tik'tō-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + μαστίτις, a scourger, < μαστίειν, whip, scourge, < μαστιξ (μαστιγ-), a whip, scourge.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, one of two main branches of the phylum Parasoa or Spongia, characterized by the comparatively small size of the choanocytes, which are about 0.003 millimeter in diameter. The Micromastictora are all non-calcareous sponges, and are divided by Sollas into two classes, Myospongia and Silicispongia. They are also called Noncalcareous (Vosmaer) and Plethospongia (Sollas). The term is contrasted with Megamastictora.

micromelus (mī'krōm'e-lus), n. [< Gr. μικρομήλης, small-limbed, < μικρός, small, + μέλος, a limb.] In teratol., a monster with abnormally small limbs.

micromeral (mī'krō-mē-ral), a. [< micromere + -al.] Of or pertaining to a micromere: as, micromeral blastomeres.

micromere (mī'krō-mēr), n. [< Gr. μικρομερής, consisting of small parts, < μικρός, small, + μέρος, a part.] The smaller one of two masses or moieties into which the vitellus of a lamellibranch, as a fresh-water mussel, divides; the so-called "animal cell" of Rabi, which further subdivides into blastomeres. See macromere.

The segmentation resembles that of other mollusks, the micromeres appearing at the formative pole by separation of the "protoplasmic" portion of the "macromere."

Roy. Micros. Soc. Jour., 2d ser., VI. ii. 224.

Micromeria (mī'krō-mē-ri-ā), n. [NL. (Benthams), < Gr. μικρός, small, + μέρος, part.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Satureieae and the subtribe Melisseae. The calyx is tubular, commonly thirteen-nerved, and about equally five-toothed. The corolla is short, rarely exerted from the calyx, bilabiate, the upper lip erect, flatish, entire, or emarginate, the lower spreading and three-parted. The filaments are arcuate-ascending, the anterior pair longer; the anthers are two-celled. The flowers are borne in whorls, axillary or crowded into a spike, or are sometimes single or cymose in the opposite axils. The species, numbering about 60, are low herbs or somewhat shrubby plants, sweet-odorous, of various habit, distributed pretty widely in the Old World, with a few in South America and the West Indies, and two or three in the United States. M. Douglasii is a well-known sweet-scented herb of California called yerba buena. M. obovata of the West Indies has been called allheal.

micromeric (mī'krō-mēr'ik), a. [< micromere + -ic.] Same as micromeral.

micromeritic (mī'krō-mēr-it'ik), a. [< μικρός, small, + μέρος, a part.] A term suggested by Vogelsang to designate a granitoid or thoroughly crystalline texture of a rock so fine as to be recognizable only with the aid of the microscope.

micrometer (mī'krōm'e-tēr), n. [= F. micromètre = Sp. micrómetro = Pg. It. micrometro, < Gr. μικρός, small, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring microscopic lengths and angles. All micrometers depend upon two principles, magnification and oblique measurement. Magnification determines an angle by measuring the arc that subtends it upon a circle of large fixed radius, having its center coincident with the vertex of the angle. Thus, a mirror turning through a small angle may reflect a spot of light upon a distant scale. Oblique measurement (see diagonal scale, under diagonal) ascertains a length by measuring the distance at which it subtends a small fixed angle. Thus, the wedge-micrometer is a long wedge-shaped piece of metal or glass with its sloping sides as truly plane as possible, and graduated along its length. It is used to measure the distance between two points having a rigid circuitous connection, but a vacant space about the line between them. The wedge being thrust between the points, the distance it penetrates shows how far apart they are. The principle of oblique measurement is, in nearly all micrometers, applied under the form of a fine screw, the number of whose revolutions and parts of a revolution, in advancing from one point to another, measures the amount of this advance. In this case the pitch of the screw is the fixed angle, while the reading of the screw-head is proportional to the variable radius at which this angle is subtended by the length to be measured.—Annular or circular micrometer, a micrometer consisting, in its most approved form, of a disk of parallel plate glass, having in its center a round hole to the edges of which a ring of metal is cemented and afterward truly turned in a lathe. The disk being mounted in a brass tube, so that it may be accurately adjusted in the focus of the eyepiece and applied to a telescope, the metal ring is alone visible, and appears as if suspended in the atmosphere, whence the instrument is called the suspended annular micrometer. Brande and Cox, Dict., II. 516 (changed).—Double-image micrometer, a micrometer having an optical apparatus which produces two images of every object, as A and A', B and B'. Then, A may be brought into coincidence with B', or B may be brought into coincidence with A', and the position of the parts producing the double image will then show the distance between A and B.—Filar micrometer, a micrometer in which the two objects whose distance is to be measured are brought into coincidence with two spider-lines in the principal focus of a telescope or microscope, one of these webs being movable by turning a micrometer-screw. The astronomical filar micrometer is also provided with a graduated position-circle, apparatus for illumination, etc.—Micrometer-balance, a form of balance adapted to the exact determination of very small weights or differences in weight. That devised by Kershaw for testing the weight of gold pieces consists of a steelyard supported on a knife-edged fulcrum and geared with a wheel graduated to half-grains. If the coin is of correct weight, the index points to zero. If it is light, the leverage of the beam turns the wheel until equilibrium is attained, when the index-bar points to the number of half-grains of shortage. E. H. Knight.—Mother-of-pearl micrometer, Cavallo's micrometer, which consists of a thin semitransparent piece of mother-of-pearl, 1/16 of an inch wide, having fine graduations. It is mounted within the tube at the focus of the eye-lens of the telescope, where the image of the object under observation is produced.

micrometer-screw (mī'krōm'e-tēr-skō), n. A screw attached to optical and mathematical instruments as a means of measuring very small angles. The pitch of the screw is made exceedingly small, while the graduated head is large, thus securing great exactness and simplicity in use.

micrometric (mī'krō-met'rik), a. [= F. micrométrique; as micrometer + -ic.] Pertaining to the micrometer; made by the micrometer: as, micrometric measurements.

micrometrical (mī'krō-met'ri-kal), a. [< micrometric + -al.] Same as micrometric.

micrometrically (mī'krō-met'ri-kal-i), adv. By means of a micrometer.

micrometry (mī-krom'et-ri), n. [= F. micrométrie; as micrometer + -y.] The art of measuring small objects or distances with a micrometer.

micromillimeter, micromillimetre (mī-kro-mil'i-mē-tēr), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. millimeter.] 1. The millionth part of a millimeter. — 2. The thousandth part of a millimeter: formerly and sometimes still used by biologists. The equivalent used by metrologists and physicists is micron.

micromineralogical (mī'krō-min'e-ra-loj'i-kal), a. [Gr. micromineralogy + -ic-al.] Pertaining to micromineralogy.

Rocks may occur the structure of which . . . has been yet more obscured by subsequent micromineralogical change. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV, 42.

micromineralogy (mī-kro-min-e-ra-lō-jī), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. mineralogy.] That part of mineralogy which has to do with the study of the optical, chemical, or other characters of minerals by means of the microscope, as they are observed, for example, in thin sections of rocks.

micron (mī'kron), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρόν, neut. of μικρός, also σμικρός, small, minute.] The millionth part of a meter, or $\frac{1}{10^6}$ of an English inch. This term has been formally adopted by the International Commission of Weights and Measures, representing the civilized nations of the world, and is adopted by all metrologists. The quantity is denoted by the Greek letter μ written above the line: as, 25^{μ} .

Micronesian (mī-kro-nē'si-an), a. and n. [Gr. μικρόνησος, a small island, < μικρός, small, + νῆσος, an island: see def.] + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Micronesia, a collection of islands and groups of islands, chiefly of coral formation, in the Pacific ocean, the principal of which are the Marshall, Gilbert, Caroline, and Ladrone groups. — 2. n. A native or an inhabitant of Micronesia.

micronometer (mī-kro-nom'e-tēr), n. A corrupt form of microchronometer.

micronucleus (mī-kro-nū'klē-us), n.; pl. micronuclei (-ī). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. nucleus, q. v.] A small nucleus: distinguished from macronucleus.

The micronucleus is a hermaphrodite sexual element, of sole importance in conjugation. Amer. Nat., XXII, 266.

micronymy (mī-kron'i-mi), n. [Gr. μικρόνυμος, < μικρός, small, + ὄνομα, ὄνομα, name.] The use of short easy words instead of long hard ones.

Astronomers have set an example in micronymy that anatomists might well follow. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII, 529.

micro-organic (mī'krō-ōr-gan'ik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. organic, after micro-organism.] Having the character of a micro-organism; of or pertaining to microbes and other micro-organisms; microbial.

micro-organism (mī-kro-ōr-gan-izm), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. organism.] A microscopic organism, as a bacillus, bacterium, or vibrio; a microbe; a microzoary.

The microorganisms of the principal infectious diseases of men and the lower animals. Amer. Nat., XXIII, 56.

Micropalama (mī-kro-pal'a-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + πάλαμ, the palm of the hand: see palm.] A genus of Scolopacidae established by S. F. Baird in 1858: so called from the Stilt-sandpiper (Micropalama himantopus).

semipalmation of the feet; the stilt-sandpipers. There is but one species, M. himantopus, a common bird of North America. It is migratory through the United States in spring and fall, breeding in high latitudes.

micropantograph (mī-kro-pan'tō-gráf), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. pantograph.] An instrument constructed on the general principle of the pantograph for executing extremely minute writing and engraving. By means of this instrument the Lord's prayer has been written on glass within the space of $\frac{1}{250000}$ of a square inch. Also called micrograph.

microparasite (mī-kro-par'a-sit), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. parasite.] A parasitic micro-organism.

The number of substances which are less injurious to man than to micro-parasites is very small. Science, III, 130.

microparasitic (mī-kro-par-a-sit'ik), a. [Gr. microparasite + -ic.] Having the character of or pertaining to microparasites; caused by microparasites: as, microparasitic diseases.

micropathological (mī-kro-path-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [Gr. micropathology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to micropathology: as, micropathological investigation.

micropathologist (mī'krō-pā-thol'ō-jist), n. [Gr. micropathology + -ist.] One who treats of or is versed in micropathology.

micropathology (mī'krō-pā-thol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. pathology.] 1. The scientific study of micro-organisms in their relations to disease. — 2. Morbid histology.

micropegmatite (mī-kro-peg-mā-tit), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. pegmatite.] A rock having a micropegmatitic structure.

micropegmatitic (mī-kro-peg-mā-tit'ik), a. [Gr. micropegmatite + -ic.] Having the structure of graphic granite, but in a microscopic rather than macroscopic form. See pegmatite and microgranulitic.

microperthitic (mī'krō-pēr-thit'ik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. perthite + -ic.] Exhibiting, under the microscope, the structure of perthite — that is, an interlamination of orthoclase (or microcline) and albite. Nature, XXXVII, 469.

microphagist (mī-krof'a-jist), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + φαγεῖν, eat, + -ist.] An eater of microscopic objects; an animal that feeds upon organisms of microscopic size.

Several species [of diatoms] . . . have been supplied in abundance by the careful dissection of the above microphagists. W. B. Carpenter, Micros. (Phila. ed., 1856), p. 305.

microphone (mī'krō-fōn), n. [= F. microphone = Sp. micrófono, < Gr. μικρός, small, + φωνή, voice, sound.] An instrument for augmenting small sounds. The instrument invented for this purpose by Mr. Hughes in 1878 is based on the fact that when substances possessing little electrical conductivity are placed in the course of an electric current, the conductivity of the system is much increased by even the very smallest amount of pressure. The instrument has various forms, but in most of them one piece of charcoal is held loosely between two other pieces in such a manner as to be affected by the slightest vibrations conveyed to it by the air or by any other medium. The two external pieces are placed in connection with a telephone, and when the ear is placed at the ear-piece of the telephone the sounds caused by a fly walking on the wooden support of the microphone appear as loud as the tramp of a horse. By suitable arrangements the sounds of the human voice conveyed from a distance by the telephone can be made audible in every part of a hall. — Microphone relay, a delicate microphone mounted on or connected with the membrane of the receiving telephone, as a relay. See relay.

microphonic (mī'krō-fōn'ik), a. [As microphone + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or obtained by means of the microphone; serving to intensify small or weak sounds; microacoustic. Also microphonous.

A large induction-coil is essential in connection with the transmitter when this receiver is used, and any microphonic transmitter will answer. T. D. Lockwood, Elect., Mag., and Teleg., p. 815.

microphonics (mī-kro-fon'iks), n. [Pl. of microphonic*: see -ics.] The science of augmenting small sounds.

microphonous (mī-krof'ō-nus), a. [As microphone + -ous.] Same as microphonic.

microphony (mī'krō-fō-ni), n. [= F. microphonie, < Gr. μικροφωνία, weakness of voice, < μικρόφωνος, having a small or weak voice, < μικρός, small, + φωνή, voice.] Weakness of voice.

microphotograph (mī-kro-fō'tō-gráf), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. photograph.] 1. A photograph of any object, made so small as to require a microscope for its examination; "a microscopic photograph of a macroscopic object" (A. C. Mercer). — 2. See photomicrograph.

microphotography (mī'krō-fō-tog'ra-fī), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. photography.] The photographing of objects of any size upon a microscopic or very small scale. A notable use of microphotography was the copying of letters and despatches to be carried by carrier-pigeons during the siege of Paris in 1870-1. Compare photomicrography.

microphthalmia (mī-krof-thal'mi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρόφθαλμος, having small eyes, < μικρός, small, + ὄφθαλμος, eye: see ophthalmia.] An abnormal smallness of the eye. Also microphthalmus.

microphthalmic (mī-krof-thal'mik), a. [Gr. microphthalmia + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by microphthalmia.

microphthalmus (mī'krof-thal-mi), n. [NL. microphthalmia, q. v.] Same as microphthalmia.

Microphthira (mī-krof-thī'rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + φθίρα, a louse.] In Latreille's system of classification, the ninth family of his Acera, or Acarides, consisting of the six-legged larval stages of various mites. Leptus and the two other supposed genera which he located here represent the genera Aryas and Trombidium. Also Microphthiria.

microphthire (mī'krof-thīr), n. A larval acarid with six legs; a member of the Microphthira.

microphylline (mī-kro-flī'in), a. [As microphyllous + -ine.] Composed of minute leaflets or scales.

Considered in the way of analogy, the foliaceous Verrucaria may be said to represent Umbilicaria and Pannaria: passing, like both of these, into microphyllina, and, like the last, into finally almost crustaceous forms. Tuckerman, Gen. Lichenum, p. 245.

microphyllous (mī-kro-flī'us), a. [Gr. μικρόφυλλος, having small leaves, < μικρός, small, + φύλλον, leaf.] In bot., having small leaves.

microphysiography (mī-kro-fiz-i-og'ra-fī), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. physiography.] See physiography.

microphytal (mī'krō-fī-tal), a. [Gr. microphyte + -al.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or consisting of microphytes.

microphyte (mī'krō-fīt), n. [= F. microphyte, < Gr. μικρός, small, + φυτόν, a plant.] A microscopic plant, especially one that is parasitic in its habits.

microphytic (mī-kro-fīt'ik), a. [Gr. microphyte + -ic.] Pertaining to or caused by microphytes: as, microphytic diseases.

micropod (mī'krō-pod), n. A member of the Micropoda.

Micropoda (mī-krop'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ποὺς (pod-) = E. foot.] In some systems, a division of monomyarian bivalves, comprising those which have the foot rudimentary or obsolete, as scallops, oysters, and the like.

Micropodidae (mī-kro-pod'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Micropus (-pod-) + -idae.] In ornith., a family of fissirostral picarian birds; the swifts or Cypselidae. See cut under Cypselus.

Micropodinae (mī'krō-pō-dī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Micropus (-pod-) + -inae.] In ornith., the typical swifts or Cypselinae.

Micropodoidae (mī'krō-pō-doi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Micropus (-pod-) + -oidae.] A superfamily of picarian birds composed of the swifts and humming-birds, Cypselidae and Trochilidae; Cypseliformes in a strict sense; Cypselomorphae without the Caprimulgidae.

microporphyrific (mī-kro-pōr-fī-rīt'ik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. porphyrific.] See porphyrific.

microprosopus (mī'krō-pro-sō'pus), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + πρόσωπον, face.] In teratol., a monster with an imperfectly developed face.

micropsia (mī-krop'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ὄψις, view.] In pathol., an affection of the eye in which objects appear less than their actual size.

Microptera (mī-krop'tē-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of micropterus: see micropterus.] In entom.: (a) The name given by Gravenhorst in 1802 to the rove-beetles (Staphylinidae) and their allies, on account of the shortness of the wing-covers. They are now called Brachelytra. (b) A group of dipterous insects named by Robineau-Desvoidy in 1830.

Micropterinae (mī-krop-tē-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Micropterus + -inae.] A subfamily of Centrarchidae, typified by the genus Micropterus.

micropterus (mī-krop'tē-rus), a. [NL. micropterus, < Gr. μικρός, small, + πτερόν, a wing, = E. feather.] Having short wings or fins.

Micropterus (mī-krop'tē-rus), n. [NL.: see micropterus.] 1. In ichth., a genus of centrarchid fishes, the type of the subfamily Micropterinae, established by Lacépède in 1802. There are two species, M. dolomieu and M. salmoides, or the small- and large-mouthed black-bass, both highly prized by sportmen and epicures. Bass of this genus are variously known as green, lake, moss, marsh, river, etc., bass; black, yellow, and jumping perch, and trout-perch; black-trout, white-trout, southern or Roanoke chub, and by many other local or fanciful misnomers. Sometimes called Cryptes. See cut at black-bass, 1.

2. In ornith., a genus of sea-ducks of the family Anatidae and subfamily Fuligininae, named by Lesson in 1831. There is but one species, M. cinereus, the well-known steamer-duck of South America. The genus is now called Tachyeres, the name Micropterus being preoccupied in ichthyology.

3. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

microseismograph (mī-kro-sis'mō-grāf), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σεισμός, a shaking, + γράφειν, write.] An instrument for measuring and recording very slight earthquake-shocks or earthquakes.

p p, fixed support in which the tube is moved by hand (coarse adjustment); g, screw of the fine adjustment; p, polarizer; s s, analyzer, in movable support turning on the graduated circle s s; T, T, condensing lenses; i, index for fixing position of rotating stage; q q, quartz plate, which slides in nose-piece above objective through slit at i; n n, one of two screws for centering objective.

the former.—Solar, lucernal, and oxyhydrogen microscopes, instruments in which the illumination emmicroseismometry (mī'krō-sis-mōm'et-ri), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σεισμός, a shaking, + μέτρον, a measure.] The measurement or observation of slight earth-tremors.

The account that is given of the labours of Italian observers in the field of microseismometry is meagre and unsatisfactory. Nature, XXXIX, 338.

microsema (mī'krō-sēm), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σῆμα, mark, sign; see sema.] In craniom., having an orbital index below 84.

The skulls agree with the ordinary Bushman skull in most respects, microsema.

A. Macalister, Jour. Anthropol. Inst., XVI, 150.

microseptum (mī'krō-sep'tum), n.; pl. microsepta (-tā). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. septum, q. v.] A small imperfect or sterile septum or mesentery of an actinozoan. See macroseptum.

microsiphon (mī'krō-sī'fon), n. See siphon and microsiphonula.

microsiphonula (mī'krō-sī-fon'ū-lā), n.; pl. microsiphonulæ (-læ). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σῆμα, a tube, pipe; see siphon.] The larval stage of certain cephalopods, as ammonoids, nautiloids, and belemnoids, during which the small tubular siphon or microsiphon makes its appearance. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1887.

microsiphonular (mī'krō-sī-fon'ū-lār), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σῆμα, a tube, pipe; see siphon.] Of or pertaining to a microsiphonula.

microsiphonulate (mī'krō-sī-fon'ū-lāt), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σῆμα, a tube, pipe; see siphon.] Provided with or characterized by a microsiphon. Amer. Nat., XXII, 878.

microsiphonulation (mī'krō-sī-fon'ū-lā'shon), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σῆμα, a tube, pipe; see siphon.] The formation or the possession of a microsiphon; the state of being microsiphonulate. Amer. Nat., XXII, 878.

microsoma (mī'krō-sō'mā), n.; pl. microsomata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σῶμα, body.] A little body or corpuscle; one of the minute granules embedded in the hyaline plasma of the protoplasm of vegetable cells, and constituting an essential portion of its substance. These granules have a high degree of refringency, and are very deeply stained by hematoxylin.

microsome (mī'krō-sōm), n. [NL. micro-soma.] Same as microsoma. Nature, XXX, 183.

microsomia (mī'krō-sō'mi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σῶμα, body. Cf. microsoma.] The state of being dwarfed; dwarfishness.

microsomite (mī'krō-sō'mīt), n. [Gr. microsoma + -ite.] One of the smaller permanent or definitive somites or metameres of which an animal body may be composed; a secondary segment, succeeding the primary segments or macrosomites.

microsomitic (mī'krō-sō'mīt'ik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σῶμα, body. Cf. microsoma.] Having the character of a microsomite; relating to microsomites. Amer. Nat., XXII, 941.

microsomite (mī'krō-sō'mīt), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σῶμα, body. Cf. microsoma.] A mineral related in composition and form to nephelin. It is found in minute acicular hexagonal crystals in the lava of Monte Somma, Vesuvius.

Microsorex (mī'krō-sō'reks), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + L. sorex = Gr. ὕραξ, a shrew-mouse.] A genus of very small North American shrews, of the family Soricidae and subfamily Soricinae, having 30 teeth. S. hoyi is the typical species. Coues, 1877.

microspectroscope (mī'krō-spek'trō-skōp), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. spectroscope.] A combination of the spectroscope with the microscope, by the use of which it is possible to examine the absorption-bands in minute quantities of a substance. The arrangement ordinarily employed consists of a series of glass prisms in a small tube which is attached above the achromatic eyepiece.

Microspermæ (mī'krō-spēr'mē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), < Gr. μικρός, small, + σπέρμα, a seed.] A series of monocotyledonous plants, characterized by a perianth which is corolla-like, at least on the inside, by an inferior ovary which is one-celled with three parietal placentæ, or rarely three-celled with axillary placentæ, and by numerous very small seeds. The series embraces three orders, Hydrocharitaceæ (the frog-bit family), Burmanniaceæ, and Orchidaceæ (the orchid family), including about 5,000 species, 5,000 of which belong to Orchidaceæ.

Microsphaera (mī'krō-sfēr'ā), n. [NL. (Leveillé, 1851), < Gr. μικρός, small, + σφαῖρα, a sphere.] A genus of parasitic pyrenomycetous fungi of the group Erysiphææ. The peritheciæ, which contains several asci, has several appendages radiating from it like the spokes of a wheel. These appendages are free from the mycelium, and are more or less dichotomously branched at the tips, often in a very beautiful manner. About 50 species are known, of which nearly 20 occur in North America. M. Ravenelii is injurious to the honey-locust (Gleditsia); M. alni (the M. Friesii of authors) occurs on various species of Ceanothus, Viburnum, Ulmus, Syringa, Platanus, Juglans, and Carya; and M. quercina is found on various species of oak. See Erysiphææ.

microsporangiophore (mī'krō-spō-ran'ji-ō-fōr), n. [NL. microsporangium, q. v., + Gr. φέρω, < φέρειν = E. bear.] The foliage-leaves which surround or protect the spore-bearing leaves of certain hypothetical archaic cryptogams, and from which the flower of flowering plants may have been evolved.

The origin of this primeval flower from a somewhat fern-like Cryptogam, of which the foliage-leaves, the envelopes of the spore-bearing leaves, the micro and macrosporangiothores, had become permanently differentiated in ascending order. Geddes, Encyc. Brit., XVI, 546.

microsporangium (mī'krō-spō-ran'ji-um), n.; pl. microsporangia (-gi-ā). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. sporangium, q. v.] A sporangium containing microspores: the homologue of the pollen-sac in phanerogams.

microspore (mī'krō-spōr), n. [= F. microspore, < Gr. μικρός, small, + σπόρος, a seed.] 1. In bot., an asexually produced spore of small size as compared with others produced by the same species: the homologue of the pollen-grain of phanerogams.

In some of the living club-mosses there are two kinds of spores, one being much larger than the other. The larger are known as macrospores, whilst the smaller are called microspores. Huxley, Physiography, p. 241.

2. In soöl., one of the spore-like elements, of exceedingly minute size, but very numerous, produced through the encystment and subsequent subdivision of many monads.

microsporine (mī'krō-spō-rin), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σπέρμα, a seed.] Noting one of the two kinds of microbes reported by Klebs to be uniformly present in diphtheria. They are micrococci in form and are found chiefly upon the tonsils, and mark a less serious phase of the disease. The accuracy of these conclusions has been questioned.

Microsporon (mī'krō-spō-rōn), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σπόρος, seed.] A genus or class of fungi producing various skin-diseases. M. furfur, which produces pityriasis versicolor, consists of hyphae having long articulations intermixed with round spores, and grows between the cells of the epidermis, effecting their rapid degeneration. M. Audouinii, so called, produces psoriasis, another skin-disease. According to Grunow, however, these forms, as well as those described as Achorion, the fungus of favus, and Trichophyton, the fungus of tinea, are all the same thing, only differing from one another in size. This difference is attributed to differences in the food. The M. diphthericum of Klebs is a micrococcus.

microsporophyll, microsporophyll (mī'krō-spō-rō-fil), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σπόρος, seed, + φύλλον, leaf.] The leaf-bearing microsporangium of the heterosporous Pteridophyta: the homologue of the stamen in phanerogams.

microsporous (mī'krō-spō-rus), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σπός, seed.] Resembling or derived from a microspore.

Microsthenæ (mī'krō-sfēr'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σθένος, strength.] In J. D. Dana's classification, the third order of Mammalia, composed of the chiropteres, insectivores, rodents, and edentates. The Microsthenæ correspond to the Lamniophora of Owen, and to the Inedubiliæ series of placental mammals of Bonaparte and Gill.

microsthene (mī'krō-sfēr'ā), n. A member of the order Microsthenæ.

microsthenic (mī'krō-sfēr'ā), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + σθένος, strength.] Pertaining to or characteristic of the Microsthenæ. J. D. Dana, Cephalization, p. 9.

Microstoma (mī'krō-sfēr'ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρόστομος, having a small mouth, < μικρός, small, + στόμα, mouth.] 1. In ichth., a genus of small-mouthed fishes, typifying the family Microstomidae, as M. grænlandica. Cuvier, 1817.—2. In Vermetes, the typical genus of Microstomidae. M. lineare is an example. Also Microstomum.

microstome (mī'krō-sfēr'ā), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + στόμα, a mouth.] In bot., a small mouth or orifice, as that belonging to the capsule of certain mosses.

Microstomidae (mī'krō-sfēr'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Microstoma, or Microstomum, + -idae.] 1. In ichth., a family of malacopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Microstoma, containing a few deep-sea fishes related to the argentine and smelts. Also Microstomatidae.—2. A family of rhabdocelous turbellarians, typified by the genus Microstoma, having a small extensible mouth near the anterior end of the body, together with laterally ciliated pits. These turbellarians are more remarkably characterized by the separation of the sexes, hermaphroditism being the rule in the Rhabdocela. They multiply both by ova and by spontaneous fission.

microstructure (mī'krō-struk'tūr), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, with ref. to microscopic, + E. structure.] Microscopic structure.

This rock . . . has a microstructure very similar to that of many andesites. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV, 198.

microstylar (mī'krō-stī'lār), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + στυλος, pillar (see style), + -ar.] In arch., having, pertaining to, or consisting of a small style or column.

Microstylis (mī'krō-stī'lis), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + στυλός, dim. of στυλος, a pillar; see style.] A genus of terrestrial orchids of the tribe Epidendreae and the subtribe Malaxææ, characterized by a stem bearing from one to three leaves, and by the new shoots arising from the base of the bulb of the previous year. They are small herbs with broad membranaceous leaves, which are contracted into a sheath or a sheathing petiole, and small, often greenish or yellowish flowers, which grow in terminal racemes. About 45 species are known, which are indigenous to Europe, Asia, and North and South America. M. ophioglossoides, in the United States, bears the name of adder's-mouth, which is also extended to the other species. See adder's-mouth.

microstylospore (mī'krō-stī'lō-spōr), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + στυλος, a pillar, + σπόρος, a seed; see stylospore.] A stylospore of small size as compared with others produced in the same species.

microstylous (mī'krō-stī'lus), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + στυλος, a pillar; see style.] In bot., having the style small or short and associated with long stamens, as compared with long styles associated with short stamens.

microtasmeter (mī'krō-tā-sim'e-tēr), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. tasmeter.] An instrument invented by Edison for detecting and measuring very slight pressures. A rigid iron frame holds a carbon-button which is placed between two surfaces of platinum, one stationary and the other movable, and in a device which holds the object to be tested so that, as the object expands, the pressure resulting from the expansion acts upon the carbon-button.

microtelephone (mī'krō-tel'e-fōn), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. telephone.] A telephone capable of rendering audible very weak sounds.

microtelephonic (mī'krō-tel'e-fōn'ik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. telephone, + -ic.] Pertaining to the microtelephone.—Microtelephonic apparatus, apparatus for transmitting, or for rendering audible, very weak sounds.

microthere (mī'krō-thēr), n. A member of the genus Microtherium.

Microtherium (mī'krō-thēr'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + θηρίον, wild beast.] A genus of artiodactyl ungulate mammals established by Von Meyer upon remains discovered in the Miocene of Europe. The position of the genus is questionable. Owen considered it related to the chevrotains (Trauidæ). It probably belongs to the anoplotheroid series. It is also called Amphimeria.

microtherm (mī'krō-thēr'm), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + θερμός, heat.] A plant of Alphonse de Candolle's fourth physiological group, consisting of those forms which are confined to climates whose mean annual temperature is between 14° and 0° C. They are found on the plains of the north temperate zone in Europe, Asia, and North America, well northward, and in South America between latitudes 33° and 65° S.

microtome (mī'krō-tōm), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + τομή, < τέμνειν, τμήν, cut.] An instrument for making very fine sections or thin slices of objects for microscopic examination.

microtomic (mī'krō-tōm'ik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + τομή, < τέμνειν, τμήν, cut.] Cutting in fine or thin slices; relating to the use of the microtome or to microtomy.

microtomical (mī'krō-tōm'ik-əl), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + τομή, < τέμνειν, τμήν, cut.] Same as microtomic. Amer. Nat., XXI, 1130.

microtomet (mī'krō-tōm'et), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + μέτρον, a measure.] One who is expert in the use of a microtome. Micros. Sci., XXX.

microtomy (mī'krō-tōm'i), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + τομή, < τέμνειν, τμήν, cut; see anatomy.] The art of preparing thin slices of tissues, in order to study the histological details of organization.

microvolt (mī'krō-vōlt), n. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. volt.] A millionth part of a volt.

Microzoa (mī'krō-zō'ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of microzoön.] Microscopic animals, or Microscopica; Microzoaria.

microzoal (mī'krō-zō'al), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + E. zoa.] Of or pertaining to the Microzoa.

microzoan (mī-křō-zō'an), n. and a. I. n. An animalcule; a member of the Microzoa.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the Microzoa. Microzoaria (mī-křō-zō-ā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + LGr. ζώον, pl. ζώα, dim. of Gr. ζῷον, animal.] De Blainville's name for infusorians, rotifers, and other animalcules.

microzoarian (mī-křō-zō-ā'ri-an), a. and n. [< Microzoaria + -an.] I. a. Animalcular; of or pertaining to the Microzoaria.

II. n. An animalcule; a member of the Microzoaria.

microzoary (mī-křō-zō-ā'ri), n.; pl. microzoaries (-riz). [< NL. Microzoaria.] A microzoarian.

microzooid (mī-křō-zō'oid), n. and a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. zooid.] I. n. A free-swimming zooid of abnormally minute size, which conjugates with or becomes buried within the substance of the body of a normally sized sedentary animalcule of many Forficellidae.

II. a. Pertaining to a microzooid.

microzoön (mī-křō-zō'on), n.; pl. microzoa (-z). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ζῷον, an animal.] Any micro-organism of animal nature; a microzoarian.

microzoöspore (mī-křō-zō'ō-spōr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. zoöspore.] A zoöspore of small size as compared with others produced by the same species.

The smaller or microzoöspores are produced by the division of the vegetative mother-cell into a larger number of portions. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 391.

microzyme (mī-křō-zīm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ζύμη, leaven: see zymic.] One of a class of extremely small living creatures, existing in the atmosphere, and furnishing the basis on which certain epizootic, epidemic, and other zymotic diseases are dependent for their existence; a zymotic microbe. These pestiferous microbes have some characters at least in which they resemble ferments, and by multiplying rapidly they excite morbid action in the animal organism with which they come in contact. See germ theory (under germ), and cuts under microbe.

Mictidae (mīk'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Serville, 1843), < Mictis + -idae.] A family of heteropterous insects, typified by the genus Mictis, having the femora spined beneath, and the hind ones thicker than the others, especially in the males. It comprises many tropical and sub-tropical forms, some of large size and handsome coloration, as Pachylis gigas, a North American representative. There are about 15 genera of the family. Also Mictides, Mictida, and (as a subfamily of Coreidae) Mictina, Mictinca.

miction (mīk'shōn), n. [= F. miction, < LL. mictio (n.), minctio (n.), < L. mingere, pp. minctus, mictus (= AS. migan, early ME. migen = MLG. migen = Icel. miga), urinate.] The act of voiding urine.

Mictis (mīk'tis), n. [NL. (Leach, 1814); origin not ascertained.] The typical genus of Mictidae, having the fourth antennal joint not shorter than the third. Nearly 100 species are described from Africa, southern Asia, the Malay archipelago, and Australia.

micturate (mīk-tū-rāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. micturated, ppr. micturating. [Irreg. < L. micturare, pp. micturitus, urinate: see micturition.] To pass urine; urinate.

micturition (mīk-tū-rish'on), n. [= F. micturition, < L. as if micturitiō* (n.), < micturare, pp. micturitus, go to urinate, desiderative of mingere, pp. mictus, urinate: see miction.] The act of urinating; especially, morbidly frequent and scant urination.

mid¹ (mid), a. and n. [< ME. mid, midde, myd, mydde, < AS. mid (a nom. form not actually

Hence midst¹, middle, etc.] I. a. I. Middle; being the middle part or midst. The monosyllable mid, properly an adjective, is so closely connected with its noun as to assume often the aspect of a prefix; it is therefore often joined to its noun with a hyphen. The real relation, however, is nearly always the normal one of adjective and noun.

3. In gram.: (a) Intermediate between active and passive: applied to a body of verb-forms of which the office is more or less distinctly reflexive, or denotes the subject as acting on or for or with reference to itself, often answering to an English intransitive verb: as, middle voice, middle ending, middle tense. Such forms, distinguished by their endings, belonged to the original Indo-European verb, and are retained by some of the extant languages, especially Sanskrit and Greek. In Greek the middle voice (ἡ μέση διάθεσις, μεσότης) serves also as passive, except in the future and aorist. (b) Intermediate between smooth (unspirated) and rough (aspirated): as, a middle (medial) mute. See *mute*¹, n.

4. —Middle ages. See ages. —Middle book, a course of study intermediate between the Elements of Euclid and the Almagest of Ptolemy. —Middle C. See C.—Middle chest. See chest. —Middle class, that class of the people which is socially and conventionally intermediate between the aristocratic class, or nobility, and the laboring class; the untitled community of well-born or wealthy people, made up of landed proprietors, professional men, and merchants: in Great Britain commonly subdivided into upper and lower middle classes. In the United States no class-distinction of this nature exists.

He [Pitt] looked for support not . . . to a strong aristocratic connection, not . . . to the personal favour of the sovereign, but to the middle class of Englishmen.

Macaulay, William Pitt, Earl of Chatham.

4. In logic, same as middle term. —5. In gram., same as middle voice. See I., 3. —Fallacy of no middle, of undistributed middle, of unreal middle. See fallacy. —The principle of excluded middle or third, one of the properties of negation, according to which there is no individual that is not included either under any given term or under its negative. It may also be stated by saying that the negative of the negative of any term is included under that term. The converse statement that the negative of the negative of any term includes that term is the principle of contradiction. These two principles, taken together, define negation.

And since no proposition can be at once true and false while its terms remain the same, but must be either true or false, under alternative aspects, the Principle of the Excluded Middle, which is simply the assertion of such an alternative, is seen to be nothing more than the Principle of Equivalence.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. II. § 82.

—Syn. 1. Center, Midst, Middle. Center is a precise word, ordinarily applied to circular, globular, or regular bodies: as, the center of a circle, globe, field; but it is used wherever a similar exactness appears to exist: as, the center of a crowd. Midst regards the person or thing as enveloped or surrounded on all sides, especially by that which is close upon him or it, thick or dense: as, in the midst of the forest, the waves, troubles, one's thoughts. Except as thus modified by the idea of envelopment or close environment, the old idea of midst as meaning the middle point (see Gen. i. 6; Josh. vii. 23; 1 Ki. xlii. 36) is quite obsolete. Midst is very often used abstractly or figuratively, center rarely, middle never. Middle is often applied to extent in only one direction: as, the middle of the street, of a block of houses, of a string; it is often less precise than center: compare the center and the middle of a room.

The pride, the market-place, the crown
And center of the potter's trade.

Longfellow, Keramos, l. 66.

Jesus himself stood in the midst of them.

Luke xiv. 36.

In the dead vast and middle of the night.

In our, your, their midst, in the midst of us, you, them. These phrases have been objected to by some writers on English, but with no good reason.

In their midst a form was seen. Montgomery.

That in their midst, in our midst, &c., are at odds with the "genius" of our language, is an assertion somewhat adventurous. As concerns a substantive, its subjective genitive, universally, and its objective genitive, very often, may be expressed prepositively. Love of God, intending 'love emanating from God', may be exchanged for God's love: but we also say, Plato's commentators, and the world's end. To come to possessive pronouns, we have no scruples about the objective do his pleasure, sing thy praise, in my absence, on your account, to their discredit, in our despite, his equal, &c.; and with these phrases in our midst is rigidly comparable. . . . With reference to analogical principles in our midst is altogether irreproachable. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 50.

midst¹ (midst), adv. [*< midst*¹, n., itself orig. an adv. in connection with a prep.] In the middle.

On earth, join all ye creatures to extol
Him first, him last, him midst, and without end.

midsummer (mid'sum'ēr), n. [< ME. midsomer, < AS. midsumor, middesumor (= MLG. midsummar = G. mittsommer = Icel. midsummar = Sw. midssommar = Dan. midssommer), < mid, mid, + sumor, summer.] The middle of summer; the period of the summer solstice, about the 21st of June (astronomically the beginning of summer), because in Great Britain summer is considered as beginning with May; specifically, midsummer day, June 24th. See midsummer day, below. On midsummer eve, or the eve of the feast of St. John Baptist (June 24th), it was the custom in former times to kindle fires (called St. John's fires) upon hills in celebration of the summer solstice.

As full of spirit as the month of May,
And gorgeous as the sun at midsummer.
Shak., I Hen. IV., iv. 1. 102.

"On Midsummer next," the dam'sel said,
"Which is June the twenty-four."

midwife (mid'wif), n.; pl. midwives (-wivz). [< ME. midwife, mydwyfe, midwif, mydwif, mydewif, medwyfe, medewife, prob. *< AS. midwif (not recorded), < mid, with, + wif, wife, woman; cf. Sp. Pg. comadre, a midwife, < con, < L. cum, with, + madre, < L. mater, mother; G. heifrau, a midwife's assistant. Cf. also D. medehelpen, assist, < mede, with, + helpen, help; G. mithelfer, an assistant, < mit, with, + helfer, helper. Owing to the disappearance of the prep. mid, this element in midwife has not been commonly understood, and an etymology based on the ME. form medewif, taken as < mede, E. meed, reward, + wife, woman (as if 'a woman who serves for pay'), has been in favor. This etymology, which is impossible for other reasons, is not supported even by the ME. form medewife, which is explainable as a mere variant spelling of midwife.] A woman who assists women in childbirth.

The midwife wonder'd, and the women cried
"O, Jesus bless us, he is born with teeth!"

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 6. 74.

Midwife toad, the obstetrical toad or nurse-frog, Alytes obstetricans. See Alytes.

mignonette (min-yō-net'), n. [< F. mignonnette, the flower so called, dim. of mignon, delicate, pretty, gracefully pleasing: see *mignon*¹.] 1. A well-known plant, Reseda odorata, native in northern Africa. Its racemes of small greenish-white flowers with prominent brown anthers are not showy, but the plant is a universal favorite in gardens on account of its fragrance. In ordinary culture it is an annual, but it is naturally shrubby, and by proper care can be made to thrive for several years in the form of tree-mignonette. The perfume is best extracted by enfleurage.

2. Some other species of the genus Reseda. The white mignonette, R. alba, a tall plant with white scentless blossoms, has sometimes been cultivated. The wild or dyer's mignonette, R. luteola, is better known as dyer's-weed or yellow-weed. See dyer's-weed. — Jamaica mignonette. See Lavandula. — Mignonette lace. The Century, XXXI. 115.

II. n. 1. One who migrates; a wanderer.

The unhappy migrants may be, if not magnificently, at least hospitably, entertained.

Foots, The Minor, Ded.

2. In zool., specifically, a migratory animal, as a bird.

These are true migrants; but a number of other birds visit us occasionally, and can only be classed as stragglers.

A. R. Wallace, Distribution of Animals, I. 19.

migrate (mi'grāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. migrated, ppr. migrating. [< L. migratus, pp. of migrare, (< It. migrare), move from one place to another, remove, depart, migrate; perhaps connected with meare, go. Cf. emigrate, immigrate.] To pass or remove from one place of residence or habitat to another at a distance, especially from one country or latitude to another; in a general sense, to wander.

Those truly home-bred and genuine sons of the soil who have never migrated beyond the sound of Bow-bells.

W. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 379.

— Syn. Migrate, Emigrate, Immigrate. To migrate is to change one's abode, especially to a distance or to another country, emphasis being laid upon the change, but not upon the place of departure or that of stopping, and the stay being generally not permanent. Emigrate, to migrate from, views the person as leaving his previous abode and making a new home; immigrate, to migrate into, views him as coming to the new place. The Arab migrates; the European coming to America is an emigrant to those whom he leaves, and an immigrant to the Americans. Migrate is applicable to animals; the other terms are generally used of the movements of men.

migration (mi-grā'shōn), n. [< F. migration = Pg. migração = It. migrazione, < L. migratio(n)-, < migrare, pp. migratus, migrate: see migrate.] 1. The act of migrating; change of residence or habitat; removal or transit from one locality or latitude to another, especially at a distance. Among animals, the most extensive and regular migrations are performed by birds during spring and fall, and in a general way along meridians of longitude, the vernal migration being northward, the autumnal southward. This is ordinary or equatorial migration. In cold and temperate latitudes of the northern hemisphere nearly all insectivorous birds perform migration. Some, as sandpipers, which breed only in high latitudes, may be dispersed during their migration over a great part of the world. Others, as swallows, are noted not only for the extent but for the rapidity and regularity of their movements, their arrival and departure being capable of prediction with considerable accuracy. The migration of many water-fowls is scarcely less notable in the same respects. Migration seems to be determined, primarily and chiefly, by conditions of food-supply, but this does not fully account for the apparently needless extent and the wonderful periodicity of the movement, nor for the fact that individuals sometimes return to exactly the same spot to breed again, after passing the winter perhaps thousands of miles away. Migrations of mammals are more irregular than those of birds, less definitely related to latitude and longitude, and more obviously dependent upon food-supply: such are the excursions, often in enormous hordes, of various arctic animals, as lemmings and other rodents, reindeer, musk-oxen, foxes, etc. Such movements do not appear to be specially related to reproduction. Many fishes migrate from and back to the sea, ascending rivers to spawn, as is notably the case with anadromous fishes of the salmon and herring families; with eels the case is reversed; with many fishes the catadromous migration is between deeper and shallower, or colder and warmer, salt water. Periodical migration is also marked with certain insects. Thus, Anolis plicippus, the milkweed-butterfly, migrates southward in the fall to hibernate in the pine woods of the southern United States. The faculty which enables or compels animals to migrate has been named the "instinct of migration"; but the phrase is rather a statement of fact than an explanation of the phenomenon, except in so far as this instinct may be regarded as originating in and being highly developed from the simple necessity of moving about to secure food.

All our adventures were by the fireside; and all our migrations from the blue bed to the brown.

Goldsmith, Vicar.

Adventures that beguiled and cheered
Their grave migration. Wordsworth, Excursion, vii.

Our remote forefathers must have made endless earlier migrations as parts of the great Aryan body, as parts of the smaller Teutonic body. But our voyage from the Low-Dutch mainland to the Isle of Britain was our first migration as a people. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 31.

2. A number of animals migrating together; the total of the individuals or species which perform any particular migration; also, the time or period occupied in migrating.—3†. Change of place; removal.

Such alterations, transitions, migrations, of the centre of gravity, and elevations of new islands, had actually happened. Woodward, Essay towards a Nat. Hist. of the Earth. (Latham.)

4†. Residence in a foreign country; banishment.

Wo is me, too too long banished from the Christian world, with such animosity, as if it were the worst of enemies, and meet to be adjudged to a perpetual migration.

Bp. Hall, Invisible World, The Epistle.

Bathic migration, migration of fishes from one depth of water to another; vertical or altitudinal change of habitat in the sea: distinguished from equatorial migration.

The fishes of any region may find water of suitable warmth by moving north or south along the shores of the continent, or by changing to waters of less or greater depth. The former may be called equatorial, the latter bathic migration. Bathic migration is the most common.

Goode, Menhaden.

Equatorial migration, ordinary meridional migration from or toward the equator. See def. 1.

migratory (mī-grā-tō-ri), a. [= F. migratoire = Sp. It. migratorio; as migrate + -ory.] 1. Given to or characterized by migration; roving or removing from place to place; unsettled; as, the pastoral tribes of uncivilized men are generally migratory; to lead a migratory life.

Yet, sweet Nightingale!

From the warm breeze that bears thee on, alight
At will, and stay thy migratory flight.

Wordsworth, Evening Voluntary, v.

The same species is often sedentary in one part of Europe, and migratory in another.

A. R. Wallace, Distribution of Animals, I, 20.

2. Pertaining or relating to migration or to a tendency to migrate.

This purpose is sometimes carried on by a sort of migratory instinct, sometimes by a spirit of conquest.

Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist., II, 2.

Migratory animals, those animals whose instincts prompt them to remove from one place to another at the regularly recurring changes of season or of their natural means of subsistence.—Migratory cells, white blood-corpuscles which, by means of the amoeboid movement of their protoplasm, penetrate the walls of the blood-vessels and wander independently in the tissues, particularly the connective tissue.—Migratory locust. See locust, 1.

—Migratory pigeon, the passenger-pigeon. See Ecto-pistes, and cut under passenger-pigeon.

migronet, n. A Middle English form of megrin.

Mihelmesse, n. A Middle English form of Michaelmas.

mihrab (mih-rāb'), n. [Ar., praying-place.] A niche, or sometimes merely a decorated slab, in one of the interior walls of a mosque, marking the direction of Mecca, to which the faithful ought to turn in prayer. In the niche a copy of the Koran is usually kept, and in front of it the imam stands when he leads the congregation in prayer.

mikado (mī-kā'dō), n. [Jap., lit. 'exalted gate' (like the Sublime Porte, applied to the Sultan of Turkey), < mi, exalted, + kado, gate.] The Emperor of Japan, sometimes erroneously spoken of as the spiritual emperor. See shogun.

Mikania (mī-kā-nī-ā), n. [NL. (Willdenow), named after J. C. Mikán, a Bohemian botanist (1769-1844).] A genus of composite plants of the suborder Tubuliflorae, the tribe Eupatoriaceae, and the subtribe Agerateae. The principal characteristics are an involucre of four slightly unequal bracts, four-flowered heads which are racemed or panicle, and pappus with very numerous scabrous bristles arranged in one row. The plants are shrubs or herbs, which are almost always climbing or twining, with opposite leaves, and small white, flesh-colored, or pale-yellowish heads. About 140 species have been enumerated, but they may probably be reduced to 100. They are natives of the warmer parts of America, with the exception of one species, which is found in Asia and tropical Africa. M. scandens, the climbing hempweed, is a high climber, with cordate somewhat deltoid or hastate leaves and heads of pale flesh-colored flowers in dense cymes, climbing over copees along streams; it ranges through the eastern and southern United States into Mexico and to Brazil. M. guaco is one of the guaco-plants of tropical America.

mikelt, a. and n. A Middle English form of mickle.

Encyc. Brit., IX, 554.

milarite (mī-lār-it), n. [< Milar (the Val Milar, in Switzerland, where it was supposed to occur; the true locality, however, has been found to be Val Giuf) + -ite.] A silicate of aluminium and calcium, allied in composition to petalite. It occurs in colorless or greenish hexagonal (perhaps pseudohexagonal) prisms.

milcet, v. t. See milce.

milch (milch), a. [< ME. milche, melch, < AS. melc, melce, meolce (= LG. melke = OHG. MHG. melch, G. melk = Icel. milkr, mjólk), giving milk, < meolc, milk: see milk.] 1. Giving milk; furnishing milk: as, a milch cow: now applied only to domestic animals, and chiefly to cows.

1 Sam. vi, 7.

Take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke.
Get me three hundred milch bats, to make possets to procure sleep.
Webster, Duchess of Malfi, iv, 2.

2†. Milky: said of plants.

Hem [plants] both melch in veer novelles grene

Beth nought to feede.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

3†. Yielding liquid; distilling drops (namely, tears). [Poetical and rare.]

The instant burst of clamour that she made,
Unless things mortal move them not at all,
Would have made milch the burning eyes of heaven,
And passion in the gods. Shak., Hamlet, II, 2, 540.

milch-wench (milch'wench), n. A wet-nurse.

Such exceptions were made against all but one country milch-wench, to whom I was committed, and put to the breast.
Steele, Tatler, No. 15.

milch-woman (milch'wūm'an), n. A wet-nurse. [Rare.]

We find not above fifty-one to have been starved, excepting helpless infants at Nurse, . . . being caused . . . by carelessness, ignorance, and infirmity of the Milch-women.
J. Graunt, quoted in Ribton-Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 168.

milchy (mīl'chi), a. [< milch + -y. Cf. milky.]

The first element is disputed, the word having early perished in independent use; but no other explanation than that here given is plausible.] 1. A minute parasitic fungus which frequently appears on the leaves, stems, and various other parts of plants or other decaying organic substances as a white frost-like down, or in spots or with various discolorations. The name is more properly restricted to the Erysiphe, or powdery mildews, and the Peronosporae, or downy mildews. The Uredineae, of which Puccinia graminis, the corn-mildew of England, is the type, are more properly rusts. (See rust, Uredineae.) The mildews are among the most destructive fungi known. Peronospora viticola is the very destructive American downy mildew of the grape, and Uncinula ampelopsidis, of which the so-called Oidium Tuckeri is the conical form, is the powdery mildew of the grape. Phytophthora infestans is the downy mildew of the potato, causing the disease known as potato-rot. Erysiphe communis is a very common mildew on various Leguminosae, Ranunculaceae, etc. The so-called mildew of linen is produced by a species of Cladosporium. See Cladosporium, Erysiphe, Peronospora.

The Downy Mildew of the Grape (Peronospora viticola), magnified.

2. A state of decay produced in living and dead vegetable matter, and in some manufactured products of vegetable matter, such as cloth and paper, by the ravages of very minute parasitic fungi.

The Lord shall smite thee . . . with mildew.

Deut. xxviii. 22.

II. intrans. To become affected with mildew. mildew-bronze (mil'dū-bronz), n. Bronze in which is imitated the effect of aging on bronzes long buried in the ground.

mildewy (mil'dū-i), a. [< mildew + -y¹]. Affected by or abounding in mildew; moldy.

mildly (mild'li), adv. [< ME. mildlich, mildeliche, < AS. mildlice (= D. mildtich = MLG. mildetich = MHG. miltliche, G. mildtich = Icel. mildtiga = Sw. mildeligen = Dan. mildelig), < milde, mild: see mild and -ly²]. In a mild manner or degree; softly; gently; tenderly; not roughly or violently; moderately.

mildness (mild'nes), n. [< ME. mildenes, < AS. mildenes* (= OHG. miltinissa), < milde, mild: see mild and -ness.] The state or quality of being mild, in any sense of that word; gentleness of disposition, manner, action, or effect; moderateness of quality or character; placidity; softness; yieldingness.

mild-spoken (mild'spō'kn), a. Mild in speech. [Colloq.]

mile (mil), n. [< ME. mile, myle, < AS. mīl = D. mīl = MLG. mīle, LG. mīle = OHG. mīla, mīlla, MHG. mīle, G. meile = Icel. mīla = Sw. Dan. mīl = OF. mille, mīle, F. mille = Pr. Sp. milla = Pg. milha = It. miglio, < ML. mīlia, mīllia, fem. sing., a mile, < L. mille, so. passuum, a mile, lit. a thousand steps: mille, pl. mīlia, mīllia, a thousand; passuum, gen. pl. of passus, a step: see *pace*¹]. An itinerary measure, modified from that of the Romans, which was equal to 1,617 English yards: used in the British empire, in the United States, and, formerly, in most European countries. The ordinary or statute mile is equal to 8 furlongs = 320 perches or poles = 1,760 yards = 5,280 feet; it was rendered legal by a statute of the thirty-fifth year of Elizabeth's reign, which prohibited building within three miles of London. This mile was probably intended to be about the length of a minute on the earth's surface, but the perch, of which it is an exact multiple, already existed. The square mile is 640 square chains, or 640 acres. The nautical or geographical mile has been variously defined: see phrase below. The medieval English mile (divided into 10 furlongs) was equal to 6,610 feet or 2,015 meters. The old London mile was 5,000 feet. The miles of continental Europe were of the most various lengths, and mostly represented, as it would seem, multiples of some modified Roman mile. The ancient Scottish mile was 1,976 yards = 1.123 English miles; the Irish mile, 2,240 yards = 1.273 English miles (11 Irish miles being 14 English miles). The Welsh mile was nearly 4 miles English. The following table shows the values of some of the principal miles in meters:

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), i. 1732.

A merry heart goes all the day,
Your sad tires in a mile-a.

Shak., W. T., iv. 2 (song).

He had ridden five Staffordshire miles.

Robin Hood's Birth (Child's Ballads, V. 349).

Geographical or nautical mile, a mile variously defined as: (1) the mean length of a minute of latitude = 6,082.66 feet; (2) the length of a minute of the meridian corresponding to the radius of curvature of the particular latitude, varying from 6,045.96 feet at the equator to 6,107.85 feet at the poles; and (3) the length of a minute of longitude on the equator = 6,087.15 feet. To remove all uncertainty, the United States Coast Survey has adopted the value of the nautical mile as equal to one sixtieth part of the length of a degree on the great circle of a sphere whose surface is equal to the surface of the earth. This value gives one nautical mile = 6,080.27 feet, which is very nearly the value of the Admiralty knot (6,080 feet) adopted by the British Hydrographic Office.—Three-mile limit, belt, or zone (also called the marine belt), in international law, that part of the margin of the high seas which is within the jurisdiction of the nation possessing the coast, originally determined by the circumstance that, at the time this limit became generally recognized, a marine league approximated fairly to the distance at which cannon on the shore would serve to command the water. 1 Whart. Dig. Int. Law, 114, § 32.

mileage (mī'lāj), n. [Formerly also milage; < mile + -age.] 1. Length, extent, or distance in miles; the total or aggregate number of miles of way made, used, or traversed: as, the mileage of highways or waterways in a country; the mileage of a railroad-line; the mileage of a year's traffic on a railroad, or of travel through a country.—2. An allowance or compensation for travel or conveyance reckoned by the mile; especially, payment allowed to a public functionary for the expenses of travel in the discharge of his duties according to the number of miles passed over: as, the mileage of a sheriff, circuit judge, or member of Congress or of a legislature.

Private travellers can obtain permission to make use of (post-horses) on payment of small mileage-dues.

H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 52.

mile-post (mīl'pōst), n. A post set up to mark distance by miles along a highway or other line of travel.

Milesia (mī-lē'si-ā), n. [NL.] A genus of dipterous insects of the family Syrphidae, founded by Latreille in 1805. It is composed of large, robust, nearly naked species, black or yellowish-brown, with yellowish thoracic and abdominal markings. The genus is mostly developed in southeastern Asia and the East Indian archipelago; but two European species are known, and one, M. ornata, is North American.

Ornate Syrphid (Milesia ornata).

Milesian¹ (mī-lē'shian), a. and n. [< L. Milesius, < Gr. Μιλήσιος, of or pertaining to Miletus, < Μίλητος, > L. Miletus, Miletus: see def.] I. a. Pertaining to Miletus, an ancient city of Caria, on the Ionic coast of Asia Minor, or to its inhabitants.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of the ancient Ionic city of Miletus in Asia Minor.

Milesian² (mī-lē'shian or -zhan), a. and n. [After *Milesian*¹, < Milesius, a fabulous king of Spain.] I. a. Pertaining to Ireland or the Irish race. See II.

II. n. A native of Ireland; a member of the Irish race: so called from the tradition of an ancient conquest and reorganization of the country by two sons of Milesius, a fabulous king of Spain. It is supposed that the legendary race of Milesians were the same as the Scots who conquered Ireland in prehistoric times.

mile-stone (mīl'stōn), n. A stone or pillar set up along a highway or other line of travel to mark distance in miles.

The second mile-stone fronts the garden gate.

Couper, Retirement, i. 490.

mileway (mil'wā), n. 1. A measure of time: the third part of an hour, or twenty minutes.—2. Five degrees of angular measurement.

As I have said, 5 of these degrees maken a mileway, & 3 mileways maken an howre. Chaucer, Astrolabe, i. § 16.

milfoil (mil'foil), n. [< ME. milfoil, < OF. milfoil, mirfueil, mierfueil, millefueil, m., millefueille, F. millefeuille, f., = Pg. milfolhas = It. millefoglie, millefoglio, < L. millefolium, neut., millefolia, f., milfoil, lit. (like Gr. χιλιόφυλλον, milfoil), 'thousand leaves,' so called from the abundance of its leaves, < mille, a thousand, + folium, leaf: see *mill*² and *foil*¹. Cf. trefoil, quatrefoil, cinq-foil, etc.] A composite herb, Achillea Millefolium, also called yarrow. It is distributed throughout the northern hemisphere, and is found on roadsides, in dry pastures, etc. It is a grayish-green plant, a foot or two high, the leaves bipinnate and very finely divided, the heads in a crowded corymb, their short rays white, sometimes rose-colored. Medicinally the milfoil is a mild aromatic tonic and astringent. A. moschata, the musk-milfoil, a native of the mountains of central and southern Europe, is cultivated in Switzerland as a food for cattle. The name is sometimes extended to other plants of the genus.—Water-milfoil, one of various water-plants with finely dissected leaves, chiefly of the genus Myriophyllum. The hooded water-milfoil is the bladderwort, Utricularia vulgaris.

milial, n. [L., pl. of milium: see Milium.] Millet; millet-seed.

They stamp their milias as we do spice, . . . temper with fresh water and salt, and make rolls thereof.

Pursh, Pilgrimage, p. 650.

miliari, n. [< ME. miliare, < L. miliarium (see def.)] In Rom. antiq. and later, a tall narrow vessel for drawing and warming water: used in baths.

A miliari of lede, the bothom brasse

Anende the fettes sette it so withoute

The fourneis, and the fire ther undre passe.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 40.

miliaria (mil-i-ā'ri-ā), n. [NL., < L. miliaria, fem. of miliaris, belonging to millet: see miliari.] 1. In pathol., miliarial fever.—2. In ornith., an old name of the corn-bunting, Emberiza miliaria, as that of a bird which feeds upon millet. It is taken by some authors as a generic name of this bunting and its near relatives.

miliary (mil-i-ā-ri), a. [= F. miliare = Sp. Pg. miliar = It. miliare, < L. miliaris, of or belonging to millet, < milium, millet: see millet.] Resembling millet-seeds, especially in size (about one or two millimeters in diameter); accompanied by formations of this size: as, miliary glands; miliary tuberculosis; miliary fever. See gland, tuberculosis, fever.

millicet (mī-lēs'), n. [< F. milice, militia: see militia.] Militia, in a general sense.

The two-and-twentieth of the prince's age is the time assigned by their constitutions for his entering upon the publick charges of their milice.

Str W. Temple, War in the Low Countries.

Miliobatis, n. See Myliobatis.

Miliola (mī-lī-ō-lā), n. [NL., < L. milium, millet: see Milium.] A genus of imperforate foraminifers, typical of the family Miliolidae. The minute fossil tests or shells occur in immense numbers in some strata, being the chief constituent of the miliolite limestone of the Paris basin, for example.

Miliolidae (mil-i-ō-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Miliola + -idae.] A family of foraminiferous rhizopods, typified by the genus Miliola. They have the test imperforate, normally calcareous and porcelaneous, sometimes incrustated with sand, under starved conditions (for example in brackish water) becoming chitinous or chitino-arenaceous, and at abyssal depths occasionally consisting of a thin, homogenous, imperforate siliceous film.

milioliform (mil-i-ō-lī-fōrm), a. [< NL. Miliola + L. forma, form.] Same as milioline.

milioline (mil-i-ō-līn), a. [< NL. Miliola + -ine².] Pertaining to, characteristic of, or resembling the Miliolidae or a subfamily Miliolinae: as, a milioline chamber or character.

Abounding near the shores of almost every sea are some forms of the Miliolina type, so named from the resemblance of some of their minute fossilized forms to millet-seeds.

W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 462.

miliolite (mil-i-ō-līt), a. and n. [< NL. Miliola + -ite².] I. a. Miliolitic.

II. n. A fossil milioline foraminifer.

miliolitic (mil-i-ō-līt'ik), a. [< miliolite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to miliolites; containing or consisting of miliolites: as, miliolitic chalk.

milit. An abbreviation of military.

militancy (mil-i-tan-si), n. [< militan(t) + -cy.] The condition of being militant; a state of warfare or conflict.

Miliolite.

All humane life, especially the active part, is constituted in a state of continual militancy.

W. Montague, Devoute Essays, I. x. 7.

It is not uncheering to look back upon a time when the nation (England) was in a normal condition of militancy against social injustice. Froude, Sketches, p. 172.

militant (mil'i-tant), a. [= F. militant = Sp. Pg. It. militante, < L. militan(t)-s, ppr. of militare, serve as a soldier: see militate.] 1. Fighting; warring; engaged in warfare; pertaining to warfare or conflict.

At which command the powers militant moved on
In silence. Milton, P. L., vi. 61.

2. Having a combative character or tendency; warlike.

The militant nature of legal protection is seen in the fact that . . . it is a replacing of individual armed force by the armed force of the state, always in reserve if not exercised. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 522.

Church militant. See church.

militantly (mil'i-tant-li), adv. In a militant or warlike manner.

militar (mil'i-tär), a. [L. militaris: see military.] Military.

B. Jonson, Underwoods, lxiii.

militarily (mil'i-tä-ri-li), adv. In a military or warlike manner; by military force; from a military point of view.

Austria is at this moment, under the treaty [of 1856], militarily occupying two provinces of Turkey in order to reform them. N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 295.

militarism (mil'i-tä-rizm), n. [F. militarisme = Sp. militarismo; as militar, militar-y, + -ism.] The military spirit; addiction to war or military practices; the maintenance of national power by means of standing armies.

The principles of Port Royal found some supporters . . . before monarchism and militarism had crushed the life out of the nation. Encyc. Brit., VII. 675.

Monarchy, aristocracy, militarism we could not have if we would, we would not have if we could.

A. D. White, Century's Message, p. 19.

Who can say that the democracy will not in some sudden impulse of economy or aversion to militarism prematurely reduce the army and navy, and lay the Empire open to aggression from every side?

Nineteenth Century, XX. 311.

militarist (mil'i-tä-rist), n. [< militar, militar-y, + -ist.] 1. One devoted to military affairs; one proficient in the art of war.

You're deceived, my lord; this is Monsieur Parolles, the gallant militarist—that was his own phrase—that had the whole theory of war in the knot of his scarf, and the practice in the chape of his dagger.

Shak., All's Well, iv. 3. 161.

2. One who is in favor of a standing army; one who advocates a warlike policy.

military (mil'i-tä-ri), a. and n. [Formerly also militar; = F. militaire = Sp. Pg. militar = It. militare, < L. militaris, rarely militarius, of or belonging to soldiers or war, warlike, < miles (milit-), O.L. meiles, a soldier.] 1. a. 1. Having the position or character of a soldier; pertaining to soldiers; suitable to, characteristic of, or performed by soldiers; soldierly: as, a military man; a military deportment or disposition.

He will maintain his argument as well as any military man in the world. Shak., Hen. V., iii. 2. 36.

Was this your discipline and faith engaged,
Your military obedience? Milton, P. L., iv. 955.

Though courageous in brawls and duels, he knew nothing of military duty. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. Relating or pertaining to war, to the art of war, or to an armed force; adapted to or connected with a state of war; martial; warlike; belligerent: as, the military art; military glory; military history; military equipage; a military expedition. The military resources of a country include both army and navy, and the phrase military office has been legally construed to apply to both; but in ordinary language military is used only in relation to the land-forces, as distinguished from the naval or sea forces.

Both were ambitious of military glory, and showed capacity for attaining it. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 25.

A military force, whether intended to operate on land or at sea, exists primarily for purposes of war.

J. R. Soley, Blockade and Cruisers, p. 231.

3. Warlike in method or practice; having relation to the usages or purposes of war; connected with or dependent upon the use of armed force: opposed to civil: as, a military despotism; military government; a military execution.

Abbreviated mil., milit.

Bureau of Military Justice. See bureau.—Military architecture. See architecture.—Military art, the art of war. (a) Tactical, relating to the order and arrangement to be observed in the management of an army when it is to march, to engage an enemy, or to be encamped. (b) Technical, including the composition, fabrication, and application of warlike machines, and the practice of military engineering in the erection of offensive and defensive works for the protection of an army, a city, or a country. This branch also comprises the topographical surveys, the building of pontoon and other bridges, the projection and construction of roads, telegraph-lines, railroads, etc., necessary to the operations of an army in the field.—Military band. See band.—Military ceremonies. See ceremony.—Military commission. See commission.—Military courts, the courts of chivalry and courts martial.—Military drum, the side-drum or snare-drum.—Military engineering, fever, etc. See the nouns.—Military feuds. See feud.—Military Knight of Windsor. Same as Windsor Knight (which see, under knight).—Military law, the body of rules and ordinances prescribed by competent authority for the government of the military state, considered as a distinct community. (Bishop.) Military law in the United States consists of the Rules and Articles of War, and other statutory provisions for the government of persons subject to military control, to which may be added the unwritten or common law derived from the usage and custom of military service. See law, and martial law (under martial).—Military mast. See mast.—Military music, martial music, suitable for a military band and for use in connection with military evolutions.—Military offenses, offenses which are cognizable by a court martial.—Military system, the rules, regulations, forms, etc., prescribed for the organization and administration of an army in the field or in garrison or camp.—Military tenure, a tenure of land on condition of performing military service.—Military testament, in Rom. law, a nuncupative will, by which a soldier might dispose of his goods without the forms and solemnities which the law requires in other cases.—Statute of military tenures, an English statute of 1660, which abolished knights' service and some of the abuses and exactions of military tenures.—Syn. Warlike, etc. See martial.

II. n. Soldiers generally; soldiery; officers of the army: commonly with the definite article: as, the occasion was enlivened by the presence of the military.

My lord going to the "Trumpet," in the Cockpit, Whitehall, an house used by the military in his time as a young man. Thackeray, Henry Esmond, I. 14.

militate (mil'i-tät), v. i.; pret. and pp. militated, ppr. militating. [< L. militatus, pp. of militare, (< It. militare = Pg. Sp. militar = F. militier), be a soldier, < miles (milit-), a soldier: see military.] 1. To be in conflict or at variance; come into collision.

Against everything which militated with the doctrines or ceremonies of his church, he hurled his anathemas. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., II. 90.

Hence—2. To stand in array; have weight or force, as in determining anything: followed by against, and permissibly by in favor of: as, these facts militate against (or in favor of) your theory.

Multiplicity of talents has too often militated against the due fulfillment of some special bent.

W. Sharp, D. G. Rossetti, p. 1.

militation (mil-i-tä'shon), n. [< L. as if "militatio(n)-", < militare, pp. militatus, serve as a soldier: see militate.] A fighting; warfare; state of conflict.

Repentance doth not cut down sin at a blow; no, it is a constant militation, & course of mortification.

The Morning Exercise Methodized, p. 374.

militia (mi-lish'ä), n. [Formerly milice, < F. milice = Sp. Pg. milicia = It. milizia, < L. militia, military service, the soldiery, < miles (milit-), a soldier.] 1. Military service; warfare.

Another kind of militia I had then theirs. Baxter.

2. Soldiery; militants collectively. [Rare.]

Know then, unnumber'd spirits round thee fly,

The light militia of the lower sky.

Pope, R. of the L., I. 42.

Hence—3. The whole body of men declared by law amenable to military service, without enlistment, whether armed and drilled or not. [U. S.]

It has been necessary to call into service, not only volunteers, but also portions of the militia of the States by draft. Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 348.

The regular army is supported and controlled by the federal government, but each state maintains its own militia, which it is bound to use in case of internal disturbance before calling upon the central government for aid. In time of war, however, these militias come under the control of the central government.

J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 98.

4. A body of men enrolled and drilled according to military law, as an armed force, but not as regular soldiers, and called out in emergency for actual service and periodically for drill and exercise. The feudal array of the middle ages was properly a militia, and the first proceeding of modern warfare consisted in the gradual adoption of permanent and regular troops, which superseded the militia.

militiaman (mi-lish'ä-man), n.; pl. militiamen (-men). One who belongs to the organized and armed militia.

militiate (mi-lish'ä-tät), v. i. [< militia + -ate. Cf. militate.] 1. To levy or raise troops; maintain a standing army.

We continue to militiate, and to raise light troops.

Walpole, To Mann, Nov. 16, 1759. (Davies.)

2. To fight as a soldier.

The militating spirits of my country.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, III. 177. (Davies.)

Milium (mil'i-um), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. milium, millet: see millet.] 1. A genus of grasses of the tribe Agrostideæ and the subtribe Stipeæ, characterized by an ovoid glume, rigid or hardened about the caryopsis, and an awnless flowering glume. They are annuals or perennials, with flat leaves and a compound panicle of one-flowered spikelets. There are 5 or 6 species, natives of Europe, temperate Asia, and North America. The genus bears the common name of millet-grass. M. efusum, widely spread through the northern hemisphere, is a tall handsome grass which thrives in dense shade. Its herbage is relished by cattle, and its seed by birds.

They have the seed of Milium in great abundance.

Hakuyt's Voyages, I. 104.

2. [i. e.] In pathol., an affection of the sebaceous glands, caused by retention of their secretion in the form of pearly or yellowish-white little globular bodies embedded in the skin and projecting slightly above its surface.

Milium is a minute white tumour, about the size of a millet seed, . . . which is mostly situated at or near the free edge of the lid. J. S. Wells, Dis. of Eye, p. 682.

Milium (mil-i-ü'sä), n. [NL. (Leschenault, 1832), named after J. Milium Votolinas, a horticultural writer of the 16th century.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Anonaceæ, the custard-apple family, type of the tribe Miliumæ. It is characterized by having the outside petals small, and the interior ones much larger, flat, and converging at the apex. Seven or eight species are known, natives of eastern India, and perhaps of Australia. They are low or medium-sized trees, with flowers almost always axillary, either solitary or in clusters, and with the petals often transparent.

Milium (mil-i-ü'sä), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1862), < Milium + -æ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Anonaceæ, typified by the genus Milium. It is characterized by stamens which are loosely imbricated, and with the connective slightly or not at all dilated beyond the conspicuous dorsal cells of the anthers. There are 11 genera and about 65 species, all indigenous to the tropics.

milk (milk), n. [< ME. milk, mylk, melk, mulec, < AS. meolc, meoluc (not milo*) = OFries. melok = D. melk = MLG. LG. melk = OHG. miluh, MHG. milich, milch, G. milch = Icel. mjólk = Sw. mjólk = Dan. melk = Goth. miluks, milk; cf. Ir. meig = OBulg. meiko = Pol. Bohem. meiko = Serv. mljeko = Russ. moloko = Wendish mloko, melauka (all prob. borrowed from or modified according to the Teut., having k for the reg. g) (cf. W. laeth, L. lact-) = Gr. γάλα (galakt-), milk, of diff. origin: see lactate, etc., galaxy, etc.]; derived from a common Indo-Eur. verb, namely, AS. melcan (pret. mealc, pp. molcan) = D. melken = MLG. LG. melken = OHG. melchan, MHG. melchen, melken, G. melken = Goth. milkan* (not recorded), a strong verb partly displaced by, or merged in, a later weak verb, E. milk = OFries. melka = Icel. mjólka, etc., depending on the noun; cf. OBulg. mlka, mlsti, etc., = Russ. mlkziti = Lith. mlsti = L. mulgere = Gr. μῆλ-γην, milk, = Skt. √ marj = Zend √ marez, stroke, rub. Hence milk, v., and milch, a.] 1. A white or bluish-white liquid secreted by the mammary glands of the females of the class Mammalia, and drawn from their breasts for the nourishment of their young. It is opaque, with a slight peculiar odor and a bland sweetish taste. Its chemical constituents in different mammals are qualitatively alike, but quantitatively vary much, not only in different species, but also in different individuals, or even at different times in the same individual. The amount of water varies from about 80 to 90 per cent., the residue being composed of albuminoids (casein and lactoprotein), fat, milk-sugar, and certain salts, chiefly phosphates. Under the microscope it appears as a clear transparent fluid, in which a large number of minute globules are suspended. When allowed to rest, these globules rise to the surface, forming a yellowish stratum, the cream, which consists mainly of the fat, mixed with some casein, and retaining some serum. In the cow about 5 per cent. of the milk is cream, in the human female less, in the mare scarcely more than 1 per cent. By churning, the globules unite to form butter, leaving the buttermilk, which is essentially a solution of milk-sugar, with the salts and some casein and butter. The milk from which cream is separated is skimmed milk, which when left to itself (if not too cold) develops, from the action of a certain bacterium, lactic acid, which separates the casein in a coagulated condition called curds; the same effect is produced by some other acids, and by rennet, the prepared inner membrane of the stomach of a calf. The liquid separated from the coagulum is called whey, and contains chiefly milk-sugar and some salts. Cheese is prepared by coagulating milk with rennet, allowing the whey to separate, and adding salt to the curd. The specific gravity of both cow's and human milk is about 1.030. Human milk is always alkaline, cow's milk either alkaline or acid, while the milk of carnivora is always acid. Milk represents a complete or typical food, in which all the constituents necessary for maintaining the life and growth of the body are present. In rare instances milk, in greater or less abundance, is secreted by the mammary glands of the adult human male.

Milk before wine, I would twice mine;
Milk taken after, is poisons daughter.
Quoted in Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), Index, p. 100.

She bath'd her body many a time
In fountains fill'd with milk.
Queen Eleanor's Fall (Child's Ballads, VII. 297).

2. Anything resembling milk in appearance, taste, etc., as the juice of the coconut and the sap of certain plants (see later).

Thoo [squills] that in hills growe or places colde
Have litel mylk.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 124.

At the time when the contents of the berry (wheat) are in the condition technically known as milk.
Ure, Dict., IV. 158.

3. The spat before it is discharged from an oyster.—4. A slight cloudy opacity occurring in some diamonds.

Cloudy imperfections known in the trade as "milk" or "salt."
Ure, Dict., II. 24.

Blue milk. (a) Milk deprived of its cream; skimmed milk. It has a faint bluish tinge. [Colloq.] (b) Milk which has undergone a special fermentation caused by a microbe, Bacterium cyanogenum, which causes it to assume a blue color.—Bristol milk, a mixed beverage of which sherry is the chief ingredient.

Plenty of brave wine, and above all Bristol milk.

A rich brewage made of the best Spanish wine, and celebrated over the whole kingdom as Bristol milk.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., III.

Condensed milk, milk preserved by the addition of sugar with or without other ingredients, and subsequent reduction by evaporation to a half or a fourth of its bulk, sometimes even to dryness.—Fairy's milk, a peculiar milky secretion produced by the mammary glands of infants for some days after birth.—In milk, in the milk, milky; containing the spat, as oysters; containing a white juice, as wheat before the grains harden.—Milk of almonds, an emulsion prepared by rubbing blanched almonds with gum arabic, sugar, and water.—Milk of lime, slaked lime suspended in water; so called as resembling milk in appearance.—Milk of sulphur, precipitated sulphur.—Pigeon's milk, a milky or curdy secretion of the crop of pigeons of both sexes, upon which they feed their young for some time by disgorging or regurgitating it into their mouths.—Red milk, milk which has assumed a red color from the growth of a chromogenic fungus, Micrococcus prodigiosus.—Sugar of milk. Same as lactose.—Whole milk, milk with all its cream. [Eng.]—Yellow milk, milk which has assumed a yellow color, due to a coloring matter produced by a microbe, Bacterium synanthemum.

milk (milk), v. t. [< ME. milken, < AS. meolcian = OFries. melka (= Icel. mjölka = Sw. mjölka = Dan. malke), draw milk, give milk, < meolc, milk: see milk, n., where an earlier form of the verb is mentioned.] 1. To press or draw milk from the breasts or udders of: as, to milk a cow.

The Jew may not milk his cattell, nor eat of the milke when he hath procured a Christian to milk them, except he first buy it, but at his owne price.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 206.
Thou wilt not find my shepherdesses idly piping on oaten reeds, but milking the kine.

Gay, Shepherd's Week, Proem.

2†. To suck.
I have given suck, and know
How tender 'tis to love the babe that milks me.
Shak., Macbeth, I. 7. 55.

3. Figuratively, to drain the contents or the strength from; exhaust gradually: as, to milk a friend's purse; the soil has been milked of its fertility. [Obsolete or colloq.]

And to ayd the kynge in hys right must the commons be milked till they bleede agayne. Tyndale, Works, p. 366.
This three year I have milked their hopes.

B. Jonson, Volpone, I. 1.

4. In racing slang, to bet against, as an owner against his horse when the horse is to be withdrawn, or cannot win, or is not to be allowed to win.—5. In teleg., to draw part of the current from (a wire) through an instrument without cutting the wire; read a message by placing an induction apparatus close to (the wire).

The rapidity and simplicity of the means by which a wire could be milked without being cut or put out of circuit struck the whole of the party.

Prescott, Elect. Invent., p. 108.

6†. To supply with milk; feed with milk.
Norished was Terry fuetly to ryght
That she full ofte hym raid [dressed] and dight,
Chaufed, milked, and rechaufed again.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), I. 4024.

For lyche a moder she can cherishe,
And mylken as doth a norya. Rom. of the Rose.

milk-abscess (milk'ab'ses), n. An abscess of the female breast arising during lactation.

milk-and-water (milk'and-wá'tér), a. Insipid, like milk diluted with water; hence, weak; characterless; wishy-washy. [Colloq.]

What ails a veteran may well lay a milk-and-water bourgeois low.
C. Roade, Cloister and Hearth, xxvi.

milk-blotch (milk'bloch), n. An eruption of numerous minute vesicles on a red surface, on the faces of infants, in some cases extending to the neck and breast. The vesicles break, and discharge a viscid fluid, which becomes incrustated in yellowish or greenish scabs, forming, as they extend, a kind of mask. It is a form of vesicular eczema. Also called milk-crust or milk-scab.

milk-can (milk'kan), n. A large can for carrying milk to market or to customers.

milk-car (milk'kär), n. A special form of box freight-car with end platforms and passenger-car springs, used for the transportation of milk in cans. [U. S.]

milk-cooler (milk'kö'lér), n. An apparatus for cooling fresh milk by means of ice or cold water.

milk-crust (milk'krust), n. Same as milk-blotch.

milk-cure (milk'kür), n. A system of medical treatment by means of a diet of milk.

milk-dame (milk'däm), n. A wet-nurse; a foster-mother.

Then her owne mylkdame in byrth soyl was breathles abyding.
Stanburth, Æneid, iv. 681.

milk-dentition (milk'den-tish'ön), n. See dentition.

milk-duct (milk'dukt), n. The duct, or any one of several ducts, which conveys milk from the place of its secretion in the mammary gland through the nipple to the exterior; a galactophorous duct.

milken (mil'kn), a. [< ME. milken (†), *< AS. mylcan, milcan, of milk, < meolc, milk: see milk, n., and *-en*².] 1. Consisting of milk. [Rare.]

The remedies are to be proposed from a constant course of the Milken diet.
Sir W. Temple.

2. Milky; resembling milk.

She having with a pretty paleness, which did leave milken lines upon her rosy cheeks, paid a little duty to human fear.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iv.

milken-way (mil'kn-wä), n. Same as Milky Way.

I said thine eyes were stars, thy breasts the milken-way.
Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 564).

milker (mil'kér), n. 1. One who milks.

His kine, with swelling udders, ready stand,
And, lowing for the pail, invite the milker's hand.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, II. 764.

2. An apparatus for milking cows mechanically.—3. A cow or other animal that gives milk: usually with a qualifying term. [Colloq.]

Inferior cows will require to be weeded out, and the utmost attention must be paid to breeding good milkers.
Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 323.

milk-factory (milk'fak'tô-ri), n. See the quotation.

Factories, as explained by Canon Bagot, in a paper read at the recent Dairy Conference in Ireland, are of three kinds, distinguished by him as milk factories, creameries, and butter factories. In the milk factories, which are becoming common in the south of Ireland, the whole milk is purchased from the farmers, the price paid lately being 4d. to 4½d. a gallon, and the separated milk, after the cream has been extracted by the mechanical cream separator, is taken back by the farmers, at 1d. to 2d. a gallon, for the feeding of pigs.
Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 306.

milk-fat, n. See milk-fat.

milk-fever (milk'fê'vër), n. A name applied to light feverish attacks coming on shortly after childbirth, and coinciding more or less with the beginning of lactation.

milk-fish (milk'fish), n. A clupeoid fish, Chanos salmonesus. See Chanos.

milkful (milk'fûl), a. [< milk, n., + -ful.] Abounding or overflowing with milk; fertile; fruitful.

O Milk-full Vales, with hundred Brooks indented.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Decay.

milk-glass (milk'gläs), n. Same as cryolite glass (which see, under cryolite).

milk-globule (milk'glob'ül), n. One of the numerous small highly refractive oil-globules floating in the milk-plasma. The white color and opacity of milk are due to the milk-globules, which reflect the light. They consist of fat or butter, surrounded by a very thin envelop of casein.

milk-hedge (milk'hej), n. A shrub or small tree, Euphorbia Tirucalli, native in Africa, and naturalized in parts of India. Its branches densely, is perennially green, and is much used for hedges. Its wood, which is very hard, and durable when not exposed to wet, is valuable for gunpowder-charcoal. Its milky juice is an Indian specific for syphilis.

milk-house (milk'hous), n. A dairy.

Who would not thinke it a ridiculous thing to see a lady in her milk-house with a velvet gown?

Pattenham, Arts of Eng. Poetic, III. 24.
milkily (mil'ki-li), adv. With a milky appearance; after the manner of milk.

milkiness (mil'ki-nes), n. 1. The state of being milky, or of resembling milk in quality or appearance.

All nebulae naturally seemed to him (Herschel) to be but stellar clusters, so distant as to cause the individual stars to disappear in a general milkiness or nebulousity.

Newcomb and Holden, Astron., p. 468.

Hence—2. Blandness; mildness; softness.

Would I could share the balmy, even temper,
And milkiness of blood.
Dryden, Cleomenes, I. 1.

My new companion poured out his complaints in no milkiness of mood.
T. C. Griffin.

milking (mil'king), n. [Verbal n. of milk, v.]

1. The act of drawing milk.—2. The milk so obtained at one time.—3. In racing slang, the keeping of a horse a favorite, at short odds, for a race in which he has no chance, or from which he is to be withdrawn, with the object of betting against him. Krik's Guide to the Turf.

milking-stool (mil'king-stöl), n. A stool used to sit on while milking a cow. The stool in common use has three legs. In Switzerland one is used consisting of a disk which can be strapped to the person, with a sharpened or pointed prop about a foot long.

milking-time (mil'king-tim), n. The time of day, especially about sunset, at which cows or other milch animals are usually milked.

I think it is now about milking-time; and yonder they be at it.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 170.

milking-tube (mil'king-tüb), n. A perforated tube of silver which is inserted in the milk-duct of a cow's teat, to overcome the muscular contraction, and thus facilitate the flow of milk.

milk-kinship (milk'kin'ship), n. The kinship arising from adoption or fostering.

We find among the Arabs a feeling about milk-kinship so well established that Mohammed's law of forbidden degrees gives it all the effects of blood-relationship as a bar to marriage. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p. 149.

milk-ky (milk'ki'), n. pl. Milch cows. [Scotch.]

And I'll gi' thee ane o' my best milk-ky,
To maintain thy wife and children three.

Dick o' the Cow (Child's Ballads, VI. 78).

milk-leg (milk'leg), n. Same as phlegmasia dolens. See phlegmasia.

milkless (milk'les), a. [< milk, n., + -less.] Without milk; specifically, in bot., not supplied with or producing milk, a character of high importance in agaricaceous fungi.

Gills [of Russula] nearly equal, milkless, rigid, brittle, with an acute edge.
Cooke, Handbook of Brit. Fungi, p. 217.

milk-livered (milk'liv'ërd), a. Timid; cowardly; white-livered.

Milk-liver'd man,
That bear'st a cheek for blows, a head for wrongs.
Shak., Lear, iv. 2. 50.

Shall I now, lyke a castaway milkmadget,
On mye woers formoure be fawning?
Stanburth, Æneid, iv. 572. (Davies.)

milkmaid (milk'mäd), n. A woman who milks cows or is employed in a dairy.

The milkmaid singeth blithe.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 66.

milkman (milk'man), n.; pl. milkmen (-men). A man who sells milk; especially, one who goes from door to door serving milk to families.

milk-meat (milk'mët), n. Food consisting of or made with milk, as cheese, butter, etc.

The help which fasting does to prayer cannot be served by changing flesh into fish, or milk-meats into dry diet.
Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, iv. 5.

Abstaining from flesh and milk-meats on Friday.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloques of Erasmus, p. 274.

milk-mirror (milk'mir'gr), n. Certain marks on the udder and perineum of the cow, consisting of spots and lines on which the hair grows upward (the hair on other parts growing downward), supposed to indicate, by their form, size, and direction, the characters of the cow as regards both the quantity and the quality of her milk.

milk-mite (milk'mit), n. See cheese-mite.

milk-molar (milk'mö'lär), n. One of the grinders or back teeth of the milk-dentition.

corresponding to and replaced by a premolar of the permanent dentition.

milk-nurse (milk'nērs), n. A wet-nurse.

My mither was a gude milk-nurse,
And a gude nourice was she.
Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 396).

milk-pail (milk'pāl), n. A pail for holding milk; specifically, the wooden or tin vessel commonly used in milking.

Very fractious, and apt to kick over the milk-pail.
Quarterly Rev., CLXV. 149.

milk-pan (milk'pan), n. A large shallow pan in which milk is kept to allow the cream to rise.

milk-pap (milk'pap), n. A teat or nipple. [Rare.]

Let not the virgin's cheek
Make soft thy trenchant sword; for those milk paps,
That through the window-bars bore at men's eyes,
Are not within the leaf of pity writ.
Shak., T. of A., IV. 3. 115.

milk-parsley (milk'pārs'li), n. A European umbelliferous plant, Peucedanum palustre, abounding with an acrid milky juice; also, Selinum caruifolium of the same family, sometimes distinguished as caraway-leaved milk-parsley.

milk-pea (milk'pē), n. See Galactia, 2.

milk-plasma (milk'plaz'mā), n. A clear slightly opalescent fluid obtained by filtering milk through clay filters or membranes.

milk-porridge (milk'por'ij), n. Porridge made with milk instead of water.

milk-pump (milk'pump), n. An instrument for drawing milk from the breasts; a breast-pump.

milk-punch (milk'punch'), n. A drink made of milk, spirits (usually brandy, rum, or whisky), sugar, and nutmeg.

"I don't know," replied Mr. Pickwick, with equal carelessness; "it smells, I think, like milk-punch."

Dickens, Pickwick, I.

milk-quartz (milk'kwārtz'), n. A variety of quartz of a milk-white color. Also called milky quartz.

milk-scab (milk'skab), n. Same as milk-blotch.

milk-selet, n. [ME.] A milk-pail.

Multrale, a mylk sele. Nominales MS. (Halliwell.)

milk-shake (milk'shāk'), n. A beverage composed of milk and carbonated water with the addition of a flavoring, mixed by being vigorously shaken up and down by hand or by a small machine. [Recent, U. S.]

milk-sick (milk'sik), a. Infected with milk-sickness. [Colloq.]

Trembles and milk-sickness were generally hard to locate by strangers in the particular "settlement," as a "milk-sick farm" was not desirable as a place of residence, and, if known to be such, was rendered almost unsalable.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, V. 9.

milk-sickness (milk'sik'nes), n. A malignant disease, occurring in some parts of the United States, which affects certain kinds of farm stock, and also persons who eat the flesh or dairy products of cattle so infected. The symptoms are vomiting, purging, extreme nervous agitation, etc. From the peculiar tremors that characterize it, it is also called the trembles.

milk-snake (milk'snāk), n. A handsome and harmless serpent, Ophibolus eximius, of the family Colubridæ, common in many parts of the United States. It attains a length of about 3 feet; the coloration is yellowish-gray, with a dorsal series of 50 or more elliptical chocolate black-bordered blotches, and on each side two other alternating series of blotches; the abdomen is yellowish-white with square black blotches. It is also called chicken-snake and thunder-and-lightning snake.

milksop (milk'sop), n. [ME. milksoppe; milksop, n., + sop, n.] 1. A piece of bread sopped in milk. [Rare.]—2. A soft, effeminate, girlish man; one who is devoid of manliness: a term of contempt.

Alas! she seith, that ever I was shape
To wed a milksop or a coward ape.

Chaucer, Prologue to Monk's Tale, l. 22.

'Tis now come to that pass that he is no gentleman, a very milk-sop, a clown, of no bringing up, that will not drink.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 143.

milksopism (milk'sop-izm), n. [milksop + -ism.] The character of a milksop; effeminacy.

Noctes Ambrosianæ, Sept., 1832. [Rare.]

milkstone (milk'stōn), n. A white calcined flint, often found in connection with prehistoric remains. They are supposed to have been repeatedly heated in order to be thrown into water to make it boil, at a time when pottery vessels were not made to resist the action of fire.

milk-sugar (milk'shūg'ār), n. Same as lactose.

milk-tester (milk'tes'tēr), n. A lactometer or lactodensimeter. See tester.

milk-thistle (milk'this'tl), n. A thistle-like plant, Silybum (Carduus) Marianum, native in southern Europe, somewhat cultivated and spontaneous elsewhere. The leaves are variegated with white. Sometimes called lady's-thistle.

milk-thrush (milk'thrush), n. In pathol. See aphtha.

milk-tie (milk'ti), n. Same as milk-kinship.

The strength of the foster-feeling, the milk-tie, among the Scotch Highlanders is a familiar instance of a mode of regarding relationship very different from that prevalent among us.

Str. J. Lubbock, Orig. of Civilisation, p. 145.

milk-tooth (milk'tōth), n. [= D. melktand = G. milchzahn = Sw. mjölk tand = Dan. melketand.] A tooth of the milk-dentition; a temporary or deciduous tooth, which is shed and replaced. A child has 20 milk-teeth.

milk-tree (milk'trē), n. 1. Same as cow-tree (Brosimum galactodendron).—2. A tree of one of several other genera, as Tabernaemontana utilis, of British Guiana.—Jamaica milk-tree, or milk-wood, Pseudomedea spuria.—Madagascar milk-tree, Cerbera Odallam. See Cerbera.

milk-tube (milk'tüb), n. In bot., a laticiferous tube.

milk-vat, milk-fat (milk'vat, -fat), n. [ME. milk-fat*, AS. meolefat (= D. MLG. melkvat = OHG. milichfatz, MHG. milichfatz, G. milchfass = Sw. mjölkfat = Dan. melkefad), a vessel for milk, < meole, milk, + fat, vessel: see *fat*², vat.] A tank or tub into which milk is poured, especially for coagulating with rennet, in the manufacture of cheese.

milk-vessel (milk'ves'el), n. In bot., one of the tubes in which a milky fluid is secreted; a laticiferous vessel.

milk-vech (milk'vech), n. A plant of the genus Astragalus: so called from a belief that these plants increased the secretion of milk in goats feeding upon them.

milk-walk (milk'wāk), n. A round or beat for selling milk; a milkman's route. [Eng.]

"My father had a milk-walk," he said, and when he died I was without money, and had nothing to do.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 435.

milk-warm (milk'wārm), a. Warm as milk as it comes from the breast or udder.

They had baths of cool water for the summer; but in general they used it milk-warm.

Smollett, France and Italy, xxxii. (Davies.)

milkweed (milk'wēd), n. 1. A general name for plants of the genus Asclepias, somewhat especially for A. Cornuti, the most common American species: so called from their milky juice. The bast of A. Cornuti forms a tough textile fiber. The swamp milkweed, A. incarnata, is another common species, with rather handsome flesh-colored flowers. Also called silkworm.

2. A plant of the genus Euphorbia, especially E. corollata, the flowering or blooming spurge. See Euphorbia.—3. In Great Britain: (a) The sow-thistle, Sonchus oleraceus. (b) The milk-parsley, Peucedanum palustre.—Green milkweed, a plant of the genus Acerates and perhaps Asclepiodora, both closely allied to Asclepias.

milk-white (milk'hwit), a. [ME. milkwhit, melkwhit, AS. meolehwit, white as milk, < meole, milk, + hwit, white.] White as milk.

A little western flower,
Before milk-white, now purple with love's wound,
And maidens call it love-in-idleness.

Shak., M. N. D., II. 1. 167.

milk-woman (milk'wūm'an), n. A wet-nurse. [Scotch.]

milkwood (milk'wūd), n. A name of several trees of different genera. (a) The Jamaica milk-tree, Pseudomedea spuria. (b) A West Indian apocynaceous shrub, Rauwolfia canescens, called hoary-leaved milkwood. (c) A very milky euphorbiaceous tree, Sapium Lau-roceranus (var. ellipticum), called Jamaica milkwood.

milkwort (milk'wērt), n. 1. A plant of the genus Polygala, formerly imagined to increase the milk of nurses. In Great Britain the common milkwort is P. vulgaris—also called cross-flower, gang-flower, and procession- and rogation-flower, in allusion to its time of blooming and use.

2. A seaside plant, Glauz maritima, with the same supposed property. Also called sea-milkwort.

milky (mil'ki), a. [milks, n., + -y.] 1. Containing, consisting of, or resembling milk: as, a milky fluid; a milky color.

Some plants, upon breaking their vessels, yield a milky juice.

The pails high foaming with a milky flood.

Pope, Iliad, xvi. 780.

And milkier every milky fall
On winding stream or distant sea.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxv.

2. Yielding milk.

Perhaps my passion he disdains,
And courts the milky mothers of the plains.

Roscommon.

3. Full of milt or spawn, as oysters: a trade use.—4. Soft; mild; timorous; effeminate.

Has friendship such a faint and milky heart,
It turns in less than two nights?

Shak., T. of A., III. 1. 57.

Thy milky meek face makes me sick with hate!

Shelley, The Cenci, II. 1.

Milky quartz. Same as milk-quartz.

milky-tailed (mil'ki-tāld), a. Having milky color on the caudal fin: specific in the phrase milky-tailed shiner, the slender silverfin, Chiola galacturus, a cyprinoid fish abounding in mountain streams of the Ohio valley and southward.

Milky Way (mil'ki wā). [Formerly also milken-way; cf. D. melkweg = G. milchweg = Sw. (rare) mjölkväg = Dan. melkevei.] The Galaxy. See Galaxy, 1.

That Milky Way which down Heav'n's Mountain flows
Its beauteous smoothness to her footsteps owe.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, III. 34.

mill (mil), n. [ME. mille, melle, mulle, mylle, earlier myln, mylne, myln, mylne, AS. mylen, myln = OFries. mole = D. molen, meulen = MLG. mole, molle, L.G. mölen = OHG. mulin, mul, MHG. müle, mül, G. mühle = Icel. mylna = Sw. mölla = Dan. mölle = F. moulin = Sp. molino = Pg. moinho = It. mulino, LL. molina, a mill, orig. fem. of L. molinus, of a mill, < mola, a millstone, pl. mole, a mill (also grains of spelt ground) (= Gr. μύλα, a millstone, mill), < molere, grind, = Goth. malan = Icel. mala = OHG. malan = AS. malan, grind: see malm, *meal*¹, *mold*¹, etc. From the L. mola are also E. *mole*³, *mole*⁴, molar, moline, etc., *mullet*², etc.]

1. A mechanical device for grinding grain for food. Ancient mills, and those still in use in uncivilized or half-civilized countries, are simple devices for rubbing or pounding the grain, commonly two stones, one of which is moved upon the other by hand. The common modern mill consists essentially of two flat circular stones, one of which is moved upon the other, and between which the grain is triturated. The bedstone and runner are together called a run of stones. In some mills the under stone is the runner. Such a mill is called an "under-runner," while an "upper-runner" is one like that shown in the cut. The bush, g, in the bedstone is fastened in its place by wedges.

The balance-rynd, j, is a curved bar which crosses the eye or central opening of the runner on the under side at the margin of the eye and supports the stone. The supporting bearing of the balance-rynd is a central socket called a cock-eye, and the supporting point of the spindle which fits the cockeye is called the cockhead. The spindle, balance-rynd, and runner-stone are raised or lowered by means of the bridge-tree and lighter-screw to adjust the runner properly in relation to the bedstone. The hopper, p, receives the grain to be ground, and delivers it to the shoe, which is loosely supported, and kept constantly vibrating by the rotation of the damsel, a sort of trundle-wheel, the trundles of which chatter against the shoe. Flour is also made by cylinder-mills or roller-mills. The rollers act by crushing, by crushing and rubbing, as when they are caused to run with different peripheral velocities, or by a cutting or scraping action, as when they are serrated and revolved in such manner that the cutting edges of one roller act toward the cutting edges of the other.

Thou combreest bothe foo & frende,
Thi mylle hath grounde thi laste griste.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 74.

Much water goeth by the mill that the miller knoweth not of.

J. Heywood, Proverbs (1546), II. 5.

Two women shall be grinding at the mill. Mat. xiv. 41.

2. A machine for grinding or pulverizing any solid substance. The word in this use is generally in composition with a word denoting the purpose for which the mill is designed: as, paint-mill, quartz-mill, coffee-mill.

One could see by the way he ground the coffee in the mill nailed to the wall that he was reckless of the results.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 294.

3. A machine which transforms raw material by a process other than grinding into forms fit for uses to which the raw material is unfitted. In this use also the word is generally in composition, as a, bedstone; b, runner; c, step or ink; d, bridge-tree; e, eye; f, hoop; g, hopper; h, shoe; i, spout; j, damsel; k, lighter-screw; l, husk.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 294.

3. A machine which transforms raw material by a process other than grinding into forms fit for uses to which the raw material is unfitted. In this use also the word is generally in composition, as saw-mill, planing-mill, etc. This use of the word is, however, limited and arbitrary, many machines which transform raw materials not being called mills.

4. A machine which does its work by rotary motion, especially a lapidary wheel.—5. A treadmill. [Colloq.]

A few weeks after I was grabbed for this, and got a month at the mill; but I was quite innocent of priggling. Quoted in Mayhew's London Labour and London Poor, [I. 360.]

6. (a) A building in which grinding is done: often in composition: as, a flour-mill, water-mill, windmill, etc. (b) In metal, any establishment in which metalliferous ores are treated in the moist way, as by stamping and amalgamating, by grinding in pans, or by similar methods. Those works in which the reduction is performed by the aid of fire are usually designated smelting-works, or sometimes (especially in the case of iron) furnaces. In the manufacture of iron a mill is an establishment where the metal in the rougher form (that is, in that of blooms, slabs, rough bars, etc.) is worked up into various kinds of merchantable iron, or into those forms which are desired by the different classes of consumers of the metal, such as rails, plates, merchant bars, and many other similar products. (c) A large building used as a factory, and occupied by machinery for the purposes of manufacture: as, a silk-mill; a cotton-mill.—7. In calico-printing or bank-note engraving, a soft steel roller which receives under great pressure an impressed design in relief from a hardened steel engraved roll or die, and which is used in turn, after being hardened, to impart the design in intaglio to a calico-printing roll or note-printing plate.—8. [Cf. *mill*¹, v., i.] A snuff-box. Also mill. [Scotch.]

As soon as I can find my mill, Ye've got a snuff w' right guid will.

Picken, Poems, I. 117. (Jamieson.)

He plucked forth a huge horn snuff-box, or mill, as he called it, and proffered me. Scott, Rob Roy, vi.

9. A kind of screw-press introduced during the reign of Elizabeth into England from France, and designed to supersede the manufacture of gold coins by the primitive method of striking dies with a hammer. It was introduced in 1561, discontinued in 1572, reintroduced in 1656 and 1658, and permanently adopted shortly after the restoration of Charles II. The more modern coining-press has supplanted this machine. The mill not only struck the legend, but also raised the rim on the margin and serrated the edge. These serrations were at first straight; but, having been found easy to imitate by filing, they were made curvilinear in the reign of George II.

Coining gold and silver with the mill and press.
Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, II. iii.

10. In mining, a passage or opening left for sending down stuff from the stopes to the level beneath.—11. [*mill*¹, v., 10.] A pugilistic contest; a fight with the fists. [Slang.]

One of the most gratifying mills in the annals of the school.
Dickens, Our School.

Barker's mill, an ingenious machine, moved by the centrifugal force of water, invented by Dr. Barker. It consists of a vertical axis CD, moving on a pivot at D, and carrying the upper millstone m, after passing through an opening in the fixed millstone n. Upon this vertical axis is fixed a vertical tube TT', communicating with a horizontal tube AB, at the extremities of which, A and B, are two apertures in opposite directions. When water from the mill-course MN is introduced into the tube TT', it flows out of the apertures A and B, and by the pressure of the water on the parts of the tube opposite the apertures the arm AB, and consequently the whole machine, is put in motion. The bridge-tree ab is elevated or depressed by turning the nut c at the end of the lever cb. The grain to be ground is poured into the hopper H. As modified by Whitelaw it is used in Great Britain under the name of Scotch turbine. See turbine.—Cannon-ball mill. See cannon-ball.—Chilian mill, a form of mill consisting of two heavy wheels or rollers, set parallel on a horizontal shaft, and having a double rotation, that on the horizontal shaft, and a second around a vertical axis controlling the horizontal shaft. The rollers travel in a vat or other suitable receptacle, and scrapers are usually provided to keep the material in the path of the wheels. This form of mill, which is of much antiquity, is now used especially for grinding oleaginous seeds, nuts, fruits, etc. See arrastre.—Cone-and-cradle mill, a mill having a conical muller or grinder reciprocating in a semi-cylindrical concave or bed. E. H. Knight.—Crooke's mill, an occasional name for Crooke's radiometer (which see, under radiometer).—Edge-runner mill, a mill in which the millstones grind by their peripheral surfaces instead of by their flat surfaces. The stones are generally two in number (though a single one is sometimes used), and run in a circular trough provided with a bottom of stone or of iron. The trough holds the material to be ground. The stones are pivoted to the ends of an axle like cart-wheels, and the axle is attached in the middle to a vertical shaft which rolls the stones around in the trough, Barker's Mill.

thus effecting both a rolling and a rubbing action upon the material to be ground. Such mills are used for grinding flaxseed preparatory to expressing the oil, in iron-foundries for grinding sand and clay, and for other purposes.—Horizontal mill, a mill having the acting surfaces in a horizontal plane at right angles to the vertical axis of the revolving stones, as in a grain-grinding mill.—Hydraulic lapidary, etc., mill. See the adjective.—Levitating mill. See *levigate*¹.—Mouse mill, a combined electromagnetic engine and induction electrical machine used for feeding forward the paper record-ribbon, and for electrifying the ink, in Thomson's siphon-recorder for submarine telegraphy.—Revolving mill, a form of Chilian mill in which the pan turns while the axis of the rollers does not change its position; a revolving-pan mill.—To bring grist to the mill. See grist.—To go through the mill. See go.

mill¹ (mil), v. [*mill*¹, n.] I. trans. 1. To grind in a mill; grind; reduce to fine particles or to small pieces by grinding or other means. See milling.

'Tis here; this oval box well fill'd
With best tobacco, finely mill'd.

Cowper, To the Rev. William Bull.

Raw crops and milled breadstuffs still sought the cheap rates of freight.

G. W. Cable, Creoles of Louisiana, p. 249.

2. To subject to the mechanical operations carried on in a mill, as a saw-mill or planing-mill; shape or finish by machinery. Specifically, in ceram., to prepare (the clay) by passing it through a mill, which is usually of the form of an inverted cone, in the center of which is a vertical shaft set with knives. The clay, being thrown in at the top, is kneaded, cut, and pressed by the revolution of the shaft, and when it emerges from the bottom is plastic and ready for molding. See pug-mill.

Lumbermen charge the consumer for the full measurement of the boards (for floors) before they are milled.

Art Age, IV. 46.

3. To cut (metal) with a milling-tool in a milling-machine.—4. To turn or upset the edge of (a coin) so as to produce a marginal ridge or flange on both sides, upon which, when laid flat, the coin rests, thus protecting the design which is inside of the flange from wear, and enabling the coins to lie firmly when piled together one upon another.—5. To flute the edge of, as of a coin, or of any flat piece of metal, as the head of a milled screw or the rim of a metal box-cover, to afford a hold for the fingers. The screws of optical and surgical instruments, and other philosophical apparatus, and also the covers of lubricators for machinery, are commonly milled.

Wood's halfpence are not milled, and therefore more easily counterfeited. Swift, Drapier's Letters, iii.

6. To tumble (leather) in a hollow revolving cylinder in contact with oil or any ameliorating or tanning liquid, whereby the liquid is worked into all parts of the leather.

Twenty-five sides [of leather] being placed in the wheel at one time and . . . gambler liquor poured over them, . . . in this wheel they are milled for about ten minutes. Davies, Leather, p. 497.

7. To throw, as undyed silk. Encyc. Dict.—8. To thicken by fulling; full (cloth), as in a fulling-mill.—9. To yield, in the process of grinding or milling.—10. To beat severely with the fists; fight. [Slang.]

Having conquer'd the prime one that mill'd us all round,
You kick'd him, old Ben, as he gasp'd on the ground.
Moore, Political and Satirical Poems, Tom Crib to Big Ben.

11. To cause to froth: as, to mill chocolate.—Milled screw. See screw.

II. intrans. 1. To move in a circular direction around a central point or object in a purposeless manner: said of cattle in herding on the plains. [U. S.]

The cattle may begin to run, and then get milling—that is, all crowd together into a mass like a ball, wherein they move round and round, trying to keep their heads towards the center, and refusing to leave it.

T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 862.

2. To turn suddenly and change its course: said of a whale: as, the whale milled, and ran to leeward. C. M. Scammon, Marine Mammals, p. 311.

mill² (mil), n. [L. mille, pl. milia, millia, a thousand. From the L. mille are also ult. E. mile, million, the first element of millennium, milfoil, etc., and the latter part of billion, trillion, etc.] One thousandth part of anything; especially, in the monetary system of the United States, one thousandth of a dollar, or one tenth of a cent.

mill³ (mil), n. [*ME. mil, mylde (cf. AS. mil), OF. mil, meil = Fr. mil, meilh = Sp. millo, mijo = Pg. milho = It. miglio, L. milium, millet. Cf. millet, in form a dim. of *mill*².] Millet.

They make excellent drinke of Rise, of Mill, and of bonie, being well and high coloured like wine.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 96.

mill⁴ (mil), v. t. and i. [Perhaps a particular use of *mill*¹, v.] To steal. [Old slang.]

Can they cant or mill? are they masters in their art?
B. Jonson, Gipsies Metamorphosed.

Millar's asthma. Same as laryngismus stridulus (which see, under laryngismus).

mill-bar (mil' bär), n. Rough bar-iron as drawn out by the puddlers' rolls, as distinguished from merchant bar, which is finished bar-iron ready for sale.

millboard (mil' börd), n. A stout kind of pasteboard especially used by binders for the stiff boards upon which the leather or other material for bindings is pasted or glued.—mill-board cutter, a machine having a shaft bearing adjustable knives, used for cutting millboard and cardboard to the sizes required for bookbinding or boxmaking.

mill-cake (mil' kāk), n. 1. In gunpowder-manuf., the cake or mass resulting from the incorporation of the materials. This cake is subjected to a process of granulation.—2. The by-product from linseed, consisting of what is left after the oil has been pressed out.

mill-cinder (mil' sin' dēr), n. In iron-working, the slag of the puddling- or reheating-furnace. After being properly roasted, it consists essentially of the magnetic oxide of iron, and is used as setting in puddling-furnaces, under the name of bulldog.

mill-dam (mil' dam), n. 1. A dam designed to check the flow of a stream and cause the water to rise until a sufficient head has been obtained to furnish the power necessary for turning a mill-wheel.

The which, once being brust,
Like to great Mill-dam forth fiercely gush't.
Spenser, F. Q., V. xi. 81.

2. A mill-pond. [Scotch.]

milledew, n. An obsolete spelling of mildew.

mill-driver (mil' dri' ver), n. The combination of devices by which is effected the immediate transmission of power from the motor to the runner-millstone of a mill.

milled (mild), p. a. [*Ppr. of mill*¹, v.] 1. Made or prepared in or by a grinding-mill.—2. Having undergone the operations of a mill or coining-press: as, milled money. See milled money, below.

Four mill'd crown pieces (or twenty mill'd shillings of the present coin). Locke, Lowering of Interest.

3. Serrated or transversely grooved.

A small condensing lens, and provided with a milled head whereby it can be rotated. Science, XII. 60.

4. Having been formed or treated by machinery; specifically, in printing, made smooth by calendering rollers in a paper-mill.—Double-milled cloth, cloth which has been twice milled to give increased thickness.—Milled cloth, cloth which has been thickened by beating until it is full or felted.—Milled lead. See *lead*².—Milled money, coins struck in a mill or coining-press, as distinguished from those produced from a die by striking it with a hammer. See hammered money (under *hammer*¹), and compare coining-press. (Milled money was invented by Antoine Brucher in France, and the first was so struck in that country about 1553. Elizabeth of England coined milled money from about 1562 to 1572, when the use of the mill was discontinued, on account of its expense, till about 1665. After 1662 it remained completely established, on account of many advantages which more than compensated for the cost. . . . It seems that they [milled sixpences] were sometimes kept as counters. Nares.)

Millefiori glass. See glass.

millenarian (mil-e-nā' ri-an), a. and n. [Sometimes improp. millennarian; < millenary + -an.] I. a. Relating or pertaining to a thousand, specifically to an expected millennial period of righteousness on earth; chiliastic: as, millenarian speculations.

II. n. One who believes in the millennium; more specifically, one who believes that Christ will visibly reign on earth with his saints for a thousand years or for an indefinite period of time before the end of the world; a chiliast. See millennium.

millenarianism (mil-e-nā' ri-an-izm), n. [Sometimes improp. millennarianism; < millenarian + -ism.] The doctrine of or belief in the coming of the millennium; the doctrine of the reappearance of Christ on earth, the establishment of his kingdom, the resurrection of the saints and of the remaining dead for the general judgment, and an intervening period of a thousand years (or of indefinite length) of perfect righteousness. In the early church the doctrine of millenarianism (chiliasm) was generally held, and many, both of the otherwise orthodox and of heretics, were accused of holding it in a literal or even a gross and sensual sense. Thus, after the fourth century it fell into general disfavor. As A. D. 1000 approached there was a wide-spread panic throughout Europe, under the idea that the prophetic thousand years had expired and that Satan would be let loose. Millenarianism showed itself again in the views of Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchy Men, Millerites, etc. See chiliasm, millennium, premillennialism, postmillennialism.

At various periods in the history of the Middle Ages we encounter sudden outbreaks of millenarianism.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 317.

millenarism (mil'e-nā-rizm), n. [< F. millénarisme; as millénar(y) + -ism.] Millenary doctrine or belief; millenarianism.

millenary (mil'e-nā-ri), a. and n. [= F. millénaire = Sp. milenario = Pg. It. millenario, < L.L. millenarius, containing a thousand, < mileni, a thousand each, < L. mille, a thousand: see mill².] 1. a. Consisting of or pertaining to a thousand, specifically a thousand years; in a restricted sense, of or pertaining to the millennium.

We are apt to dream that God will make his saints reign here as kings in a millenary kingdom.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 827.

For I foretell that millenary year.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., Ded., I. 81.

Millenary petition, a petition presented by about a thousand Puritan ministers to James I. on his progress to London in April, 1603, asking for certain changes in ceremonial, etc.

II. n.; pl. millenaries (-riz). 1. An aggregate of a thousand; specifically, a period of a thousand years; in a restricted sense, the millennium.

Where to fix the beginning of that marvelous millenary, and where to end.

Sp. Hall, Breathings of the Devout Soul, § 15.

2t. A commander or leader of a thousand men.

Likewise the dukes assigne places unto every millenarie, or conductor of a thousand souldiers.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 60.

3t. One who expects the millennium. See millenarian.

The doctrine of the millenaries . . . in the best ages was esteemed no heresy.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 315.

millennial (mi-len'i-āl), a. [< millennium + -al.] Consisting of or relating to a thousand years; pertaining to a millennium, or specifically to the millennium: as, a millennial period; millennial expectations.

To be kings and priests unto God is the characteristic of those that are to enjoy the millennial happiness.

Sp. Burnet.

millennialist (mi-len'i-āl-ist), n. [< millennial + -ist.] One who believes in a millennial reign of Christ on earth; a chiliast.

millennianism (mi-len'i-ān-izm), n. [< "millennian (< millennium + -an) + -ism.] Millenarianism.

At the outset [of Christianity] a crass millennianism clouded the vision of very many.

Prog. Orthodoxy, p. 156.

millenniarism (mi-len'i-ā-rizm), n. [< "millenniar (< millennium + -ar) + -ism.] Millenarianism.

millennist (mil'en-ist), n. [= F. milléniste; as millennium + -ist.] A millenarian.

millennium (mi-len'i-um), n. [= F. millénium = Sp. milenio = Pg. millenio, < NL. millennium, < L. mille, a thousand, + annus, year: see annual.] 1. An aggregate of a thousand years; a period or interval of one thousand years: as, the millennium of the occupation of Iceland celebrated in 1874.

To us nothing seems more unlikely, more inconceivable, than two millenniums of high Egyptian civilisation, . . . while all the rest of the world was sunk in darkness.

G. Rawlinson, Origin of Nations, I. 151.

Specifically—2. In theol., a period during which the kingdom of Christ will be established upon the earth and will predominate over all other authority. The phrase "a thousand years," in Rev. xx. 1-6, has been understood literally, or (on the principle that in Scripture prophesies a day stands for a year, and the Jewish year contained 360 days) as representing 360,000 years. It is generally regarded as indicating an indefinite but long period, and belief in such a period is universal in the Christian church. But whether this predominance of the kingdom of Christ will be accomplished gradually by the gospel, and will precede Christ's second coming, or will follow his second coming and be accomplished by it, is disputed. This question divides theologians into two schools, the postmillenarians, who hold the former view, and the premillenarians, who hold the latter; while many hold that the millennium represents the gospel dispensation or reign of the church, and has accordingly already prevailed for many centuries.

milleped, milliped (mil'e-ped, mil'i-ped), n. [= F. millepieds = Sp. milpieds = Pg. millepedes = It. millepiedi, < L. millepeda, < mille, thousand, + pes (ped-) = E. foot.] 1. A thousand-legs; a myriapod of the suborder Chilognatha or Diplopoda: so called from the very numerous feet, though these are not nearly a thousand in number. The feet are about twice as numerous as those of the similar creatures called centipeds, there being two pairs instead of one pair to most of the segments; the legs are also shorter, and the body is harder and more cylindrical. Millepeds are found in water, and in wet or damp places beneath logs, stones, etc. Unlike some of the centipeds, all are quite harmless animals. Some of the commonest belong to the family Julidae, as Julus sabulosus. The tufted millepeds are Polydesmidae; the false millepeds, Polydesmidae. All millepeds belong to the family Glomeridae; they are comparatively short and stout, and can roll themselves up into a ball, like the wood-louse of the genus Armadillo. See Chilognatha, and cuts under Myriapoda and thousand-legs.

2. Some small crustacean with many legs, as an isopodous slater; a wood-louse.

Also millepede, millipede.

Millepora (mi-lep'ō-rā), n. [NL.: see millepore.] The typical genus of the family Milleporidae, so called from the numerous pores upon the surface.

Millepora alcyonaria.

millepore (mil'e-pōr), n. [= F. millepore = Sp. milépore = It. millepora, < NL. Millepora, < L. mille, a thousand, + porus, a passage: see pore.] A coralline hydrozoan of the family Milleporidae. The millepores were long supposed to be corals, and such is their appearance and the part they play in the formation of reefs. They belong, however, to a different class of animals, the Hydrozoa (not Actinozoa), being among the few members of their class which form a hard calcareous polypary or polypidom like the stone-corals, and the leading representatives of the order called Hydrocorallina (which see). The incrusting substance forms a dense deposit upon the outer surface of the ramified hydrozoome. There are two kinds of zooids or polypites: short broad alimentary zooids (gastrozooids) with 4 or 6 tentacles, surrounded each by a zone of from 5 to 20 or more long mouthless zooids (dactylozooids) with numerous tentacles, having no ampullae. The zooids are dilated at their bases, and there give off tubular processes which ramify and inoculate, giving rise to a thin hydrozoome.

Milleporidae (mil'e-pōr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Millepora + -idae.] A family of hydrocoralline hydrozoans, typified by the genus Millepora. See millepore and Hydrocorallina.

milleporiform (mil'e-pōr'i-fōrm), a. [< NL. Millepora + L. forma, form.] Having the form or appearance of a millepore; milleporine.

Milleporina (mi-lep'ō-rī-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Millepora + -ina.] Same as Milleporidae.

milleporine (mil'e-pō-rin), a. Pertaining to the Milleporidae, or having their characters; resembling a millepore; milleporiform.

milleporite (mil'e-pōr-it), n. [< millepore + -ite.] A fossil millepore.

miller (mil'ēr), n. [< ME. miller, meller, millere, melle, earlier mylnere, mylnere, milnere (a form remaining in the surname Milner), < AS. "mylnere (not recorded; another term was mylnweard, 'mill-ward') = OS. muleniri = Fries. meller = D. mulder, molenaar = MLG. molner, molre, muller = OHG. mulinari, MHG. mülner, mülner, G. müller (as a surname also Müller) = Icel. mylnari = Sw. mjölnare = Dan. møller, < LL. molinarius, a miller, < molina, a mill: see mill.] 1. One who grinds grain in a mill; one who keeps or who attends to a mill, especially a grain-mill.

More water gildeth by the mill
Than wots the miller of.

Shak., Tit. And., II. 1. 87.

2. A milling-machine.—3. A moth whose wings appear as if dusted over with flour or meal, like a miller's clothes; hence, almost any small moth, such as fly about lights at night. Common millers in the United States are Spilosoma virginica, a moth whose larva is one of the woolly-bear caterpillars, and Hyphantria cunea, the web-worm moth. The little yellowish moths of the genera Crambus and Botis are also commonly called millers. See cuts under Crambidae and Hyphantria.

4. A fish, the eagle-ray, Myliobatis aquila, a mill-skate.—5. The hen-harrier, Circus cyaneus. [Prov. Eng.]—6. A young flycatcher. C. Swainson, Brit. Birds, 1885, p. 49. [Local, Eng.]—Cross miller. See cross, n.

millering (mil'ēr-ing), n. [< miller + -ing.] The dust of a flour-mill.

And she would meal you with millering
That she gathers at the mill.
Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 273).

Millerism (mil'ēr-izm), n. [< Miller (see Millerite) + -ism.] The doctrines of the Millerites.

Millerite¹ (mil'ēr-it), n. [< Miller (see def.) + -ite.] A disciple of the American William Miller, who from 1833 till his death in 1849 publicly interpreted the Scriptures as fixing the second advent of Christ and the beginning of the millennium in the immediate future (at first about 1843). His followers form a still existing denomination of Adventists.

millerite² (mil'ēr-it), n. [Named after W. H. Miller (died 1880), an English crystallographer.] Native nickel sulphid, a mineral having a bronze color and metallic luster, often occurring in tufts of capillary crystals, and hence called hair-pyrites, capillary pyrites. It is found also in incrustations with fibrous or radiated structure; in the latter form it is a valuable nickel ore.

miller's-coat (mil'ēr-z-kōt), n. A coat of fence in use in the sixteenth century, apparently a buff-coat or similar defense of leather.

miller's-dog (mil'ēr-z-dog), n. A kind of shark or dogfish, Galeus canis.

miller's-thumb (mil'ēr-z-thum), n. 1. A fish, Cottus gobio, of the family Cottidae. The name is due to the fancied resemblance of the head to the form a Miller's-thumb (Cottus gobio).

miller's thumb is popularly supposed to assume from the frequent sampling of meal with the hand.

2. Any fresh-water sculpin of the genus Uranidea; one of the little star-gazers, of which there are several species, as U. richardsoni.

[U. S.].—3. The bib (a fish), Gadus luscus. [Great Britain.].—4. The golden-crested wren, Regulus cristatus; the thumb-bird. [Eng.].

5. The willow-warbler, Phylloscopus trochilus.

millesimal (mi-les'i-mal), a. [= F. millesimo = Sp. milésimo = Pg. It. millesimo, < L. millesimus, the thousandth, < mille, a thousand: see mill².] Thousandth; consisting of thousandth parts: as, millesimal fractions.

millet (mil'et), n. [< F. millet, millet, dim. of mil, millet: see mill².] 1. A cereal grass, Panicum miliaceum, known from antiquity, and still cultivated in the East and in southern and central Europe. It is an annual, from 2 to 4 feet high, with profuse foliage, the flowers abundant, in open nodding panicles. The grain is one of the best for fowls, and affords a nutritious and palatable table-food. As cultivated in the United States, it is mostly used for fodder, and elsewhere it is less sowed than formerly.

2. One of several other grasses: generally with a prefixed descriptive. See below.—Arabian or evergreen millet, a variety of Indian millet. [Local, U. S.].—Cat-tail, East Indian, Egyptian, pearl millet, in the southern United States, a tall grass, Pennisetum spicatum, there cultivated as a forage-plant. In India it serves as a cereal.—German, Hungarian millet. See Italian millet.—Indian millet, African millet, a stout cereal grass commonly known as Sorghum vulgare, but now regarded as part of a multiform species, Andropogon Sorghum, which includes among its varieties the common broom-corn and sorghum. It is extensively cultivated in the Mediterranean region and the Orient, occupying the place of a staple grain. The seed properly treated makes a bread of good quality, and is a good grain for quadrupeds and fowls. The plant serves also for green fodder. This is the durra or dours of Africa and India. It has been introduced to some extent into the United States, where it is sometimes called coffee or chocolate-corn, because of its attempted use as a substitute for coffee. Also called guinea-corn, kafir-corn.—Italian millet, Setaria Italica, originally an Asiatic grass: its variety Germanica is known as German or Hungarian millet and Bengal or Hungarian grass. (See grass.) Its seeds are suited to cage-birds and fowls, and it is to some extent used as a food-grain; in America it is raised mostly for forage.—Millet coda or khoda, the grain of Paspalum scrobiculatum, an East Indian cereal.

millet-grass (mil'et-grās), n. See Milium.

mill-eye (mil'i), n. The eye or opening in the cases of a mill at which the meal is let out.

A noble and seemly baron's mill, . . . that casts the meal through the mill-eye by forpits at a time.

Scott, Pirate, xi.

mill-feeder (mil'fē-dēr), n. A projection on a mill-spindle which agitates a spout beneath the hopper, thus shaking the grain into the eye of the runner.

mill-file (mil'fil), n. A thin flat file used in machine-shops for lathe-work and draw-filing.

E. H. Knight.

mill-furnace (mil'fēr-nās), n. In iron-works, a furnace in which the puddled bar, or the higher grades of malleable iron, are reheated in order to be rerolled or welded under the hammer or mill-rolls.

mill-hand (mil'hand), n. A person employed in a mill.

mill-head (mil'hed), n. The head of water by which a mill-wheel is turned.

mill-holm (mil'höm), n. A low meadow or field in the vicinity of a mill, or a marshy place about a mill-dam.

mill-hopper (mil'höp'er), n. In a grinding-mill, a hopper from which grain is supplied to the stones.—Mill-hopper alarm an automatic device for giving notice to the miller, usually by a bell, when the grain in the hopper is nearly exhausted.

mill-horse (mil'hörs), n. A horse (often blind) used to turn a mill.

'Tis a dull thing to travel, like a mill-horse.

Still in the place he was born in, lam'd and blinded.

Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, ll. 4.

milli- [L. mille, millia, milia, a thousand: see million.] An element meaning 'thousand,' also used for 'a thousandth part,' especially in words relating to physics: as, millimeter (the thousandth part of a meter).

milliampere (mil'i-äm-pär'), n. [L. mille, a thousand (see milli-), + E. ampere.] An electrical unit equal to the thousandth part of an ampere.

milliard (mil'iärd), n. [F. milliard, < mille (< L. mille, thousand) + -ard.] A thousand millions: as, a milliard of francs. This word became familiar in English through the payment by France to Germany, after the close of the war of 1870-1, of an indemnity of five milliards of francs (about $1,000,000,000).

milliare¹ (mil-i-ä'rë), n. [L. < mille, a thousand: see milli-.] An ancient unit of length, 8 stadia; a mile.

milliare² (mil'i-är), n. [F. milliare, < L. mille, a thousand (see milli-), + F. are, an are: see *are*².] A unit of surface in the metric system, the one thousandth part of an are, equivalent to 154.07 square inches.

milliary (mil'i-ä-ri), a. and n. [= F. milliaire, < L. milliarius, milliarius, containing a thousand, neut. milliarium, miliarium, the number one thousand, a milestone, < mille, pl. milia, a thousand: see *mill*², mile.] I. a. Pertaining to the ancient Roman mile of a thousand paces or five thousand Roman feet; marking a mile.

Before this was once placed a milliary column, supposed to be set in the center of the city.

Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 4, 1644.

II. n. A milestone; specifically, a stone or column set up to form a point of departure in measuring distances.

When we approached Sidon, I saw, about a mile from the town, an ancient Roman milliary in the road; . . . it is a round pillar of grey granite.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. 85.

millier (mël-yä'), n. [F. < L. mille, a thousand: see milli-.] In the metric system, a weight equal to a thousand kilograms, or 2,205 pounds avoirdupois (nearly a ton). It is the weight of one cubic meter of water at 4° C.

millifold¹ (mil'i-fold), a. [L. mille, a thousand, + E. -fold.] Thousandfold.

His kisses millifold

Bewray his love and louing diligence.

Davies, Holy Roode, p. 27. (Davies.)

milligram, milligramme (mil'i-gram), n. [= It. milligramma, < F. milligramme, < mille, a thousand (see milli-), + gramme, a gram: see *gram*².] The thousandth part of a gram, equal to 0.015432, or about $\frac{1}{65}$, of a grain.

milliliter, millilitre (mil'i-lë-tër), n. [= It. millilitro, < F. millilitre, < mille, a thousand (see milli-), + litre, a liter: see *liter*².] A French measure of capacity containing the thousandth part of a liter, equal to 0.06102 of a cubic inch.

millimeter, millimetre (mil'i-më-tër), n. [= It. millimetro, < F. millimètre, < mille, a thousand (see milli-), + F. mètre, meter: see *meter*³.] The thousandth part of a meter, equal to 0.03937 inch, or nearly $\frac{1}{25}$ inch. It is denoted by mm.: as, 25.4 mm. is 1 inch.

milliner (mil'i-nër), n. [Formerly also millaner, millener, millenier; prob. orig. Milaner, a trader from or with Milan (formerly spelled Milaine, Milayne, etc.) in Italy, famous for its silks and ribbons, as well as for its cutlery; < Milan + *-er*¹. Cf. Milanese. The term mantua-maker, usually cited in this connection, has no relevancy, not being connected with Mantua in Italy. The word milliner was formerly explained as designating "one having a thousand small wares to sell" (Minshew), as if < L. mille- narius, containing a thousand, < mille, a thousand: see millenary.] 1. Formerly, a man who dealt in articles for women's wear; according to Johnson, "one who sells ribbands and dresses for women"; now, in common usage, a woman who makes and sells bonnets and other head-gear for women; also, in England, one who furnishes both bonnets and dresses, or complete outfits.

No Milliner can so fit his customers with Gloves.

Shak., W. T. (folio 1623), iv. 4. 192.

To conceal such real ornaments as these, and shadow their glory, as a milliner's wife does her wrought stomacher with a smoky lawn or a black cyprus!

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour (ed. Whalley, 1756), l. 3.

2^d. Formerly, one who made or sold armor of Milan; hence, a dealer in armor.

After the year 1500 there were great shops, where armour was sold by the milliners, or armourers of Milan, and by others; and whole suits of armour are frequently found exactly like each other, as they were made for sale to the first comer, and not for any person in particular.

R. Curzon, Archæol. Inst. Jour., XXII. 6.

Milliner's fold, a strip of velvet, silk, or the like, folded near both edges, and then again so as to bring one of the two original folds above the other.—Milliner's needle, a long slender needle used in trimming bonnets, etc.

millinery (mil'i-nër-i), n. [< milliner + *-y*³.]

1. The articles made or sold by a milliner.—2. The industry of making bonnets and other head-dresses for women. This work was formerly in the hands of men, but is now almost exclusively a women's occupation.

Those who are cunning in the arts of millinery and dressmaking.

Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, xvii.

millinet (mil'i-net), n. [Irreg. < millin(er) + -et.] 1. A sort of coarse, stiff, thin muslin.—

2. A machine-made net. E. H. Knight.

milling (mil'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *mill*¹, v.]

1. The process of grinding, or subjecting materials to the action of the machinery of a grinding-mill. Specifically—2. The manufacture of cereals into flour or meal. The manufacture of fine flour is now carried on by two distinct methods, respectively called low milling and high milling. Low milling prevailed almost universally until a recent period; but it is now largely superseded by high milling, by which an increased product and a much purer quality of flour are obtainable, especially from wheat inferior to the higher grades. In low milling the grain is ground only once and then bolted. In high milling it is subjected to repeated grindings. The earlier grinding or grindings decorticate the grain, which, being subjected after each grinding to screening and blowing in the middlings purifier, is freed from adherent impurities, and from parts which envelop the finer nutritious portions. The latter thus cleaned are called semolina (half-ground). The semolina is then subjected to grinding, cylinder-milling, or disintegration milling, to complete its conversion into fine flour. Cylinder-milling, also called roller-milling, is the manufacture of flour by the use of cylinder-mills. Disintegration milling is the manufacture of flour or meal by the use of the disintegrator. See *mill*¹.

3. The operation of upsetting the edge of a coin-blank to form the milled edge; also, the operation of putting the series of small transverse ridges and furrows on the edge of an otherwise finished coin, or on a screw-head to adapt it for easy turning with the fingers. See milled screw, under screw.—4. A method of shaping metals in a milling-machine, by passing the metal under a serrated revolving cylinder or cutter.—5. In metal-working, a method of ornamenting metallic surfaces by treatment in a lathe with ribbed tools, which produce ridged surfaces.—6. A method of softening and opening the pores of hides by placing them with some tan-liquor in a wooden drum which is caused to revolve.—7. The felting or fulling of a cloth to thicken it.

The term milling embraces all those operations which are calculated to effect the felting of the woolen fibres in the fabric by means of pressure or friction.

Benedikt, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 54.

8. In pottery, the operation of grinding and mixing the slip.—9. A thrashing; a fight; a beating. [Slang.]

One blood gives t'other blood a milling.

W. Combe, Dr. Syntax, II. 2.

I determined to box it out with destiny, and put myself in a Cribb-like attitude for a milling-match with my fortunes.

Mrs. Gore, Cecil, p. 158.

10. The act of playing around in a circle: said of a school of fish. Also called cart-wheeling.—High milling, in four-manuf., a method of milling in which the wheat is subjected to a succession of slight partial crushing operations, the product being sifted and sorted after each operation.—Low milling, the older process of close grinding with the stones as near together as possible, as opposed to the more modern high milling.

milling-cutter (mil'ing-kut'ër), n. Same as milling-machine.

milling-machine (mil'ing-mä-shën'), n. 1. A power machine-tool for shaping metal and cutting the teeth of gears by means of a rotating serrated spindle or cylindrical cutter. It has a movable table, to which the work is fixed and on which it is brought to the cutter; and it is fitted with index-plates and other appliances for securing accuracy in the work.

The position occupied by the milling-machine in modern practical mechanics is almost as important as that occupied by the lathe or planing-machine.

Joshua Rose, Practical Machinist, p. 338.

2. A machine for impressing on coins a milled edge or legend corresponding to the milling.

Millingtonia (mil-ing-tö'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Carl Linné, filius, 1781), named after Thomas Millington, a professor at Oxford.] A genus of bignonaceous trees, with corky bark, opposite, 2- to 3-pinnate leaves, and handsome white flowers, the corolla-tube often 2 to 3 inches long, disposed in corymbs at the ends of the branches. There is but one species, M. hortensis, the East Indian cork-tree, the exact original habitat of which is not known, but which has been cultivated in India from the earliest records. See cork-tree.

milling-tool (mil'ing-töl), n. A small indented roller used to mill or nurl the edges of the heads of screws; a nurling-tool.

million¹ (mil'yön), n. and a. [ME. millioun, million = D. milloen, miljoen = G. Sw. Dan. million, < OF. (and F.) million = Pr. milio = Sp. millon = Pg. milhão = It. milione, millione (> ML. millio(n-)), a million, aug. of mille, < L. mille, a thousand: see milli-.] I. n. 1. The number of ten hundred thousand, or a thousand thousand.

Coueyte not his goodes

For millions of moneye; morther hem vchone.

Piers Plowman (A), iii. 255.

O, pardon! since a crooked figure may

Attest in little place a million.

Shak., Hen. V., Prolog., l. 16.

2. The amount of a thousand thousand units of money, as pounds, dollars, or francs: as, he is worth a million; millions have been wasted in preparation for war.—3. A very great number or quantity, indefinitely.

For we are at the stake,

And bay'd about with many enemies;

And some that smile have in their hearts, I fear,

Millions of mischief. Shak., J. C., iv. 1. 51.

There are millions of truths that men are not concerned to know.

Locke.

The million, the great body of the people; the multitude; the public; the masses.

For the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviare to the general.

Shak., Hamlet, II. 2. 457.

Three-million bill, in U. S. hist., a bill passed in 1847 appropriating three million dollars for the purchase of land from Mexico. It was introduced in the House of Representatives with the Wilmot Proviso (see proviso) as a rider, and passed by the Senate after rejection of the rider.

II. a. [Strictly a collective noun: see hundred.] A thousand times one thousand; ten hundred thousand: as, a capital of a (or one) million dollars; a country of ten million inhabitants.

million² (mil'yön), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of *million*¹.

millionaire, millionnaire (mil-yön-är'), n. [= D. G. millionair = Sw. millionär = Dan. millionær; < F. millionnaire (= Sp. millonario, millonario = Pg. It. millionario), one who owns a million, < million, a million: see *million*¹.] A man worth a million dollars, pounds, francs, etc.; an owner of a million or of millions.

The plain unaccepted king, the man of gold,

The thrice illustrious threefold millionaire,

Mark his slow-creeping, dead, metallic stare.

O. W. Holmes, The Banker's Dinner.

millionary (mil'yön-ä-ri), a. [= F. millionnaire; as *million*¹ + -ary.] Pertaining to or consisting of millions: as, the millionary chronology of the Pundits. Imp. Dict.

millioned (mil'yönd), a. [*< million*¹ + *-ed*².] 1. Multiplied by millions. [Rare.]

Time, whose million'd accidents

Creep in 'twixt vows and change decrees of kings.

Shak., Sonnets, cxv.

2. Having millions.

The million'd merchant seeks her in his gold.

P. Whitehead, Honour, a Satire.

millionism (mil'yön-izm), n. [*< million*¹ + -ism.] The state or condition of having millions.

Billionism or even millionism must be a blessed kind of state.

O. W. Holmes, Elsie Venner, vii.

millionist (mil'yön-ist), n. [*< million*¹ + -ist.] A millionaire.

A commercial millionist. Southey, Doctor, cccxxviii.

millionize (mil'yön-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. millionized, ppr. millionizing. [*< million*¹ + -ize.] To accustom to millions. Davies.

To our now millionized conceptions the foregoing accounts appear to be in a very moderate ratio.

Archæologia, XXXIII. 201.

millionaire, n. See millionaire.

millionth (mil'yonth), a. and n. [< million¹ + -th³.] I. a. Ten hundred thousandth; being one of a million.

II. n. One of a million parts; the quotient of unity divided by a million; a ten hundred thousandth part.

milled, n. See milled.

milled (mil'i-pēd), n. Same as milled.

millistere (mil'i-stār), n. [< F. millistère, < L. mille, a thousand (see milli-), + F. stère, a stère.] In the metric system, a unit of dry measure, the one thousandth part of a stère, equivalent to 1 cubic decimeter or 61.023 cubic inches. It is not in practical use.

millivolt (mil'i-vōlt), n. [< L. mille, a thousand, + E. volt.] The thousandth part of a volt.

mill-jade (mil'jād), n. A mill-horse.

Would you have me stalk like a mill-jade,
All day, for one that will not yield us grains?
B. Jonson, Alchemist, III. 2.

millman (mil'man), n.; pl. millmen (-men). One who is employed in a mill.

The millmen are also unable to work with their usual vigour.
The Engineer, LXV. 535.

mill-money (mil'mun'i), n. Milled or coined money.

What should you,
Or any old man, do, wearing away
In this world with diseases, and desire
Only to live to make their children scourge-sticks,
And hoard up mill-money? Beau. and Fl., Captain, I. 3.

mill-mountain (mil'moun'tān), n. A European flax, Linum catharticum.

millocrat (mil'ō-krat), n. [< milli + -o-crat as in aristocrat, etc.] A wealthy mill-owner; a manufacturer who has a wide influence from his wealth or the number of people in his employment. [Rare.]

The true blood-suckers, the venomous millocrats.
Bulwer, Cartons, II. 4. (Davies.)

millocratism (mil'ō-krat-izm), n. [< millocrat + -ism.] The rule of millocrats. Bulwer.

millon, n. An obsolete form of *melon*¹.

mill-pick (mil'pik), n. A tool for dressing millstones—that is, giving them a corrugated or otherwise roughened surface. Also called millstone-hammer, millstone-pick.

mill-pond (mil'pond), n. A pond or reservoir of water for use in driving a mill-wheel.

mill-pool (mil'pōl), n. [*< ME. millepol, < AS. mylenpōl, mylenpūl, < mylen, mill, + pōl, pool.] A mill-pond.

mill-post (mil'pōst), n. A stout post bearing some essential relation to a mill, as a post forming the vertical shaft of a windmill, and especially, in some forms of windmill, as the post-mill, the post upon which the entire mill is supported, or a post upon which the cap of a smock-mill, bearing the sails, turns.

They [the trees of New England] are not very thick, yet many of them are sufficient to make Mill-posts; some being three foot and a half in the Diameter.
S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 30.

Out of doors reigned Molly Mills, . . . with her short red petticoat, legs like mill-posts.
Lady Holland, Sydney Smith, VII.

mill-race (mil'rās), n. The current of water that drives a mill-wheel, or the channel in which it flows from the dam to the mill.

millreaf, millreet (mil'rē), n. Obsolete forms of milreis.

mill-ream (mil'rēm), n. A package of hand-made paper containing 480 sheets, of which the two outer quires (48 sheets) are imperfect. A ream of 480 sheets of perfect paper is known as a ream of insides. [Eng.]

mill-rine, n. In her. See fer de moulaine.

mill-rolls (mil'rōlz), n. pl. The rolls employed in bringing puddled bar-iron into suitable shape for the market.

millround (mil'round), n. A monotonous round of labor like that on a treadmill.

How sick he must have been of the eternal millround—seed-time and harvest.
R. Broughton, Cometh up as a Flower, v.

mill-rynd (mil'rind), n. The rynd of a millstone. See rynd, and *mill*¹.

mill-sail (mil'sāl), n. A sail of a windmill. In windmills there are usually four of these sails, of canvas, extended on the sail-frames or "whips," and sometimes provided with reefing devices by which the surfaces exposed to the action of wind can be varied in extent to adapt them to variations in the force of the wind. See windmill and wind-wheel.

mill-scale (mil'skāl), n. An incrustation of a black oxid of iron formed on iron in the process of being rolled, just as forge-scale is on that which is being forged. In the one case it peels off in the rolling; in the other it is thrown off by the blows of the hammer.

mill-sixpence (mil'siks'pens), n. An English silver coin, of the value of sixpence, produced by the mill-and-screw process. See milled money, under milled.

Fal. Pistol, did you pick Master Slender's purse? Sten. Ay, by these gloves, did he, . . . of seven groats in mill-sixpences. Shak., M. W. of W., I. I. 158.

mill-skate (mil'skāt), n. The eagle-ray, Myliobatis aquila.

mill-spindle (mil'spin'dl), n. The vertical shaft or spindle of a grinding-mill, by which the runner or revolving millstone is supported. See *mill*¹, 1.

mill-stank

(mil'stangk), mill, + stān, stone: see mill¹ and stone.] One of a pair of cylindrical stones used in a mill for grinding grain. The kind of stone best adapted for this use is known as burstone, and is found in France and Mill-spindle.

a, spindle; b, bush; c, rynd; d, step, ink,
or tramport; e, bridge-tree; f, lighter-screw;
g, hand-wheel which operates the lighter-screw.

Modes of Dressing Millstones.
a. Radial and circular dress. b. Quarter dress. c. Dress for iron grinding-plate. d. Curved and circular dress.

In Georgia, U. S. The two stones are placed one over the other; and in the operation of grinding one of them remains at rest and is called the bed, while the other, usually the upper stone, revolves and is called the runner. (See *mill*¹, 1.) The face of a millstone is cut with lines or channels called furrows, which lead from the center to the circumference and have flat spaces between them called land. The furrows and land are together called the dress; they are arranged in various ways. A sunken space about the eye of the stone is called the basin.

As don these rokkes or thise mylne stones.
Chaucer, Troilus, II. 1384.

Bolting-millstone. See *bolting*².—Fairy millstone. See fairy.—Lava millstone. See lava.—Millstone-dress, the arrangement of the furrows on the face of a millstone.—To see into or through a millstone, to see with acuteness, or to penetrate into abstruse subjects.

Your eyes are so sharpe that you can not onely look through a millstone, but cleane through the mind.
Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 287.

To weep or drop millstones, to be insensible to emotion; remain hard and stony under or in view of the deepest affliction.

Your eyes drop millstones, when fools' eyes drop tears.
Shak., Rich. III., I. 3. 354.

millstone-balance (mil'stōn-bal'ans), n. A weight so placed as to balance any inequalities of weight in a millstone.

millstone-bridge (mil'stōn-brij), n. The bar crossing the eye of a millstone and supporting it on the head of the spindle; a balance-rynd. E. H. Knight.

millstone-curb (mil'stōn-kērb), n. The covering of the stones used in grinding; a husk or hurst. E. H. Knight.

millstone-dresser (mil'stōn-dres'er), n. 1. A workman whose business is to dress millstones. — 2. A machine for forming millstones, especially for cutting the furrows on the face of a millstone. Such machines range from hand-appliances having pivoted hammers for picking and chipping the stone to large power-machines employing rotary disks and mandrels armed with diamonds or borts, and include a great variety of machines which cause cutters to travel in radial lines over the face of the stones, as well as lathes in which the stone is made to revolve before traversing tool-rests carrying cutting-mandrels in rapid revolution. Smaller machines are portable, and are guided by hand over the stone while the cutting-tool is revolved at a high speed by means of a belt.

millstone-driver (mil'stōn-dri'vēr), n. The device on a millstone-spindle which drives the runner by impinging against its bail.

millstone-feed (mil'stōn-fēd), n. A device by which the quantity of grain fed to a millstone is regulated, as by means of an adjustable gate in the aperture of the hopper.

millstone-grit (mil'stōn-grit), n. A silicious conglomerate rock, so called because it has been worked for millstones in England. It constitutes one of the members of the Carboniferous group, underlying the true coal-measures, and overlying the mountain limestone. In Wales and southwestern England it is known as "farewell rock," because when the miners strike it they bid farewell to profitable seams. The millstone-grit is an important and persistent member of the Carboniferous series both in Europe and in the United States. In parts of England it attains a thickness of over 5,000 feet. Where the series to which this name is given is developed to this extent, however, it contains intercalated beds of shale and clay and even of coal. In Pennsylvania the millstone-grit is sometimes called the Great or Pottsville Conglomerate. At Pottsville, on the eastern edge of the anthracite fields, it is over a thousand feet thick, but it thins very much in going west.

The Fourth Sand-Rock is the well-known No. XII., or the Great Conglomerate. It has its representation in the millstone grit beneath the European coal. It is the floor of the true coal measures, an immense preparatory outspread of sand and pebble-stones of every variety, but chiefly pure white quartz, and of every size, from the minute mustard seed and pepper corn to the hen's egg and in the Susquehanna region even the ostrich egg.

J. P. Lesley, Coal and its Topography, p. 70.

millstone-hammer (mil'stōn-ham'er), n. Same as mill-pick.

millstone-pick (mil'stōn-pik), n. Same as mill-pick.

millstone-ventilator (mil'stōn-ven'ti-lā-tōr), n. A blower and connecting pipes for forcing a blast through the eye of a runner-stone for the purpose of cooling the stones and meal.

mill-tail (mil'tāl), n. The current of water leaving a mill-wheel after turning it, or the channel through which it runs; a tail-race.

The Mill-tail, or Floor for the water below the wheels, is wharfed up on either side with stone.

Defoe, Tour through Great Britain, I. 398. (Davies.)

mill-tooth (mil'tōth), n. A grinder; a molar. mill-ward (mil'wārd), n. [< ME. milward, meleward, < AS. mylenweard, a miller, < mylen, mill, + weard, keeper.] The keeper of a mill.

millweir (mil'wēr), n. [*< ME. *millewere (†), < AS. mylenwer, mylewer (= G. mülwehr), a millweir, < mylen, mill, + wer, a weir: see weir.] See weir.

mill-wheel (mil'hwēl), n. [*< ME. millewehe (†), < AS. mylenhweol, mylenhweowul, a mill-wheel, < mylen, mill, + hweol, hweogul, wheel.] A wheel used to drive a mill; a water-wheel.

mill-work (mil'wērk), n. 1. Machinery used in mills or manufactories. — 2. The designing, construction, arrangement, and erection of machinery in mills or manufactories.

millwright (mil'rit), n. An engineer who designs, constructs, and erects mills, their motors, machinery, and appurtenances, particularly flouring- and grist-mills.—Millwrights' compass. See compass.

millwrighting (mil'ri'ting), n. The work or business of a millwright.

Engineering and millwrighting, though synonymous, are often two distinct branches in a shop.
Engineer, LXVII. 63.

milnet, n. An obsolete form of *mill*¹.

milord (mi-lōrd'), n. [F. milord, formerly also milort (Cotgrave), = Sp. milord (pl. milores), < E. my lord.] A continental rendering of the English my lord.

millray, n. See milreis.

milreis (mil'rēs), n. [Formerly milrea, milray, millera (F. milleret—Cotgrave); < Pg. milreis,

But Fucus, lead by most mimetic apes,
Could not despise don Fuco's antick shapea.
Whiting, Albino and Bellama, p. 9. (Nares.)

Brotherhoods of actors, ambitious of displaying their mimetic faculty to their townfolk.
I. D'Irassé, Amen. of Lit., I. 393.

2. Imitating; imitative. Specifically—(a) In zoöl.
and bot., exhibiting mimicry; characterized by mimicry, as the flowers of certain orchids which resemble butterflies. See mimicry, 3.

In all these cases it appears that the mimetic species is protected from some enemy by its outward similarity to the form which it mimics. H. A. Nicholson.

(b) In mineral., approximating closely to—that is, imitating—other forms of a higher degree of symmetry. This characteristic usually results from twinning. For example, aragonite occurs in twin crystals which at first sight appear to be hexagonal in form. See pseudosymmetry and twin.

mimetic (mī-met'ik-āl), a. [< mimetic + -al.] Same as mimetic.

A dialogue in the old mimetic or poetic form.

Ep. Hurd, Foreign Travel, vii.

mimetically (mī-met'ik-āl-i), adv. In a mimetic manner; imitatively; in the manner of a mime.

Homer . . . wished to express mimetically the rolling, thundering, leaping motion of the stone.

De Quincey, Homer, iii.

mimetism (mim'ē-tizm), n. [< mimet-ic, q. v., + -ism.] Same as mimesis, and mimicry, 3.

mimeticite (mim'ē-tīt), n. [< Gr. μιμητής, an imi-tator (see Mimesis), + -ite².] Native arseniate of lead with chlorid of lead, a mineral of a yellow to brown color occurring in hexagonal prismatic crystals, often rounded. It is isomorphous with pyromorphite, the phosphate of lead. Some varieties, as campylite, contain phosphoric acid, and hence are intermediate between mimeticite and pyromorphite.
Also called mimetisite, mimetene.

mimic (mim'ik), a. and n. [= F. mimique = Sp. mímico = Pg. It. mimico, < L. mimicus, < Gr. μιμικός, belonging to mimes, < μίμος, a mime: see mime.] 1. Acting as a mime; given to or practising imitation; imitative: as, a mimic actor.

Off in her absence mimic Fancy wakes
To imitate her (Reason); but, misjoining shapes,
Wild work produces oft, and most in dreams.
Milton, P. L., v. 110.

2. Pertaining to mimicry or imitation; exhibiting, characterized by, or employed in simulation or mimicry; mimicking; simulating: as,
the mimic stage; mimic action or gestures.

Eager to win laurels on the mimic theatre of war.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., I. 15.

Let the mimic canvas show
Her calm benevolent features.
Bryant, The Ages, iii.

3. Consisting of or resulting from imitation; simulated; mock: often implying a copy or imitation: as, a mimic battle; the mimic royalty of the stage.

Blew mimic hootings to the silent owls,
That they might answer him.
Wordsworth, There was a Boy.
Down the wet streets
Sail their mimic fleets.
Longfellow, Rain in Summer.

Mimic-flower beetles, an occasional name of the Lagrida.

II. n. 1. One who or that which imitates or mimics; specifically, an actor.

Anon his Thibae must be answered,
And forth my mimic comes.
Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2. 19.

Every sort
Of gymnick artists, wrestlers, riders, runners,
Juglers, and dancers, anticks, mummers, mimicks.
Milton, S. A., I. 1325.

2. An imitation; anything copied from or made in imitation of something else.

mimic (mim'ik), v. t.; pret. and pp. mimicked, ppr. mimicking. [< mimic, a.] 1. To act in imitation of; simulate a likeness to; imitate or copy in speech or action, either mockingly or seriously.

Vice has learned so to mimic virtue that it often creeps in hither under its disguise. Steele, Spectator, No. 514.

Mimic the tetchy humour, furtive glance,
And brow where half was furious, half fatigued.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 203.

2. To produce an imitation of; make something similar or corresponding to; copy in form, character, or quality.

Fresh carved cedar, mimicking a glade
Of palm and plantain, met from either side,
High in the midst. Keats, Lamia, ii.

Leonardo studies the laws of light scientifically, so that the proper roundness and effect of distance should be accurately rendered, and all the subtleties of nature's smiles be mimicked. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 277.

3. Specifically, in zoöl. and bot., to imitate, simulate, or resemble (something else) in form, color, or other characteristic; assume the character or appearance of (some other object). See mimicry, 3. = syn. 1. Ape, Mock, etc. See imitate.
mimical† (mim'ik-āl), a. [< mimic + -al.] Same as mimic.

To some too, if they be far gone, mimical gestures are too familiar. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 233.

To make our mirth the completer, Sir J. Minnes was in the highest pitch of mirth, and his mimical tricks, that ever I saw, and most excellent pleasant company he is.
Pepys, Diary, II. 339.

mimically (mim'ik-āl-i), adv. In a mimicking or imitative manner. [Rare.]

Such are good for nothing but either mimically to imitate their neighbours' fooleries, or to immerse themselves in a kind of lascivious and debauched living.
South, Works, V. ix.

mimicalness (mim'ik-āl-nes), n. The quality of being mimical. [Rare.]

mimic-beetle (mim'ik-bē'til), n. A coleopter-ous insect which feigns death when disturbed or alarmed, as some of the Histeridae and Byrr-hidae.

mimicker (mim'ik-ēr), n. One who or that which mimics.

mimicry (mim'ik-ri), n.; pl. mimicries (-riz).
[< mimic + -ry.] 1. The act of imitating in speech, manner, or appearance; mockery by imitation; simulation.

Absolute princes, who ruin their people by a mimicry of the great monarchs. Hume, Essays, II. 11.

A few old men, the last survivors of our generation, . . .
will remember . . . that exquisite mimicry (of Lord Holland's) which ennobled, instead of degrading.
Macaulay, Lord Holland.

2. An imitation; that which imitates or simulates.

In France an imitative school . . . has executed skilful mimicries of ancient glass painting. Encyc. Brit., X. 673.

3. In zoöl., the simulation of something else in form or color, etc.; mimesis. Commonly called protective mimicry, from the immunity secured by such resemblance, as when the insect known as the walking-stick simulates a dead twig of a tree, when a butterfly assimilates in color to that of the flowers upon which it habitually feeds, or a bird's nest is so constructed as to resemble a bunch of moss on a bough, etc. Also mimetism.

Both mimicry and imitation are (here) used in a meta-phorical sense, as implying that close external likeness which causes things unlike in structure to be mistaken for each other. A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 75.

mimic-thrush (mim'ik-thrush), n. A book-name of the mocking-bird, Mimus polyglottus.

Mimidae (mim'ik-dē), n. pl. [*< Mimus +
-idae.*] The Mimidae rated as a family of oscine passerine birds.

Miminae (mī-mī'nē), n. pl. [*< Mimus +
-inae.*] A subfamily of turdoid oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Mimus; the mock-ers, mock-birds, or mocking-birds. The group is variously located in the ornithological system, being sometimes placed in Turdidae, sometimes associated with the wrens in Troglodytidae, and sometimes referred to the Tima-lidæ under the name of American babblers. These birds have a moderate (sometimes extremely long and bowed) bill, short wings, long rounded tail, and scutellate tarsi.
Leading genera are Mimus, Harporhynchus, Oroscoptes, Galeoscoptes. Familiar examples are the mocking-bird, thrasher, and catbird. All are confined to America. See cuts under catbird and mocking-bird.

mimic (mim'in), a. Of or pertaining to the Miminae.

mimist† (mī'mist), n. [< mime + -ist.] A writer of mimes.

Thereupon were called Poets Mimistes: as who would say, imitable and meet to be followed for their wise and grace lessons. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 21.

mimmat (mī-mā'shon), n. [< Ar. mim, the name of the letter m, + -ation. Cf. myticism.] The frequent use of the letter m; specifically, the addition of m to a final vowel.

The principal differences between these dialects [the Semitic-Babylonian and the Semitic-Assyrian] are—1st, the use of mimmat by the Babylonians, and not by the Assyrians; thus the Babylonian words Sumir and Akka-dim were rendered by the Assyrians Sumir and Akkadi.
Eng. Encyc., Arts and Sciences, Supp., p. 173.

mim-mouthed (mim'moutht), a. [< Sc. usually mim-moued; < mim + mouthed.] 1. Reserved in discourse: implying affectation of modesty.

I'm no for being mim-mou'd, when there's no reason;
but a man had as gude, whiles, cast a knot on his tongue.
The Smugglers, I. 164. (Jamieson.)

2. Affectedly moderate at table. Jamieson.

mimographer (mī-mog'ra-fēr), n. [< F. mimographie = Pg. mimographo; < L. mimographus, a writer of mimes, < Gr. μιμογράφος, writing mimes, < μίμος, a mime, + γράφειν, write.] A writer of mimes or farces.

For the best idea that can now be formed of the manner of this famous mimographer we must have recourse, I believe, to the fifteenth Idyl of Theocritus.

Twining, tr. of Aristotle's Treatise on Poetry, I., note 6.

Mimosa (mī-mō'sā), n. [*< NL. (Tournefort, 1700), so called from its imitating the sensibility of animal life; < L. mimus, < Gr. μῖμος, a mimic:
see mime, n.*] 1. A large genus of leguminous plants of the suborder Mimoseae and the tribe Eumimoseae, characterized by a legume with entire or jointed valves which break away from a narrow persistent placenta. The plants are either herba, erect or climbing shrubs, or sometimes trees, and are often prickly. The leaves are almost always bipinnate, but rarely there are none, or the expanded petiole (phyllodium) takes the place of the leaf; and in many species the leaves are sensitive, closing when touched. The flowers are small and sessile, usually having the stamens very much longer than the corolla; they are arranged in globular heads or in cylindrical spikes. About 230 species have been described, natives of the warmer parts of America and Africa, of tropical Asia, and of the Mascarene Islands. Many are cultivated, the most common being the sensitive-plant or humble-plant of hothouses, M. pudica, which is a branching annual, one or two feet in height, having a great many small leaflets, all highly sensitive when touched. M. myriadenia is a woody climber of tropical America, and is remarkable for the great height which it attains, ascending to the tops of the tallest trees.

2. [< l. c.] A plant of this genus.

For not Mimosa's tender tree Shrinks sooner from the touch than he.
Scott, Marmion, iv., Int.

mimosa-bark (mī-mō'sā-bārk), n. The bark of several Australian acacia- or wattle-trees, much used in tanning.

Mimoseae (mī-mō'sē-ē), n. pl. [< NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1825), < Mimosa + -eae.] A suborder of leguminous plants, characterized by small regular flowers with a gamosepalous calyx, by having the petals valvate and often united below the middle, and by having stamens which are free or monadelphous. It embraces 6 tribes, 29 genera, Mimosa being the type, and about 1,350 species, the majority of which are confined to the tropics.

mimosite (mī-mō'sit), n. [< Mimosa + -ite².] A fossil seed-pod supposed to have belonged to a plant of the mimosa family.

mimotype (mim'ō-tip), n. [< Gr. μῖμος, a mimic, + τύπος, form.] In zoöl. and zoögeog., a type or form of animal life which in one country is the analogue or representative of a type or form found in another country, to which it is not very closely related. Thus, the American starlings (Icteri-dæ) are mimotypes of the Old World starlings (Sturnidae);
the American genus Geomys is mimotypic of the African Georchus; the American jumping-mouse (Zapus) replaces the ferboa (Dipus) of Africa.

Mimotypes, forms distantly resembling each other, but fulfilling similar functions. . . . By the use of this term, the word "analogue" may be relieved of a part of the burden borne by it. Smithsonian Report (1881), p. 460, note.

mimotypic (mim'ō-tip'ik), a. [*< mimotype +
-ic.*] Having the character of a mimotype.

Mimuleae (mī-mū'lē-ē), n. pl. [< NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1876), < Mimulus + -eae.] A sub-tribe of plants of the order Scrophularineae and the tribe Gratiolaeae, characterized by a fivetoothed calyx, by having the stamens inserted within the corolla-tube, with the anther-cells contiguous, and by a loculicidal capsule with two or four valves. The subtribe embraces 6 genera, Mimulus being the type, and about 56 species.

Mimulus (mim'ū-lus), n. [< NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), so called from the resemblance of its corolla to a mask; < LL. mimulus, a little mime, dim. of L. mimus: see mime.] A genus of scrophulariaceous plants of the tribe Gratiolaeae, type of the subtribe Mimuleae, characterized by a tubular calyx, which is almost always five-angled or five-toothed, by a two-valved capsule, and by having numerous seeds, with the placenta usually united to form a central column. They are reclining or erect, rarely tall, and slightly woody herba, with opposite undivided leaves, and often showy flowers, which are yellow, orange, red, violet, or rose-colored, and solitary in the axils of the leaves, or sometimes racemed at the tips of the branches.
The species, numbering 45 or 50, are especially numerous in Pacific North America, but are also widely dispersed elsewhere in temperate regions, though not in Europe. Plants of the genus bear the general name of monkey-flower. M. ringens and M. alatus, with violet-purple flowers, are common species of wet places in the eastern United States.
Various species are cultivated, chiefly in conservatories, some much prized. Among them are M. moschatum, the musk-plant of gardens, strongly musk-scented, the flowers small and pale-yellow; M. cardinalis, with large scarlet corolla; and M. glutinosus, a shrubby, very ornamental conservatory species, the flowers from salmon-colored to scarlet.

Mimus (mī'mus), n. [*< NL. < L. mimus, < Gr.
μῖμος, an imitator: see mime.*] A genus of American birds of which the mocking-bird, M. polyglottus, is the type. See mocking-bird, and cut under catbird.

Mimusops (mi-mū'sops), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), so called from the fancied resemblances of the flowers to an ape's face; < Gr. μῦς, gen. of μῦς, an ape (< μυειόβα, imitate, μῦς, an imitator: see mime), + ὤψ, face.] A genus of dicotyledonous gamopetalous plants of the natural order Sapotaceae and the tribe Bumeliaceae. It is characterized by having the six or eight segments of the calyx arranged in two series, the outer ones including the inner, which are more slender; the lobes of the corolla entire and three times as many as the calyx-segments; and the six or eight stamens, which are alternate with the same number of stamens. They are trees, or rarely shrubs, with a milky juice, and usually small white flowers, which are often fragrant, in axillary clusters. About 30 species are known, found throughout the tropics. Several, from India and Ceylon, yield a heavy durable timber, and M. Elengi also produces small edible berries, the seeds of which afford an abundance of oil. See balatagum, bully-tree, cow-tree, and dilly.

min¹, pron. A Middle English form of mine¹.
min², a. [ME., also myn, minne, mynne, < AS. min, less (not 'small,' the positive form being not in use), = OS. minniro = OFries. minnera, minra (cf. min, adv.) = MD. mindre, D. minder = MLG. min, minner, minder = OHG. minniro, MHG. minner, minre, G. minder = Icel. minnr = Sw. Dan. mindre = Goth. minniza, compar., less; cf. min⁵ (min), n. A dialectal or affected form of man.

min. An abbreviation of mineralogy, mineralogical, minimum, minute, minim, and minor.

mina¹ (mī'nā), n. [L., also mnā, < Gr. μνᾶ, a weight, a sum of money; < Heb. māneh, a weight, prop. part, portion, number, < mānāh, divide, measure out, allot.] A unit of weight and of value, originally Assyrian, but used also by the Greeks and other ancient peoples. Bronze and stone Babylonian and Assyrian standards show that there were two Assyrian minas, one varying from 900 to 1,040 grams, and the other of half that weight. The Assyrians divided the mina into 60 shekels, and 60 minas made a talent. In Athens at the time of Pericles it was, in weight of silver, 100 drachmas, equivalent to 436.3 grams, or 15.4 ounces avoirdupois, or 14 + ounces troy, and was in value about $13.

[The Babylonians] constituted a new mina for themselves, consisting of 50 shekels instead of 60.

B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, Int., p. xxxii.

mina² (mī'nā), n. [Also mino, myna, mynah, and maina; < Hind. mainā, a starling.] One of several different sturnoid passerine birds of India and countries further east. (a) Any species of the genus Acridotheres (which see). (b) Any species of the genus Eulabes, several of which inhabit India, Ceylon, Java, Sumatra, Borneo, etc.; a hill-mina. (See hill-mina, and cut under Eulabes.) The common talking starling or religious grackle of India is E. (formerly Graucula) religiosa, of a purplish-black color with a white mirror on the wing, yellow bill and feet, and curious leafy lappets of a yellow or orange color on the head. It is easily tamed and taught to speak with singular distinctness. This and some other members of the same genus are common cage-birds in Europe and the United States.

minable (mī'nā-bl), a. [mine² + -able.] Capable of being mined.

mind¹ (mind), n. [ME. mind, mynd, mend, mund, < AS. gemynd (not mynd*, as commonly cited, this form, without the prefix, occurring only in derivatives), memory, remembrance, memorial, mind, thought, = Icel. minni (for minði*), memory, = Sw. minne = Dan. minde (developed from minne, itself from orig. minde*), memory, = Goth. gamunds (also gaminthi), memory; with collective prefix ge-, and formative -d (orig. pp. suffix, < munan (pres. man, pret. munde), also gemunan (geman, etc.), also ā-munan, on-munan, remember, be mindful of, consider, think, = OS. farmanan, despise, = Icel. muna = Goth. gamunan, remember: see *mine*³. From the same source are AS. myne, mind, purpose, desire, love, = Icel. munr, mind, desire, love, = Goth. muns, purpose, device, readiness (see minne); all from a Teut. √ man = L. √ men in meminisse, remember (perf. as pres., memini = AS. man, I remember), reminisci, recall to mind, recollect, men(t)-s, mind (a form nearly = E. mind), mentiri, lie, etc., = Gr. √ mev in μνις, wrath, μνός, mind, etc., μνᾶσθαι, remember, etc., = Skt. √ man, think. This is one of the most prolific of the Aryan roots: in E., of AS. or other Teut. origin, are *mind*¹, re-mind, *min*³, *mine*³, minion, mignonette, miniken, *minz*¹, *mean*¹, etc.; of L. origin, memento, remembrance, mental, mention, amentia, demented, comment, commentary, etc., Minerva, etc.; of Gr. origin, mentor, etc. The word man is also usually referred to this root: see man.] 1. That which feels, wills, and thinks; the conscious subject; the ego; the soul. Some writers make an obscure distinction between mind, soul, and spirit. With them the mind is the direct subject of consciousness.

For to say truly, what els is man but his minde? which, whosoever haue skill to compasse, and make yeelding and flexible, what may not he commaund the body to per-fourme?

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 164.

Mind, therefore, is to be understood as the subject of the various internal phenomena of which we are conscious, or that subject of which consciousness is the general phenomenon. Consciousness is, in fact, to the mind what extension is to matter or body. Though both are phenomena, yet both are essential qualities; for we can neither conceive mind without consciousness, nor body without extension.

St. W. Hamilton, Metaphysics, ix.

By the mind of a man, we understand that in him which thinks, remembers, reasons, wills.

Reid, Intellectual Powers, I. 1.

By the Human Mind are to be understood its two faculties called, respectively, the understanding and the will.

Sveedenborg, Christian Psychol. (tr. by Gorman), p. 80.

The idea I have of the human mind, in so far as it is a thinking thing, and not extended in length, breadth, and depth, and participating in none of the properties of body, is incomparably more distinct than the idea of any corporeal object.

Descartes, Meditations (tr. by Veitch), iv.

In psychology, on the other hand, the individual mind may mean either (1.) the series of feelings, or "mental phenomena" above referred to; or (2.) the subject of these feelings, for whom they are phenomena; or (3.) the subject of these feelings or phenomena + the series of feelings or phenomena themselves, the two being in that relation to each other in which alone the one is subject and the other a series of feelings, phenomena, or objects.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 39.

Mind consists of feelings and the relations among feelings.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 41.

Whatever all men inevitably mean by the word "I" (the empirical ego of philosophy), whenever they say I think, or feel, or intend this or that; and whatever they understand others to mean by using similar language—thus much, and no more, we propose at first to include under the term mind.

G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, Int., p. 4.

Mind is the sum of our processes of knowing, our feelings of pleasure and pain, and our voluntary doings.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 2.

2. The intellect, or cognitive faculty or part of the soul, as distinguished from feeling and volition; intelligence. The old psychologists made intellect and will the only faculties of the soul.

Years that bring the philosophic mind.

Wordsworth, Immortality.

Wordsworth says of him [Milton] that "His soul was as a star and dwelt apart." But I should rather be inclined to say that it was his mind that was alienated from the present.

Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 154.

3. The field of consciousness; contemplation; thought; opinion.

Buher, Felham, xli.

Unconscious mind. See unconscious. = Syn. Mind, Intellect, Soul, Spirit, reason, sense, brains. Primarily, mind is opposed to matter, intellect to feeling and will, soul to body, and spirit to flesh. The old division of the powers of the mind was into intellect, sensibilities, and will; mind is variously used to cover all or some of these, but when less than the whole is meant it is chiefly the intellect: as, he seems to have very little mind. Yet mind is sometimes used with principal reference to the will: as, I have half a mind to go. Where spirit and soul differ, spirit applies rather to moral force, and soul to depth and largeness of feeling. (See soul.) In the New Testament soul is used to translate a word covering all life, whether physical or spiritual, as in Mat. x. 28. Upon the highest usage in the Scriptures is founded the common representation of man as immortal by the word soul. Hence soul is used for the central, essential, or life-giving part of anything: as, he was the soul of the party. The definitions under each of these words should be studied to get its range and idiomatic uses. See reason.

mind¹ (mind), v. [ME. minden, munden, < AS. myndgian, gemyndgian, gemyndigian (= OHG. gemuntigōn), bear in mind, recollect, recall to another's mind, remind (cf. Icel. minna, remind, recollect, = Dan. minde, remind); from the noun: see *mind*¹, n. This verb has absorbed in part the orig. diff. verbs *mine*³ (< ME. minen, mynen, < AS. munan) and *ming*² (< AS. mynegian, myngian, bring to mind): see *mine*³, *ming*².] I. trans. 1. *mine*¹ (mīn), pron. [In defs. 1 and 2, orig. gen. of *I*², ME. min, myn, AS. min (= OS. OFries. min = D. mijn = MLG. min = OHG. MHG. min, G. mein (also OHG. minēr, MHG. minēr, G. meiner) = Icel. minn = Sw. Dan. min = Goth. meina), genitive associated with nom. ic, I, dat. mē, me, me, etc.; prob. orig. an adj., with adj. suffix -n, from the root of me: see me, *I*². In defs. 3, etc., merely poss. (adj.), ME. min, myn, mine, myne, AS. min, etc., = Goth. meina, mine, my; from the genitive. Hence, by loss of the final consonant, my.] 1. Of me; me; the original genitive (objective) of I. It was formerly used with some verbs where later usage requires me.
 I was in Surrye a syr, and sett be myne one
 As soverayne and seynour of sere kynges londia.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 3818.
 2. Of me; belonging to me. The independent possessive form of the first personal me, corresponding to my as attributive before the thing possessed: as, that (the thing spoken of or indicated) is mine (is of me, belongs to me, or is my thing); these books are all mine (my property): in this use now virtually an elliptical use of mine in def. 3.
 My doctrine is not mine [of me], but his [of him] that sent me.
John vii. 16.
 3. Belonging to me: merely possessive, and construed as an adjective, preceding its noun, which may, however, be omitted. When the noun is expressed, the form is in ordinary use now reduced to my, the older form mine being rarely used except archaically before a vowel or h, or by a familiar transposition after the noun, as in sister mine, baby mine, etc.
 Myn heritage mote I nedes selle,
 And ben a beggere, here may I nat dwelle.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 835.
 I will encamp about mine house.
Zeph. ix. 8.
 Mam, mother-mine, or mammye, as children first call their mothers.
Florio, p. 297. (Hallivell.)
 Mi perdonato, gentle master mine.
Shak., T. of the S., I. 1. 25.
 Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn but I shall have my pocket picked?
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., III. 3. 93.
 Mine own romantic town!
Scott, Marmion, iv. 30.
 We sent mine host to purchase female gear.
Tennyson, Princess, I.
 Like the other possessives in the independent form, mine preceded by of constitutes a double genitive of the possessor in the first person and any word understood denoting appurtenance or possession: as, a horse of mine (belonging to me); it is no fault of mine.
 Upon a wretch whose natural gifts were poor
 To those of mine.
Shak., Hamlet, I. 5. 52.
 By ellipsis, the possessive mine is used (like other possessives)—(1) To avoid repetition of the name of the thing possessed: as, your hand is stronger than mine (my hand).
 Flame them not fro oure companye,
 Sen thye are myne and myne er thye.
York Plays, p. 458.
 The remnant . . . shall know whose words shall stand, mine [my words], or their's.
Jer. xlv. 28.
 Mine and my father's death come not upon thee.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 341.
 (2) To express generally 'that which belongs to me,' 'my possession, property, or appurtenance.'

Bothe to me and to myne mykull vnrigh,
And to yow & also yours gomeryng for euer.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 1721.
He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you. John xvi. 14.
If you like me, she shall have me and mine.
Shak., T. of the S., II. 1. 385.

Of mina. See of.
mine² (min), n. [ME. mine, myne = D. mijn = G. Dan. mine = Sw. mina, < F. mine = Sp. Pg. It. mina, < ML. mina, a mine, < minare, open a mine, lead from place to place: see *mine*³, v.]
1. An excavation in the earth made for the purpose of getting metals, ores, or coal. Mine-work, in metal-mines, consists in sinking shafts and winzes, running levels, and stopping out the contents of the vein thus made ready for removal. In coal-mining the operations differ in detail from those carried on in connection with metal-mines, but are the same in principle. The details vary in coal-mining with the position and thickness of the beds. A mine differs from a quarry in that the latter is usually open to the day; but in any mine a part of the excavations may be an openwork (see that word), as in running an adit-level, which may be carried to a considerable distance before becoming covered by earth or rock. When the term mine is used, it is generally understood that the excavation so named is in actual course of exploitation; otherwise some qualifying term like abandoned is required. No occurrence of ore is designated as a mine unless something has been done to develop it by actual mining operations. There are certain excavations which are called neither mines nor quarries, as, for instance, places where clay is being dug out for bricks; such places are frequently (especially in England) called pits, and also openworks. With few and not easily specified exceptions, a quarry is a place where building-stone, or building-materials of any kind (as lime, cement, etc.), are being got; a mine, where some metal or metalliferous ore is in the process of exploitation. In English the term mine includes excavations designated by the French as mines, as well as some of those called by them minieres; quarry is the equivalent of the French carrière. The term mine is sometimes extended in use to include the ores as well as the excavation.
And alle be it that men fynden gode Dyamandes in Ynde, sit natheles men fynden hem more comounly upon the Roches in the See, and upon Hilles where the Mynes of Gold is.
I would not wed her for a mine of gold.
Shak., T. of the S., I. 2. 92.

2. Milit. (a) A subterranean gallery or passage dug under the wall or rampart of a fortification, for the lodgment of a quantity of powder or other explosive to be used in blowing up the works. (b) Such an excavation when charged with an explosive, or the charge of explosive

Section of a Mine.
AIKB, crater; AB, crater-opening; CB, radius of the crater; AO, radius of explosion; O, charge; OD, OF, radii of rupture.

used in such a mine, or sunk under water in operations of naval defense to serve a similar purpose to mines on land. The radius of explosion of such a mine is the straight line drawn from the center of the charge of a mine to the edge of the crater; the radius of rupture is the distance from the center to the curved surface to which the disturbance caused by the explosion extends.

The walls and ramparts of earth, which a mine had broken and crumbled, were of prodigious thicknesses.

Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 7, 1641.
With daring Feet, on springing Mines they tread
Of secret Sulphur, in dire Ambush laid.
Congreve, On the Taking of Namur.

3. Figuratively, an abounding source or store of anything.

My God, that art
The royal mine of everlasting treasure.
Quarles, Emblems, iv. 3.
The Assizes of Jerusalem will always remain a mine of Book of Quinte Essences (ed. Furnivall), p. 10.

Thus, with Cleveland Ironstone containing after calcination some 40 per cent. of iron, about 11 cwts. of limestone are usually requisite per ton of pig iron, or about 22 per cent. of the weight of mine used.

Encyc. Brit., XIII. 297.
Common mine (mit), a mine in which the radius of the crater, or circular opening produced by the explosion, is equal to the line of least resistance—that is, the shortest line from the center of the charge to the surface of the ground.—Electrical mine, a charge or series of charges of explosive used for mining and exploded by electricity; a submerged torpedo which can be exploded electrically from a distant point.

Electrical mines have the advantage over mechanical that by the removal of the firing battery the passage of a ship is rendered perfectly safe, and that the condition of the mine can be ascertained by electrical tests; but the electric cables are liable to damage, and add greatly to the expense of the defence. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 448.

Electro-mechanical mine, a submarine mine or torpedo, usually sunk and anchored a short distance below the surface, containing a voltaic battery and a circuit-closer which can be operated by the blow the torpedo receives from a passing ship.

Electro-mechanical mines can be made by placing a voltaic battery inside the mine itself and joining it up to a fuse and circuit-closer, the circuit-closer completing the circuit when the mine is struck. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 450.

Fairy of the mine. See fairy.—Mine-locomotive. See locomotive.—Overcharged or surcharged mine (mit), a mine that produces a crater the radius of which is greater than the line of least resistance.—Submarine mine, a defensive torpedo.—The Bonanza mines. See bonanza.—Undercharged mine (mit), a mine that upon explosion produces a crater the radius of which is less than the line of least resistance.

make the Zetes.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 267.
Condemned to mine a channelled way,
O'er the solid sheets of marble gray.
Scott, Rokeby, II. 2.

2. To dig away or otherwise remove the foundation from; undermine; sap: as, to mine the walls of a fort.

Merke sythene over the mounttes in-to his mayne londes,
To Meloyne the mervaylous, and myne doune the wallas.
Morte Arthurs (E. E. T. S.), I. 423.

The Prussians arrived, mined the arches, and attempted to blow up the bridge, sentinels and all.
Greville, Memoirs, Dec. 10, 1820.

3. To dig mines under, for the reception of explosives, as in mining or engineering works, and in military and naval operations.

Old Parr Street is mined, sir.—mined! And some morning we shall be blown into blazes—into blazes, sir;
mark my words! Thackeray, Adventures of Philip, vii.
There are many places where no sort of stationary mines could possibly survive a gale, and although the waters may be reported as mined in all directions, a bold test would show them to be clear of such dangers.
N. A. Rev., CXLI. 274.

4. Figuratively, to ruin or destroy by slow or secret methods.

Whiles rank corruption, mining all within,
Infects unseen.
Shak., Hamlet, III. 4. 148.

Rending friends asunder,
Dividing families, betraying counsels,
Whispering false lies, or mining men with praises.
B. Jonson, Volpone, III. 1.

mine³ (min), v. t. [ME. minen, mynen, munen, < AS. gemynan, remember, cf. gemunan, remember: see *min*³, *mind*¹, *mint*³, etc.] Same as *mind*¹.

mine-captain (min'kap'tan), n. The overseer of a mine.

mine-chamber (min'cham'bér), n. Milit., the place where the explosive charge is deposited in a mine.

mine-dial (min'di'al), n. See dial, 8.

mine-man (min'man), n. A miner.

I speak in other papers as if there may be a volatile gold in some ores and other minerals, where the mine-men do not find anything of that metal. Boyle, Works, III. 99.

mineont, n. An obsolete form of *minion*¹.

miner (mí'nér), n. [ME. minour, mynour, mynor, < OF. minour, menour, F. mineur, < ML. minator (cf. Sp. minero = Pg. mineiro, < ML. minarius), a miner, < minare, mine: see *mine*², v.] 1. One who mines; a person engaged in digging for metals or minerals, or in forming a military or other mine.

Mynors of marbull ston & mony other thinges.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 1532.

2. In zoöl., an insect that mines: chiefly in composition: as, a leaf-miner.—Miners' inch. See inch.
mineral (min'g-rál), n. and a. [= D. mineraal = G. Sw. Dan. mineral, < OF. mineral, F. minéral = Sp. Pg. mineral = It. minerale, a mineral, < ML. minerale, also minorale, a mineral, ore, also a mine (often in pl. mineralia, minoralia, < OF. minerailles, minerals), prop. neut. of mineralis, adj. (which, however, occurs much later than the noun), < minera, mineria (after Rom.), prop. minaria, minarium, a mine, also a mineral (> It. Sp. minera = OF. miniere, a mine, F. minière, > G. miner, a mineral, ore), fem. and neut. respectively of an adj. minarius, pertaining to a mine (as a noun, minarius, m., a miner: see miner), equiv. to mina, a mine, < minare, mine, open a mine: see *mine*².] I. n. 1. Any constituent of the earth's crust; more specifically, an inorganic body occurring in nature, homogeneous and having a definite chemical composition which can be expressed by a chemical formula, and further having certain distinguishing physical characters. A mineral is in almost every case a solid body, and, if it has been formed under suitable conditions, it has, besides its definite chemical composition, a definite molecular structure, which is exhibited externally in its crystalline form and also internally in its cleavage, its behavior with respect to light (optical properties), heat-propagation, electricity, etc. Furthermore, it has other characters, which may belong to it even when amorphous (though sometimes modified by crystallization), as specific gravity, hardness, fracture, tenacity, luster, color, fusibility, etc. A certain variation in physical characters is consistent with the identity of a mineral species, but if the same substance, as calcium carbonate in calcite and in aragonite, occurs in two or more groups of crystals which cannot be referred to the same fundamental form, each is ranked as a distinct species. A difference in specific gravity and in some other physical characters usually accompanies the difference in crystallization. How great a variation in chemical composition, as by isomorphous replacement, is consistent with the identity of a single mineral species is a point about which opinion differs: some authors treat the garnets (all of which have the same form and the same general formula) as a group of related species, and others as varieties of a single species. Chemical compounds formed in the laboratory or in the arts are not regarded as minerals; but where such compounds are already known as occurring in nature are thus formed they are usually called artificial minerals. Much attention has been devoted of recent years to the artificial reproduction of minerals, but almost solely as a matter of scientific interest, and as throwing light on the processes of nature.
2†. A mine. Steevens.

His very madness, like some ore
Among a mineral of metals base,
Shows itself pure. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 1. 26.
Shall it not be a wild fig in a wall,
Or fired brimstone in a mineral?

Ep. Hall, Satire, vi.

Acidiferous mineral. See acidiferous.—Adipoceres mineral. See adipoceres.—Ethiops mineral. See ethiops.—Agaric, bezoar, chameleon, etc., mineral. See the qualifying words.—Altered mineral, one which has undergone more or less chemical change under the processes of nature. The investigation of the alteration of minerals and of the pseudomorphous minerals (see pseudomorph and pseudomorphism) thus formed is a prominent branch of mineralogy.—Crystall mineral, sel de prunelle, a mixture of potassium nitrate and sulphate.—Mineral deposit, any valuable mass of ore. Like ore-deposit, it may be used with reference to any mode of occurrence of ore, whether having the characters of a true, segregated, or gash vein, or of any other form in which ores are found occurring. See ore-deposit.—Torbane Hill mineral. Same as Boghead coal (which see, under coal).

II. a. 1. Having the nature or character of a mineral as defined above; obtained from a mineral or minerals; belonging to the class of minerals; consisting of minerals: as, a mineral substance; the mineral kingdom. Coal dug from the earth is sometimes called mineral coal, to distinguish it from charcoal, which is artificially prepared by charring wood.

The lofty lines abound with endless store
Of mineral treasure.

Sir R. Blackmore, Creation, III.

2. Impregnated with minerals or mineral matter: as, mineral waters; a mineral spring.—Mineral acids, a name given to sulphuric, nitric, and hydrochloric acids.—Mineral alkali. Same as soda.—Mineral black, an impure variety of carbon, of gray-black color, sometimes used as a pigment.—Mineral blue. See blue.—Mineral candle. See candle.—Mineral caoutchouc, a variety of bitumen, intermediate between the harder and softer kinds. It sometimes much resembles india-rubber in its softness and elasticity, hence its name. It occurs near Castleton in Derbyshire. Also called elaterite.—Mineral chameleon. See chameleon.—Mineral charcoal. Same as mother-of-coal (which see, under coal).—Mineral coal. See II., 1, and coal, 2.—Mineral cotton, a fiber formed by allowing a jet of steam to escape through a stream of liquid slag, by which the slag is blown into fine white threads. It is a poor conductor of heat, and is therefore suggested as a covering for steam-bollers and pipes. (E. H. Knight.) A variety with short fiber is called mineral wool, and is used as a non-conductor of heat, a deafening for floors of buildings, etc.—Mineral flax. See asbestos.—Mineral gray. See gray.—Mineral greens. See green.—Mineral kingdom, that one of the three grand divisions of natural objects which consists of minerals or inorganic bodies, and of which mineralogy is the science, as distinguished from the vegetable and animal kingdoms. — Mineral oil. Same as kerosene. — Mineral pitch, a solid softish bitumen. See asphaltum, and elastic mineral pitch, under elastic. — Mineral salt, a salt of a mineral acid. — Mineral solution, arsenical liquor, or liquor potasse arsenitis. — Mineral tallow. Same as hatchettin, i. — Mineral tar, in mineral, bitumen of the consistency of tar. See maltha and bitumen. — Mineral waters, a name given to certain spring-waters so far impregnated with foreign substances as to have a decided taste and a peculiar operation on the physical economy. The ingredients contained in the principal mineral springs of the United States are gases, carbonates, sulphates, chlorides, oxides of iron, and silica. Mineral waters may in most cases be imitated artificially. — Mineral wax. Same as ozocerite. — Mineral wool. See mineral cotton. — Mineral yellow, a pigment made of oxide and chloride of lead, obtained by digesting powdered litharge in a solution of common salt, washing, drying, and fusing the product. Also known as Turner's yellow, Montpellier yellow, Cassel yellow, patent yellow.

mineral-dresser (min'e-ral-dres'er), n. A small machine for trimming geological specimens. It consists of a strong frame with two opposed chisels, between which the specimen is placed; one of the chisels, after being adjusted at the proper distance, remains fixed, while the other, which is attached to a lever worked by a screw, is pressed with great force against it. mineral-holder (min'e-ral-hol'dér), n. A device for exposing small pieces of stone, ores, etc., under a microscope. It consists of two clamps or spindles pivoted so that the object held in them can be revolved readily.

mineralisable, mineralisation, etc. See mineralizable, etc.

mineralist (min'e-ral-ist), n. [F. minéraliste = It. mineralista; as mineral + -ist.] One who studies or is skilled in minerals; a mineralogist.

It is the part of a mineralist both to discover new mines and to work those that are already discovered.
Boyle, Origin of Forms, Proemial Discourse.

A mine-digger may meet with a gem or a mineral which he knows not what to make of till he shews it a jeweller or a mineralist.
Boyle.

mineralizable (min'e-ral-i-za-bl), a. [< mineralize + -able.] Capable of being mineralized. Also spelled mineralisable.

mineralization (min'e-ral-i-zā'shon), n. [= F. minéralisation = Sp. mineralización = Pg. mineralização = It. mineralizzazione; as mineralize + -ation.] The act or process of mineralizing; the process of converting or being converted into a mineral, as a metal into an oxide, sulphuret, or other ore. The conversion of vegetable matter into coal is not properly mineralization, although sometimes so called. Proper mineralization of vegetable matter does take place, however, as when wood is converted into opal, or becomes silicified, as very frequently happens under certain conditions. This is commonly and properly called fossilization or petrification, and more rarely mineralization. Also spelled mineralisation.

Some phenomena seem to imply that the mineralization must proceed with considerable rapidity, for stems of a soft and succulent character, and of a most perishable nature, are preserved in flint.
Lyell, Elements of Geology, I. 92.

mineralize (min'e-ral-iz), v.; pret. and pp. mineralized, ppr. mineralizing. [= F. minéraliser = Sp. Pg. mineralizar = It. mineralizzare; as mineral + -ize.] I. trans. To change from the metallic character to that of an ore. Thus tin, a white metal, becomes very dark-colored and unmetallic in appearance when mineralized by oxygen, as it is in the common ore of that metal.

II. intrans. To go on a mineralogical excursion; make an excursion with the view of collecting minerals.

Also spelled mineralise.

mineralizer (min'e-ral-iz-ér), n. A substance or agent that mineralizes; a substance that combines with a metal to form an ore. The principal mineralizer is sulphur, and combinations of the metals with this substance form the most common ores, especially at some depth below the surface. Near the surface the sulphureted ores are usually found to have been changed to oxides and carbonates. Some metals (as tin) are almost exclusively mineralized by oxygen; others (as iron) are extensively mineralized by both oxygen and sulphur. Arsenic, antimony, and chlorine are other important mineralizers. Some metals (as silver) exist in combinations containing sulphur, arsenic, and antimony, all combined with the metal to form one mineral species. Also spelled mineraliser.

Silver, tin, copper, lead, zinc, and iron are obtained almost exclusively in the form of ores—that is, in combination with a mineralizer, of which the most common one is sulphur.

J. D. Whitney, Metallic Wealth of the United States, p. 81.

mineralogic (min'e-ra-loj'ik), a. [= F. minéralogique = Sp. mineralógico = Pg. mineralógico; as mineralogy + -ic.] Same as mineralogical.

mineralogical (min'e-ra-loj'ik-al), a. [< mineralogic + -al.] Pertaining to mineralogy or the science of minerals: as, a mineralogical table.

mineralogically (min'e-ra-loj'ik-al-i), adv. According to the principles of, or with reference to, mineralogy.

mineralogist (min'e-ral'ô-jist), n. [= F. minéralogiste = Sp. Pg. It. mineralogista; as mineralogy + -ist.] 1. One who is versed in the science of minerals, or one who treats or discourses of the properties of mineral bodies.

The exactest mineralogists have rejected it.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 1.

2. In conch., a conchologist or carrier-shell; any member of the family Xenophoridae (or Phoridae). See cut under carrier-shell.

mineralogize (min'e-ral'ô-jiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mineralogized, ppr. mineralogizing. [< mineralogy + -ize.] To collect mineralogical specimens; study mineralogy.

He was botanizing or mineralogizing with O'Toole's chaplain.
Miss Edgeworth, Ennui, XI.

mineralogy (min'e-ral'ô-ji), n. [< F. minéralogie (> Sp. mineralogía = Pg. It. mineralogia), for minéralologie*, < minéral, mineral, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγω, speak; see -ology.] The science which treats of the properties of mineral species (see mineral), which teaches how to characterize, distinguish, and classify them, and which investigates their occurrence in nature with reference to their mode of formation (paragenesis) and the alteration which they may have undergone. Taken broadly, it includes also, as a branch, lithology, the object of which is the investigation of minerals in their mutual relations as parts of rock-masses. The investigation of rock-masses with respect to their history or occurrence as parts of the crust of the earth belongs to geology. — Chemical mineralogy, the investigation of the chemical composition of minerals, their method of formation, and the changes they undergo when acted upon chemically either in the laboratory or in nature. — Descriptive mineralogy, that branch of the science of mineralogy which is devoted to the description of the physical and chemical properties of mineral species. — Determinative mineralogy, that branch of the science of mineralogy which has as its object the determination of mineral species by means of appropriately arranged tables, based upon their physical and chemical characters. — Physical mineralogy, the science of the physical properties of minerals—that is, of their properties as related to cohesion, heat, light, electricity, etc. It includes, as special branches, crystallography and optical mineralogy.

Minerva (mi-nér'vâ), n. [L. Minerva, OL. Menerva, Etruscan Menerva; prob., with formative -ra, *< menes = Gr. μένος, mind, spirit, force, etc., < √ men-, think, as found in men(t)-s, mind, meminisse, remember, etc.: see mind, n.] In Rom. myth., one of the three chief divinities, the other two being Jupiter and Juno. The chief seat of the cult of all three was the great temple on the Capitoline Hill. Minerva was a virgin, the daughter of Jupiter, the supreme god, and hence was identified, as the Romans came more and more under the influence of Hellenic culture, with the Greek Athene (or Athena), or Pallas, the goddess of wisdom, of war, and of the liberal arts. Like Athene, Minerva was represented in art with a grave and majestic countenance, armed with helmet, shield, and spear, and wearing long full drapery, and on her breast the egleia. See cut under Athene. — Bird of Minerva, the owl. — Minerva Press, a printing-press formerly in Leadenhall Street, London; also, a class of ultra-sentimental novels, remarkable for their intricate plots, published from about 1790 to 1810 at this press, and other productions of similar character.

minervalt (mi-nér'val), n. [< F. minervalt, tuition fees, < L. minerval, a gift in return for instruction, < Minerva, the goddess of wisdom: see Minerva.] Entrance-money given for teaching.
Bailey, 1731.

The chief minervalt which he bestowed upon that society.
Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, I. 96.

minery (mi-nér-i), n. [< mine + -ery.] Mines collectively; a mining district or its belongings; a quarry.

Neere this we were shew'd a hill of alum, where is one of the best mineries, yielding a considerable revenue.
Evelyn, Diary, Feb. 7, 1645.

minette (mi-net'), n. [F.] A form of syenite in which brown mica predominates.

minevert, n. An obsolete form of miniver.

ming¹ (ming), v.; pret. and pp. minged, older forms meint, ment. [Early mod. E. also minge, meng; < ME. mingen, mungen, myngen (pp. menged, meynd, meint, meynt), < AS. mangan = OS. mengian = OFries. mengia, menzia = D. MLG. mēngen = OHG. mēngen, MHG. G. mēngen = Icel. menga = Sw. mēnga = Dan. mēnge, mix, mingle; associated with AS. gemang, gemong, a mingled throng, crowd, assembly (whence on gemang, on gemong, or simply gemang, gemong, among: see among), = G. gemenge, a crowd (see mong), from a root not found outside of Teut., unless it be a nasalized form with diff. vowel of the root of miz, which is improbable. No connection with many can be made out. Hence mingle.] I. trans. 1. To mix; mingle.

Of erthe and air hit is mad i-medelet to-gedere.
With wynt and with watur ful wittliche i-meint.
Piers Plowman (A), x. 4.

Take juce of henbane

With soure aysell, and hem togeder mengeth.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 32.

And so together he would minge his pride and povertie.

Kendall's Poems (1577), G. 1. (Nares.)

Till with his elder brother Themis

His brackish waves be meynt.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., July.

2. To trouble; disturb.

II. intrans. To mix; mingle.

With the Scottis gan he mēge, and stiffe stode in stoure.

Rob. of Brunne, p. 298.

Which never minge

With other stream.

Sir A. Gorge, tr. of Lucan. (Nares.)

[Obsolete or prov. Eng. in all uses.]

ming¹, n. [Also minge; *< ming*¹, v.] Mixture.

Like the ore in the ile Choc, which is pure in the minge but dross in the furnace.
Greene, Tritameron of Love (1587).

ming² (ming), v. [Also minge; < ME. mingen, mēngen, mungen, munegen, < AS. mynegian, myngian, gemynegian (cf. OHG. bi-munigōn), bring to mind, have in mind, myne, mind, gemyne, mindful, < gemunan, remember (see mine); mixed in ME. with AS. myndgian, gemyndgian, bear in mind, put in mind, < gemynd, mind: see mind.] I. trans. To speak of; mention; tell; relate.

Hee minges his metyng amonges hem all,

And what it might bee too meane the mēne gan hee ask.

Alasunder of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), l. 839.

Could never man work thee a worsar shame

Than once to minge thy father's odious name.

Bp. Hall, Satires, IV. ll. 80.

II. intrans. To speak; tell; talk; discourse.

Than tid on a time as this tale minges,

That William went til this gardin his wo fort alake.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 787.

ming² (ming'gl), v.; pret. and pp. mingled, ppr. mingling. [Early mod. E. also mingil, mengle; *< ME. mengelen (not found) = D. mengelen = MHG. G. mengeln, in comp. vermengeln, mingle; freq. of *ming*¹.] I. trans. 1. To mix; blend; combine intimately; form a combination of.

They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall.

Mat. xvii. 34.

We'll mingle our bloods together in the earth.

Shak., Pericles, I. 2. 118.

I should advise all English-men that intend to travell into Italy, to mingle their wine with water.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 96.

He looked at her with an expression of mingled incredulity and mortification.

Jane Austen, Pride and Prejudice, p. 165.

2. To form by mixing or blending; combine the parts or ingredients of; compound or concoct.

Men of strength to mingle strong drink. Isa. v. 22.

Flowers of more mingled hue

Than her purged scarf can shew.

Milton, Comus, l. 904.

3. To bring into relation or association; connect or conjoin.

Those that mingle reason with your passion

Must be content to think you old.

Shak., Lear, II. 4. 228.

I owe you so much of my health, as I would not mingle you in any occasion of impairing it. Donne, Letters, vi.

4. To confuse; impair or spoil by mixture with something.

This is the mark at the which the devil shooteth, to evacuate the cross of Christ, and to mingle the institution of the Lord's supper.

Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

The best of us appear contented with a mingled imperfect virtue.

Rogers, Sermons.

= Syn. 1 and 2. Mingle, Mix, Blend. Mingle and mix are often quite synonymous; where they differ, mix is likely to be found to indicate a more complete loss of individuality by that which is joined with something else. Blend vividly suggests the joining of two or more colors to form a third, and so a passing of two or more sounds, qualities, or the like into each other in such a way as to produce a result partaking of the qualities of each.

II. intrans. 1. To be or become joined, combined, or mixed; enter into combination or intimate relation: as, to mingle with society; oil and water will not mingle.

What, girl! though grey

Do something mingle with our younger brown, yet ha' we

A brain that nourishes our nerves.

Shak., A. and C., iv. 8. 19.

I heard the wrack,

As earth and sky would mingle.

Milton, P. R., iv. 453.

2. To be formed by mixing or blending. [Rare.]

The sun doth stand

Beneath the mingling line of night and day.

Jones Very, Poems, p. 39.

= Syn. See I.

mingle (ming'gl), n. [Early mod. E. also men-gle; < mingle, v.] A mixture; a medley; a jumble.

Acervatim, adverb, on heapes, without ordre, in a mengle. Etymol. Dict., 1559. (Nares.)

Trumpeters . . .
Make mingle with our rattling tabourines.

Shak., A. and C., iv. 8. 87.

mingleable (ming'gl-a-bl), a. [< mingle + -able.] Capable of being mingled; miscible.

Merely by the fire, quicksilver may, in convenient vessels, be reduced . . . into a thin liquor like water, and mingleable with it. Boyle, Works, I. 529.

mingledly (ming'gld-li), adv. In a mixed manner; confusedly.

mingle-mangle (ming'gl-mang'gl), v. t. [A varied redupl. of mingle, v.] To confuse; jumble together.

How pitteous then mans best of wit is martyr'd,
In barrous manner tatter'd, torne, and quarter'd,
So mingle-mangled, and so hack't and bew'd.

J. Taylor, Works (1630). (Nares.)

mingle-mangle (ming'gl-mang'gl), n. [A varied redupl. of mingle, n.] A confused mixture; a medley.

Made a mingle-mangle and a hotch-potch of it.

Latimer, Sermons, fol. 49 b. (Nares.)

Thou mayst conceipt what mingle-mangle
Among this people every where did tangle.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., Babylon.

mingle-mangler (ming'gl-mang'glér), n. One who mixes and confuses things; a blundering meddler.

There be leaveners still, and mingle-manglers, that have soured Christ's doctrine with the leaven of the Pharisees.

Latimer, 2d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

minglement (ming'gl-ment), n. [< mingle + -ment.] The act of mingling, or the state of being mixed.

mingler (ming'glér), n. One who mingles or mixes.

Mingrelian (ming-gré-li-an), a. and n. [< Mingrelia (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Mingrelia, near the Black Sea, formerly a principality and now a part of Caucasia, Russia. II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Mingrelia.

miniard, a. See migniard.

miniardize, n. and v. See migniardize.

miniature (min'i-ät), v. t.; pret. and pp. miniatured, ppr. miniaturizing. [< L. miniatus, pp. of miniare (> It. miniare = Sp. miniare), color with red lead, < minium, red lead: see minium.] To paint or tinge with or as with minium.

All the capitals in the body of the text [of the "Gesta Romanorum"] are miniatured with a pen.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III.

miniature (min'i-ät), a. [< L. miniatus, pp. of miniare: see miniature, v.] Of the color of minium.

miniature (min'i-ä-tür or min'i-tür), n. and a. [< F. miniature = Sp. Pg. miniatura, < It. miniatura, < miniare, < L. miniare, paint in minium: see miniature, v.] I. n. 1. A painting, generally a portrait, of very small dimensions, usually executed in water-colors, but sometimes in oil, on ivory, vellum, or paper of a thick and fine quality.

A bright salmon flesh-tint which she had originally hit upon while executing the miniature of a young officer.

Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, x.

Hence—2. Anything represented on a greatly reduced scale.

The water, with twenty bubbles, not content to have the picture of their face in large, would in each of these bubbles set forth the miniature of them. Sir P. Sidney.

Tragedy is the miniature of human life; an epic poem is the draught at length. Dryden, Æneid, Ded.

3. A greatly reduced scale, style, or form.

We may reasonably presume it [Eden] to have been the earth in miniature.

Ep. Horne, Works, IV. II.

The revolution through which English literature has been passing, from the time of Cowley to that of Scott, may be seen in miniature within the compass of his [Dryden's] volumes.

Macaulay, John Dryden.

4t. Red letter; lettering in red lead or vermilion.

If the names of other saints are distinguished with miniature, her's [the Virgin's] ought to shine in gold.

Hickes, Sermons, II.

5t. Anything small or on a small scale.

There's no miniature
In her fair face, but is a copious theme

Which would, discours'd at large, of, make a volume.

Masinger, Duke of Florence, v. 3.

II. a. On a small scale; much reduced from natural size.

Here shall the pencil bid its colours flow,
And make a miniature creation grow.

Gay, The Fan, I.

In this cave . . . nearly the whole of the ornamentation is made up of miniature ralls, and repetitions of window fronts or façades.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 116.

miniature (min'i-a-tür or min'i-tür), v. t.; pret. and pp. miniatured, ppr. miniaturizing. [< miniature, n.] To represent or depict on a small scale. [Rare.]

miniaturist (min'i-a-tür-ist or min'i-tür-ist), n. [< F. miniaturiste = Sp. Pg. miniaturista; as miniature + -ist.] One who paints miniatures; an illuminator of manuscripts, or a painter of small pictures, especially portraits.

The famous miniaturist Jean Fouquet of Tours was named the king's [Louis XI.'s] enlumineur.

Encyc. Brit., XIV. 523.

minimum (min'i-mum), n. and a. [< L. minimum, neut. of minimus, least: see minim.] I. n.; pl. minima (-mä). The smallest amount or degree; the least quantity assignable in a given case: opposed to maximum; in math., that point where a function has a less value than for any neighboring values of the variable.

The prejudice which some persons have against standing an hour on the catasta to be handled from head to foot in the minimum of clothing.

Kingsley, Hypatia, xiii.

Maxima and minima. See maximum.

II. a. 1. Of the smallest possible amount or degree; least; smallest: as, a minimum charge.

—2. Indicating or registering the lowest quantity or degree: as, a minimum thermometer.—Minimum sensible, the smallest or weakest impression that can be perceived by a given sense.

Two impressions of sound and light each of which approached very closely the minimum sensible would be reckoned as about equal. J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 45.

Minimum thermometer, a thermometer so constructed as to indicate the lowest temperature since its last adjustment. See thermometer.—Minimum value of a function, in math., the value it has when it ceases to decrease, and begins to increase with the increase of the variable: it is not necessarily the absolute minimum.—Minimum visible, the smallest angular measure of which the eye can distinguish the parts. It is about half a minute.

minimus (min'i-mus), n.; pl. minimi (-mi). [< L. minimus, least: see minim.] A being of the smallest size. [Rare.]

Get you gone, you dwarf,
You minimus, of hindring knot-grass made.
Shak., M. N. D., III. 2. 329.

mining (mī'ning), n. [Verbal n. of *mine*², v.]
The business or work of a miner; also used attributively: as, a mining engineer; mining tools.—Hydraulic mining. See hydraulic.—Mining claim. (a) The claim of a discoverer, or of one who has taken possession of a mine, or unoccupied ground supposed to contain a precious metal or mineral, to the exclusive right to work it, or to a right of preemption; hence, generally, a piece of land supposed to contain a precious metal. (b) The area of mining-ground held under federal or State law by one claimant or association by virtue of one location and entry. In consequence of the peculiar right to follow a vein of ore beyond the line of the boundary upon the surface, it may be more correctly, though still somewhat vaguely, defined as a tract of mineral land, the owner of which is entitled to the surface rights and all subjacent minerals, together with certain lateral rights of mining beyond the boundary, and subject to the similar lateral rights of adjoining owners. When two veins connect or cross, priority of title generally gives a preference.
Coal-land claims may be entered for not exceeding 160 acres to each individual, or 320 acres to each association.
As to placer-mining claims, see placer-claim, under placer.
—Mining district, engineering, jurisprudence, partnership, etc. See district, etc.

mining (mī'ning), p. a. [Pr. of *mine*², v.] 1.

And Duncan's horses, . . .
Beauteous and swift, the minions of their race.
Shak., Macbeth, II. 4. 15.
Man's his own Minion; Man's his sacred Type;
And for Man's sake he loves his Workmanship.
Sylvestor, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 7.
2. An intriguing favorite; one who gains grace by vile or unworthy means; a servile creature.
Minion, your dear lies dead. Shak., Othello, v. 1. 33.
It was my chance one day to play at chess
For some few crowns with a minion of this king's,
A mean poor man that only serv'd his pleasures.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, II. 1.
Hence—3. A pert or saucy girl or woman; one who is too bold or forward; a minx.
Fast by her side did sit the bold Sansloy,
Fitt mate for such a mincing minion.
Spenser, F. Q., II. II. 37.
You'll cry for this, minion, if I beat the door down.
Shak., C. of E., III. 1. 50.
4. A small printing-type, about 10½ lines to the inch, intermediate between the sizes nonpareil (smaller) and brevier (larger).
This line is printed in minion.

Ever verdure with flowre and grasse,
Of sundry hews. Puttenham, Parthenolades, xi.
minion², n. An obsolete variant of minium.
Let them paint their faces with minion and ceruse, they are but fewels of lust, and signs of a corrupt soul.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 478.
minion³ (mīn'yōn), n. [Origin not ascertained.] The siftings of ironstone after calcination at the iron-furnaces. Weale.
minionette (mīn-yō-net'), a. and n. [*< minion*¹
+ -ette. Cf. mignonette.] I. a. Diminutive; delicate; dainty.
His minionette face. Walpole, Letters, I. 205. (Davies).
II. n. In printing, a bastard body of type, measuring about 11½ lines to the inch, smaller than minion and larger than nonpareil, intended to be the equivalent of the French size

"body six" of the Didot system: used by type-founders in the United States chiefly for combination borders planned on the Didot system.
minioning (mīn'yōn-ing), n. [*< minion*¹ +
-ing¹.] Kind or affectionate treatment.
With sweete behaviour and soft minioning.
Marston and Webster, Malcontent, IV. 3. minionize (mīn'yōn-iz), v. t. [*< minion*¹ +
-ize.] To treat with partiality; be especially kind to; favor.
Whom of base groomes His grace did minionize.
Davies, Holy Rood, p. 26. (Davies).
minion-like (mīn'yōn-lik), adv. Like a minion;
finely; daintily.
Hitherto will our sparkful youth laugh at their great-grandfather's English, who had more care to do well than to speak minion-like. Camden, Remains, Languages.
minionly (mīn'yōn-li), adv. [Early mod. E.
also mynionly; < *minion*¹ + -ly².] Same as min- ion-like.
He wolde kepe goodly horses, and live mynionly and ele-gantely. Taverner's Adagies (1562). (Nares).
minionship (mīn'yōn-ship), n. [*< minion*¹ +
-ship.] The state of being a minion.
The Favourite Luines strengtheneth himself more and more in his Minionship. Howell, Letters, I. 1. 17.
minious (mīn'ius), a. [< minium + -ous.] Of the color of minium.
They hold the sea receiveth a red and minious tincture from springs, wells, and currents, that fall into it.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., VI. 2. minish (mīn'ish), v. [< ME. minyghen, mini- schen, minushen, menushen, menusen, < OF. menu- sier, menuisier, menuiser, F. ménuisier = Pr. menu- sar = It. minuzzare, < ML. minutiare*, make small, diminish, < L. minutia, smallness; see minutia. Cf. aminish, diminish.] I. trans. To lessen; diminish; render fewer or smaller.
The faithful are minished from among the children of men.
Book of Common Prayer, Psalter, xii. 1.
The living of poor men [was] thereby minished and taken away.
Latimer, 1st Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.
Ye shall not minish ought from your bricks of your daily task. Ex. v. 19.
II. intrans. To become less; grow fewer or smaller.
As the Waspe souketh honie fro the bee,
So minisheth our commoditee.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 194.
The very considerable minishing of the more experienced debaters . . . on the Liberal side. Saturday Rev., LXI. 67.
[Obsolete or archaic in both uses.] minishment (mīn'ish-ment), n. [< minish +
-ment.] The act of diminishing; diminution.
By him reputed as a minishment, and a withdrawing of the honor dewe to himself. Sir T. More, Works, p. 145.
ministello, n. [It. ministello*, dim. of ministro, a minister: see minister.] A petty minister.
What pitiful ministellos, what pigmy Presbyters!
Ep. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 194. (Davies). minister (mīn'is-tēr), n. [< ME. ministre, min- yestre, mynester (= D. G. Dan. Sw. minister), < OF. ministre, F. ministre = Sp. Pg. It. ministro, < L. minister (ministr-), an attendant, servant, assistant, a priest's assistant or other under-official, eccl. (LL. and ML.) a priest, etc.; with suffix -ter, < minor (for minos*, cf. neut. minus), less: see minor. Cf. magister, a chief, leader, with the same suffix, < major, magis, greater, more: see magister, *master*¹. Hence ministe- rium, ministry, *minster*², mistery, *mystery*², min- strel, etc.] I. One who performs service for another, or executes another's will; one who is subservient; an agent, servant, or attendant.
When the Kyng hathe don, thanne don the Lordes; and afre hem here Mynystres and other men, sif thei may have ony roremenant. Mandeville, Travels, p. 170.
O war! thou son of hell,
Whom angry heavens do make their minister.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 2. 34.
The word minister, in the original Διακονος, signifieth one that voluntarily doth the business of another man; and differeth from a servant only in this, that servants are obliged by their condition to what is commanded them;
whereas ministers are obliged only by their undertaking, and bound therefore to no more than they have undertaken. Hobbes, Leviathan, III. 42.
I have grounds for believing that Henry VIII. was the master, and in no sense the minister, of his people.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 280.
2. One who acts as a medium or dispenser; an administrator or promoter: as, a minister of God's will, of justice, etc.; a minister of peace or charity.
Is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid.
Gal. II. 17.
Angels and ministers of grace defend us!
Shak., Hamlet, I. 4. 39.

All thoughts, all passions, all delights,
Whatever stirs this mortal frame,
All are but ministers of Love,
And feed his sacred flame. Coleridge, Love.

3. In politics: (a) One of the persons appointed by the sovereign or chief magistrate of a country as the responsible heads of the different departments of the government; a minister of state: as, the minister of foreign affairs, of the interior, of finance, of war, of justice, etc.
These officers constitute the ministry or executive department of the government; at their head is the prime (first) minister, or premier, the immediate deputy or representative of the sovereign or chief magistrate; he and other ministers, selected by him, are called collectively, as his coordinate advisers in matters of policy, the cabinet.
Minister is used in most European countries as the official title of all heads of departments, but in Great Britain only in a generic sense (as, a minister of the crown), the individual ministers being officially designated the secretary of state for foreign affairs, for war, for the colonies, etc., or by other titles, as chancellor of the exchequer (minister of finance). In the government of the United States the title minister is not used at all, and there is no ministry; the corresponding officers, differing from the preceding both in mode of appointment and degree of power and responsibility, are called secretaries (of state, of the interior, of the treasury, of war, of the navy, of agriculture), postmaster-general, and attorney-general. See cabinet, 4.
Very different training was necessary to form a great minister for foreign affairs. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xi.
(b) A diplomatic representative of a country abroad; a person accredited by the executive authority of one country to that of another as its agent for communication and the transaction of business between the two governments; specifically, the political representative of a state in another state, in contradistinction to an ambassador, who holds a nominally higher rank as in general the personal representative of the sovereign or chief of the state at the court of another sovereign. The United States heretofore have sent and received only ministers in this specific sense, called in full either envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary or ministers resident.
We [the United States] have no ambassadors, we have comparatively few envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, but seem to prefer ministers resident.
E. Schuyler, Amer. Diplomacy, p. 112.
4. Eccles., in the New Testament, a servant of God, God's word, Christ, or the church; an officer of the church; an attendant or assistant (Acts xiii. 5): translating διάκονος (whence dea- con), but sometimes λειτουργός (liturgy) or ἐπι- τήρις (an assistant); hence, any member of the ministry. The word is used of civil authorities in Rom.
xiii. 4-6. In the ancient church minister usually meant a deacon or one in minor orders, the Latin word minister being the equivalent of the Greek διάκονος. See ministry.
These Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church,—Bishops, Priests, and Deacons.
Book of Common Prayer, Pref. to Ordinal.
Mr. Williams, the teacher at Salem, was again convent-ed, and all the ministers in the bay being desired to be present, he was charged with the said two letters.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 204.
5†. An officer of justice.
"I crye out on the ministers," quod he,
"That sholden kepe and reule this cite."
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, I. 223.
6. The catfish, Amiurus nebulosus: apparently so called from the silvery white throat, contrasting with the dark back, and likened to a clergyman's white necktie. [Local, U. S.]
"Horned pout," "bull-heads" or ministers, probably the hardest of all the fresh-water fish, thrive in Northern and Eastern States. Tribune Book of Sports, p. 155.
Ministers of the sick, a Roman Catholic order of priests and laymen, founded by Camillus of Lellis, to serve hospital patients. It was made a religious order by Gregory XIV. (end of the sixteenth century).—Minister's rental, in Scots law, the rental of the parish lodged by the minister in a process of augmentation and locality.—Syn.
4. Minister, Pastor, Clergyman, Divine, Parson, Priest.
Minister views a man as serving a church; pastor views him as caring for a church as a shepherd cares for sheep; clergyman views him as belonging to a certain class; divine is properly one learned in theology, a theologian; parson, formerly a respectful designation, is now little better than a jocular name for a clergyman; priest regards a man as appointed to offer sacrifice.
minister (mīn'is-tēr), v. [< ME. ministrer, <

Ex. xxix. 44.

2. To afford supplies; give things needful; furnish means of relief or remedy.

When saw we thee an hungered, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee?
Mat. xxv. 44.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased?
Shak., Macbeth, v. 3. 40.

But God's sweet pity ministere
Unto no whiter soul than here.
Whittier, Witch's Daughter.

3. To contribute; be of service.

It is my belief that it doesn't often minister to friendship that your friend shall know your real opinion.
H. James, Jr., Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 337.

4. To serve. [Rare.]

The wind is now thy organist; a clank
(We know not whence) ministere for a bell
To mark some change of service.
Wordsworth, Roalin Chapel.

=Syn. Administer to, Minister to (see administer), contribute to, serve, assist, help, succor, wait upon.

ministerial (min-is-tē'ri-əl), a. [= F. ministeriel = Sp. Pg. ministerial = It. ministeriale, < L.L. ministerialis, < L. ministerium, ministry: see ministry, ministerium.] 1. Performing service; ministering or ministrant; subservient; subsidiary.

Burke, Appeal to Old Whigs.

Through the power of the members of the Federal Council to attend and speak in either house, the Swiss Assembly can therefore hear . . . what in England we call a ministerial statement.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 391.

3. Pertaining to the office, character, or habits of a clergyman; clerical: as, ministerial garments.

It is the inward calling of God that makes a Minister, and his own painful study and diligence that matures and improves his ministerial gifts.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

Ministerial acts, offices, powers, in law, those acts, offices, or powers that are to be performed or exercised uniformly on a given state of facts, in a prescribed manner, in obedience to law or the mandate of legal authority, without dependence on the exercise of judgment as to the propriety of so doing. Thus, the duties of a sheriff or clerk of court are chiefly if not entirely ministerial. — Ministerial benches. See bench. =Syn. 3. Ecclesiastical.

ministerialist (min-is-tē'ri-əl-ist), n. [< ministerial + -ist.] In politics, a supporter of the ministry in office.

The Ministerialists have not been able to maintain in the counties the advantage they had gained in the boroughs.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 231.

ministerially (min-is-tē'ri-əl-i), adv. In a ministerial manner, character, or capacity.

The Son . . . submits to act ministerially, or in capacity of Mediator.
Waterland.

ministering (min'is-tēr-ing), p. a. Attending and serving as a subordinate agent; serving under superior authority; performing personal services; tending.

Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation? Heb. I. 14.

When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou! Scott, Marmion, vi. 30.

ministerium (min-is-tē'ri-um), n. [< L. ministerium, ministry: see ministry.] 1. In the Lutheran Church, a body of ordained ministers having the sole charge of examining, licensing, and ordaining candidates for the ministry, of conducting trials for clerical heresy, and of hearing all appeals from church councils for lay heresy. The word is also sometimes used in a more general sense, as synonymous with synod, which includes both ministers and lay delegates in one body. In such cases, however, the ministerium proper consists of the ordained ministers only.

As soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished.
Luke I. 23.

2†. Administration; agency; intervention for aid or service.

Thanne comforte him with ministracioun of cure quite essencie afore seid, and he schal be al hool, but if it be so that god wole algatis that he schal die.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 15.

To hang a man for sirpence, threepence, I know not what—to hang for a trifle, and pardon murder, is in the ministration of the law through the ill framing of it.
Cromwell, quoted in Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

3. A religious service or other function.

The solemn and splendid ministrations of the church were made more magnificent by the stately order of the processions, the display of gay and costly dresses, the gleaming of armor, and the waving of innumerable banners.
C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 100.

ministrative (min'is-trā-tiv), a. [= It. ministrativo; as ministrat(ion) + -ive.] Affording service or aid; assisting.

ministrator (min'is-trā-tor), n. [= OF. ministrateur = Pg. ministrador, < L. ministrator, an attendant, servant, < ministrare, attend, serve: see minister, v.] An administrator.

The law and the ministrators of it.
Roger North, Examen, p. 74. (Davies.)

ministratoriously (min'is-trā-tō'ri-us-li), adv. [< "ministratorious" (cf. L. ministratorius, of or pertaining to service, < ministrator, servant: see ministrator) + -ly.] In the capacity of an administrator. [Rare.]

A man can but onely ministratoriously give any temporal dominion or gift perpetual, as well to his own natural sonne, as to his sonne by imitation.
State Trials, 6 Rich. II., an. 1383 (John Wycliffe).

mistress (min'is-tres), n. [< OF. mistresse, < L. mistress, equiv. to ministra, a servant, fem. of minister: see minister.] 1. A female minister, in any sense.

Thus was beauty sent from Heaven,
The lovely mistress of truth and good.
Akenside, Pleasures of Imagination, l.

2†. A mistress.

The olde foxes cruell and severe mystresses
Will learne the enterer never to come forth.
Benvenuto, Passengers' Dialogues. (Nares.)

ministry (min'is-tri), n.; pl. ministries (-triz). [Formerly also ministry; = F. ministère = Sp. Pg. It. ministerio, < L. ministerium, the office or function of an attendant or servant, attendance, service, office, occupation, employment, a suite of attendants, etc., < minister, an attendant, servant, minister: see minister, n. Cf. ministerium, and *mister*², *mystery*², ult. < L. ministerium.] 1. The act of ministering; the rendering of service; ministration.

It was a worthy edifying sight . . .
To see kind hands attending day and night,
With tender ministry, from place to place.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, li. 75.

2. The state of ministering or serving; agency; instrumentality.

The natural world he made after a miraculous manner;
but directs the affairs of it ever since by . . . the ordinary ministry of second causes.
Bp. Atterbury.

mink

Think not that he, . . . who filled the chambers of the sky
With the ever-flowing air, hath need to use
The ministries thou speakest of.

Bryant, Tale of Cloudland.

3. The office or function of a minister, civil or ecclesiastical; the state of being a minister, in any sense; the exercise of a ministerial office: as, to discharge one's ministry faithfully; to enter the ministry of the gospel; to be appointed to the ministry of war.

Every one that came to do the service of the ministry
... in the tabernacle of the congregation. Num. iv. 47.

Do you think in your heart that you are truly called ... to the Order and Ministry of Priesthood?
Book of Common Prayer, Ordering of Priests.

Their ministry perform'd, and race well run, . . .
They die.
Milton, P. L., xii. 505.

4. The general or a particular body of ministers of religion; the ministerial or clerical class; the clergy or priesthood. In episcopal churches the ministry consists of bishops, priests, and deacons, and of subdeacons and the minor orders, when such exist, in addition to these.

5. The body of ministers of state in a country; the heads of departments collectively; the executive administration: as, to form a ministry; the policy of the British ministry; the French ministry has resigned; In the United States the corresponding body is called the cabinet.

The word Ministry was not then in use, but Counsellors or Courtiers. For the King himself (Charles II.) then took so much upon him that the ministers had not that aggregate title. Roger North, Examen, p. 60. (Davies.)

The first English ministry was gradually formed; nor is it possible to say quite precisely when it began to exist.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xiv.

6. A ministerial department of government; the organization of functionaries administering a branch of public affairs; a minister and his subordinates collectively: as, the ministry of war or of justice.

Immediately below these three institutions stand the ministries, ten in number. D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 198.

ministryship (min'is-tri-ship), n. [< ministry + -ship.] The office of a minister; ministry. [Rare.]

minium (min'i-um), n. [Formerly also minion, < OF. minion, F. minium = Sp. Pg. It. minio; < L. minium, native cinnabar, red lead: said to be a Spanish (Hispanic) word. Hence miniate, miniature.] Red oxide of lead, Pb₃O₄, produced by maintaining the protoxide (litharge) at a low red heat for some time in presence of air. It is a bright-orange granular powder, used as a pigment and in the manufacture of flint-glass. See vermillion.—Iron minium, a name given to a large number of substances used as paints, especially for iron-work and sea-going vessels.—Oxidized minium, a dried composition consisting of lead nitrate, lead peroxide, and undecomposed minium, obtained by drying a magma of minium and nitric acid.

miniver (min'i-vēr), n. [Formerly also miniver, meniver, dial. minifer; < ME. meniver, menyver, < OF. menu ver, menu veir, menu vair, a grayish fur, miniver, also "the beast that bears it" (Cotgrave), lit. little vair: menu, little; vair, a kind of fur: see *minute*¹ and vair.] 1. A mixed or spotted fur once commonly used for lining or trimming garments. According to Cotgrave, it was "the fur of ermins mixed or spotted with the fur of the weasel called gris"; but according to Flanché, miniver was the white part only of the patchwork designs of different furs in use at certain epochs during the middle ages, as is seen in the heraldic furs, which retain the designs most commonly used at that time.

A burnet cote heng therwith alle, Furred with no menyvers.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 227.

Me lists not tell of ouches rare,
Of marbles green, and braided hair,
And kirtles furred with miniver.
Scott, L. of L. M., vi. 4.

2. In her., a fur like vair, with the peculiarity that the escutcheon-miniver contains six or more horizontal rows of spots.—3. The Siberian squirrel, which has fine white fur; also, the fur itself.

minivet (min'i-vet), n. One of various campophagine birds of the genus Pericrocotus.

mink (mingk), n. [Formerly also minx (appar. an error); appar. < Sw. mänk, a mink (Putorius lutreola), transferred from the European mink to the American species.] 1. An American digitigrade carnivorous quadruped of the family Mustelidae, Putorius (Lutreola) vison, of semi-aquatic habits. The mink belongs to the same genus as the stoats and weasels, but to a different subgenus, its form being modified in adaptation to its aquatic habits, in which respect it approaches the otters. It was once called lesser otter. It is larger and stouter than any stoat, with shorter ears, uniformly bushy tail, and half-webbed feet; the color is rich dark chestnut-brown, blackening on the back and tail; the chin, and usually some irregular patches on the throat, breast, or belly, are white. It is 15 to 18 inches long, the tail 6 or 8 inches more. It is found everywhere in North America in suitable places; its fur is valuable, and the animal is systematically trapped, especially in British America. Like its relatives, the mink exhales a strong musky odor, and is destructive to poultry. It has been tamed, and bred in minkeries, like the ferret. The little black or mountain mink, described by Audubon and Bachman as a distinct species, P. nigrescens, is a small dark variety. The corresponding animal in Europe is P. lutreola, commonly called norz or nörz, and by its Swedish name mänk (sometimes mank)—the designation European mink being a late book-name. It is much like the American mink, but its average size is smaller, and it usually has the upper lip as well as the chin white, and presents certain dental peculiarities. The Siberian mink, lately so called, is the kulon, P. sibiricus, a quite different species. Also called vison.

2. Same as kingfish (a). minkery (ming'kér-i), n.; pl. minkeries (-iz). [< mink + -ery.] An establishment where minks are bred and trained for ratting, like the ferret.

Mr. Rosseque's minkery consisted of twelve stalls, each twelve feet square, of stale soil, and surrounded with a fence, and some special precautions to prevent the escape of the animals.

Coues, Fur-Bearing Animals (ed. 1877), p. 182.

minnet, n. and v. See *min*³.

minne-drinking (min'e-drink'ing), n. [< G. minne, love, + E. drinking, verbal n. of drink, v.] Originally, a heathen practice among the Teutonic nations at grand sacrifices and banquets, in honor of the gods or in memory of the absent or deceased. This custom was sanctioned by the church, the saints being substituted for the gods, and was especially consecrated to St. John the Evangelist and to St. Gertrude. Traces of it are still found in certain localities of Germany.

Minne-drinking, even as a religious rite, apparently exists to this day in some parts of Germany. At Otbergen, a village of Hildesheim, on Dec. 27 every year a chalice of wine is hallowed by the priest, and handed to the congregation in the church to drink as Johannis seggen (blessing). Grimm, Teut. Mythol. (trans.), I. 62.

minnekint, n. An obsolete form of minikin. minnelled (min'e-lét), n. [G., < minne, love, + led, song.] A love-song.

The first lyrical writer of Holland was John I., duke of Brabant, who practised the minnelied with success. Encyc. Brit., XII. 90.

minnepoetry (min'e-po'et-ri), n. The poetry of the minnesingers.

The classical representative of Minnepoetry, Walther von der Vogelweide. Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 454.

minnesinger (min'e-sing-ér), n. [G., < minne, love, + singer, a singer.] One of a class of German lyric poets and singers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, so called because love was the chief theme of their poems. They were chiefly or exclusively men of noble descent—knights, nobles, princes, and even emperors. They sang their pieces to their own accompaniment on the viol, and often engaged in poetical contests for the gratification of princes and ladies of the court. Among the chief seats of the minnesingers were Swabia and Austria, and the leading dialect used was the Swabian. The minnesingers were succeeded by the mastersingers. See mastersinger.

Minnesotan (min'e-só'tan), n. [< Minnesota (see def.) + -an.] A native or an inhabitant of Minnesota, a northwestern State of the United States, north of Iowa.

minnet (min'et), n. See *minute*².

minnie¹ (min'i), n. A dialectal form of minnow. minnie² (min'i), n. [Dim. of min⁴.] A childish word for mother. [Scotch.]

Bad luck on the penny that tempted my minnie
To sell her poor Jenny for siller an' lan!
Burns, What Can a Young Lassie.

minnikint, minnikent, n. and a. Obsolete forms of minikin.

minning (min'ing), n. [< ME. minnyng; verbal n. of *min*³.] Reminding.

minning-day (min'ing-dä), n. [ME. minnyng-day.] The anniversary of a death, on which the deceased was had in special remembrance, and special offices were said for his soul. See a year's mind, under *mind*¹.

All the day and night after the Buriall they vse to have excessive ringinge for ye dead, as also at the twel-monethes day after, which they call a minnyng-day. Chesham Misc., V. xv. (N. and Q., 7th ser., III. 448.)

minnis (min'is), n. [< Cf. minnow.] The stickle-back. [Local, Eng.] minnow (min'ô), n. [Formerly also minow, minoe, menow, etc.; also dial. minny, minnie (cf. equiv. dial. minim, minnan, mennam, menom, appar. conformed to L. minimus, least: see minim); < ME. menow, a minnow, appar. < AS. *mine, myne (pl. mynas), a minnow (glossed by ML. mena); possibly from the root of *min*², less, with ME. term. -ow due to confusion with some other word, perhaps OF. menu, small; cf. ME. menuse, small fish, < OF. menuise (ML. menusia), small fish collectively, < L. minutus, small: see *menuse*².] 1. The smallest of the British cyprinoid fishes, Phoxinus

Common English Minnow (Phoxinus phoxinus).

aphya or levis. Artificial minnows are used by anglers for trolling, spinning, or casting, and are made of metal, glass, and rubber, gilded, silvered, or painted attractively.

Hear you this Triton of the minnows?

Shak., Cor., III. 1. 80.

2. In the United States, one of many different fishes of small size. (a) Any cyprinoid of the genus Phoxinus, of which there are several species, from 1½ to 3 inches long, in the Mississippi basin and westward, as P. neogaeus, P. flammescens, P. phlegathontia. This is the correct use of minnow, though in popular speech it extends to various other little cyprinoids, also loosely called roach, dace, shiner, etc. Among these may be mentioned the red minnows of the genus Cheostomus, as C. erythrogaster, one of the prettiest of all, 2 or 3 inches long; the silvery minnow, Hybognathus nuchalis, and others of this genus; the black-headed minnow or fathead, Pimephales promelas; the blunt-nosed minnow, Hyborthynchus notatus; the Texas hardmouth minnow, Cochlognathus ornatus; the bull-headed and straw-colored minnows, Ciliata taurocephalus and C. straminea; the spotted-tail, C. stig-maturus, and more than 60 other kinds of Ciliata; about 50 shiners of the genus Minnius; various species of the genera Rhinichthys, Ceraticthys, Apocope, Couesius, etc. These abound in fresh waters of the United States, and minnow is the usual name of all those which have not more particular designations. (b) One of numerous small cyprinodont fishes, otherwise known as kilifishes and munmychogs, and more fully called top-minnows, as Zygonectes notatus and many others of this genus. The most abundant of these is Fundulus heteroclitus, found in brackish waters from Maine to Mexico, and sometimes specified as salt-water minnow. P. diaphanus is the spring minnow. (c) Any American member of the family Umbrellidae and genus Umbra or Melanura, as U. or M. limi, more fully called mud-minnow, 4 inches long, found from New England to Minnesota and South Carolina, often in mere mud-holes which would hardly be expected to lodge any fish. It is closely related to U. cramerii of Austria. (d) One of various small viviparous perches or embiotocoid fishes of California, chiefly of salt water, as the sparada, Micrometrus or Cymatogaster aggregatus. (e) One of several small suckers or catostomoid fishes: a loose use.

minnow-harness (min'ô-här'nes), n. An artificial bait used for trolling to which a minnow can be attached.

minny (min'i), n. A provincial form of minnow. mino¹ (mē'nô), n. [Jap.] A thatch-like rain-coat or cape made of hempen fibers, long grass, rushes, or the like laid close together, and bound in place at the top by plaiting or by some similar means: used in Japan by coolies, farm-laborers, etc.

mino² (mī'nô), n. A variant of *mina*².

minor (mī'ngr), a. and n. [< ME. *minour, menour, < OF. menor, F. mineur = Sp. Pg. menor = It. minore, < L. minor (neut. minus), less, compar. (with superl. minimus, least: see minim, minimum, etc.) associated with adj. parvus, small; = AS. min = OS. minniro, etc., less: see *min*².] I. a. 1. Smaller (than the other); less; lesser: applied definitively to one of two units or parts, and opposed to major or greater: as, the minor axis of an ellipse; the minor premise of a syllogism; the minor part of an estate.

They altered this custom from cases of high concernment to the most trivial debates, the minor part ordinarily entering their protest. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

2. Smaller than others; of inferior rank or degree; lower; hence, small; inconsiderable; not capital, serious, or weighty: as, the minor officers of government; a minor canon; the minor points of an argument; minor faults or considerations.

Now frere menour, now jacobyn.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 6338.

Neither in the name of multitude do I only include the base and minor sort of people.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, II. 1.

Inconsistency with respect to questions of minor importance is not likely to be regarded as dishonourable.

Macaulay, Sir W. Temple.

3. Under age. [Rare.]

At which time . . . the king was minor.

Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 145.

4. In music: (a) Of intervals, less; shorter; smaller (as compared with major intervals). The word is more often applied to seconds, thirds, sixths, sevenths, ninths, etc., designating an interval equal to the corresponding major interval less one half-step. It has also been applied of late to fourths, fifths, and eighths, and is then equivalent to the older term diminished. Finally, it is used to designate the smaller of two intervals that differ by a minute quantity, as a minor tone (10:9), which is a comma less than a major tone: opposed to major. See interval, 5. (b) Of tonalities and scales, characterized by a minor third and also usually by a minor sixth, and often a minor seventh: opposed to major. See key, tonality, scale. (c) Of triads and chords generally, characterized by a minor third between the lowest and the next to the lowest tones: opposed to major. See triad, and chord, 4. (d) Of modes, characterized by the use of a minor tonality and of minor cadences: as, the piece is written throughout in the minor mode: opposed to major. See major, 4. — Bob minor. See *bob*¹, 7. — Minor abstraction. See abstraction. — Minor axis. Same as conjugate axis (which see, under axis). — Minor canon, determinant, ex-communication. See the nouns. — Minor orders (eccl.). See order. — Minor premise, that premise which contains the minor term. This is the usual definition, but there has been much dispute on the subject. See major, 5. — Minor prophets, a name given collectively to twelve prophetic Old Testament books, from Hosea to Malachi, inclusive, and their authors. See prophet. — Minor term, in logic, the subject of the conclusion of a categorical syllogism.

II. n. 1. A person of either sex who is under age; one who is of less than the legal age for the performance of certain acts; one under the authority of parents or guardians, because of not having reached the age at which the law permits one to make contracts and manage one's own property; an infant in the legal sense. In Scots law, minor, when used in contradistinction to pupul, signifies a person above the age of pupilarity (twelve in females and fourteen in males) and under that of majority, which in both sexes is twenty-one years. The technical term in English and United States law for one under the age of legal capacity (twenty-one years) is infant, but minor is used in the same sense in general literature. Compare age, n., 3.

Long as the year's dull circle seems to run,
When the briak minor pants for twenty-one.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, l. 1. 38.

King Henry, although old enough at seven to be crowned, was still a minor.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 173.

2. In logic, the minor term, or the minor premise. See I.—3. In music, the minor mode or a minor tonality or minor chord taken absolutely.

In all your music our pathetic minor
Your ears shall cross.

Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

4. [cap.] A Franciscan friar; a Minorite: so called from a name of the Franciscan order, Fratres Minores, or Lesser Brethren. Also called Friar Minor. — Minor of a determinant. See determinant. — Rosy minor a species of moth. See Miana. minorate (mī'nô-rät), v. t. [< LL. minoratus, pp. of minorare (< It. minorare = Sp. Pg. minorar, make less), diminish, < L. minor, less: see minor.] To diminish.

Which [sense] doth not only by the advantageous assistance of a tute, but by less industrious experiments, showing in what degrees distance minorates the object. Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, viii.

minoration (mī-nō-rā'shōn), n. [= F. minoration = Sp. minoración = Pg. minoração = It. minorazione, < LL. minoratio(n), diminution, < minorare, diminish: see minorate.] 1†. A lessening; diminution.

We now do hope the mercies of God will consider our degenerated integrity unto some minoration of our offences.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 2.

2. In med., mild purgation by laxatives.

minorative (mī-nō-rā-tiv), a. and n. [= F. minoratif, minorativo, = Sp. Pg. minorativo, lessening, = It. minorativo, minorative; as minoration + -ive.] 1. a. Mildly laxative: applied to certain medicines.

II. n. A mildly laxative medicine.

For a minorative or gentle potion he took four hundred pound weight of colophonise scammony.
Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, ii. 83. (Davies.)

minoreess (mī-nōr-ēs), n. [< minor + -ess.] 1. A female under age.—2†. A nun under the rule of St. Clare. (Tyruwhitt.) [This word is found in the early printed editions of the "Romance of the Rose," l. 149. Moreesse appears in modern editions taken from the original French (Rom. of the Rose, l. 141).]

Minorite (mī-nōr-it), n. and a. [< minor + -ite.] 1. n. A Franciscan friar; a Minor. See minor, n., 4.

Some minorites among the clergy.
Sp. Hackel, Abp. Williams, ii. 202. (Davies.)

II. a. Belonging to the Franciscans.

Few movements within the bosom of the Church were more pregnant with auspicious augury for its reformation than the rise of the Minorite orders.
J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, ii. 381.

minority (mī- or mī-nōr-i-ti), n.; pl. minorities (-tiz). [= F. minorité = Pr. menorat = Sp. minoridad = Pg. minoridade = It. minorità, < ML. minorita(-t)s, a being less, minority, < L. minor, less: see minor.] 1†. The state of being minor or smaller.

From this narrow time of gestation [may] ensue a minority or smallness in the exclusion.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 6.

2. The minor part in number; the smaller of two aggregates into which a whole is divided numerically; a number less than half: opposed to majority.

That minority of the Scottish nation by the aid of which the government had hitherto held the majority down.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

Remember, sir, that everything great and excellent is in minorities.
Emerson, Address to Kossuth.

Specifically—3. The smaller of two related aggregates of persons; the minor division of any whole number of persons: as, the rights of the minority; government by minorities.

To give the minority a negative upon the majority, which is always the case where more than a majority is requisite to a decision, is . . . to subject the sense of the greater number to that of the lesser.

A. Hamilton, The Federalist, No. 22.

4. The state of being a minor or not come of age, and therefore legally incapacitated for the performance of certain acts; the period or interval before one is of full age, generally the period from birth until twenty-one years of age (see age, 3); in Scots law, the interval between pupilarity and majority. See minor, n., 1.

What mean all those hard restraints and shackles put upon us in our minority.
South, Works, iv. v.

King Edmund dying, his brother Edred in the Minority of his Nephews was crowned at Kingston upon Thames.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 11.

Minority representation. See proportional representation, under representation.

minorship (mī-nōr-ship), n. [< minor + -ship.]

The state of being a minor.

Minotaur (mī-nō-tār), n. [< ME. Minotaur, < OF. Minotaur, F. Minotaure = Sp. Pg. It. Minotaurus, < L. Minotaurus, < Gr. Μινόταυρος, the Minotaur, appar. < Μίνω, Minos, a legendary king and lawgiver of Crete, + ταύρος, a bull. But this is perhaps a popular etym. of some name not understood.] In Gr. myth., a monster represented as having a human body and the head of a bull, who was the offspring of Pasiphaë, wife of Minos, and a bull sent by Poseidon. He was confined in the Cretan labyrinth and fed with human flesh, devoured the seven youths and seven maidens whom Minos compelled the Athenians to send him periodically as tribute, and was killed by the hero Theseus, a member of the last company so sent, who escaped from the labyrinth by the aid of Ariadne, daughter of Minos. Hence, in modern literature, the name is used to characterize any devouring or destroying agency of which the action is in some way comparable to that attributed to the Cretan monster.

And by his [Theseus's] baner born is his penoun
Of gold ful riche, in which there was i-bete
The Minotaur which that he slough in Crete.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 122.

Thou may'st not wander in that labyrinth:
There Minotaurs and ugly treasons lurk.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 3. 189.

minour, n. A Middle English form of miner.

minstivet, a. [Appar. irreg. < minse, mince, + -ive.] Mincing; affected; servile.

Never say, your lordship, nor your honour; but you, and you, my lord, and my lady: the other they count too simple and minstivet.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iv. 1.

minster (mīn'stēr), n. [< ME. minster, mynster, munster, menstre, etc., < AS. mynster = D. munster = MLG. munster = OHG. munusturi, munistri, monastri, MHG. G. münster = OF. mustier, moustier, F. moultier, < LL. monasterium, < Gr. μοναστήριον, a monastery: see monastery.] Originally, a monastery; afterward, the church of a monastery; also, from the fact that many such churches, especially in Great Britain, became cathedrals, a cathedral church which had such an origin: as, York minster; hence, any cathedral: as, the minster of Strasburg. It is found also in the names of several places which owe their origin to a monastery: as, Westminster, Leominster.

The same nyght the kyng comaunded the children to go wake in the cheif mynster till on the morowe before messe, that no longer he wolde a-bide.
Mertin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 374.

The Ages one great minster seem,
That throbs with praise and prayer.
Lovell, Godminster Chimes.

minstraciet, n. An old form of minstrelsy.

minstrel (mīn'strēl), n. [< ME. minstrel, mynstrelle, minstral, mynstral, munstral, munstral, menestrel, < OF. menestrel, menestrel, menesterel, F. ménestrel = Pr. menestral = Sp. menestral, menestril, minstrel = Pg. minstrel, menestrel, menistrel = It. minstrello, minestrello, < ML. ministralis (also, after Rom., ministrelus), a servant, retainer, jester, singer, player, < L. minister, a servant, attendant: see minister. Cf. ML. ministerialis in same sense, < ministerium, service: see ministerial.] 1. A musician, especially one who sings or recites to the accompaniment of instruments. Specifically, in the middle ages, the minstrels were a class who devoted themselves to the amusement of the great in castle or camp by singing ballads or songs of love and war, sometimes of their own composition, with accompaniment on the harp, lute, or other instrument, together with suitable mimicry and action, and also by storytelling, etc. The intermediate class of professional musicians from which the later minstrels sprang appeared in France as early as the eighth century, and was by the Norman conquest introduced into England, where it was assimilated with the Anglo-Saxon gleemen. Everywhere the social importance of the minstrels slowly degenerated, until in the fifteenth century they had formed themselves generally into guilds of itinerant popular musicians and mountebanks. In England they fell so low in esteem that in 1597 they were classed by a statute with rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars; but in France their guilds were maintained until the revolution. See gleeman, troubadour, trouvère, and jongleur.

When the service was fynished, the kyng Arthur and the Barouns returned in to the paleys, where-as was grete plente of mynstralles, and logelours, and other.
Mertin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 454.

Ye'll g'e the third to the minstrel
That plays before the king.
Young Akin (Child's Ballads), l. 184.

Wake ye from your sleep of death,
Minstrels and bards of other days!
Scott, Bard's Incantation.

But while the minstrel proper accompanied his lord to the field and shared with him the danger and the honour of his warlike exploits, the connection between him and the humbler kind of entertainer [the jongleur], who was still the servant of the multitude rather than of a particular lord, cannot have been wholly forgotten.
A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., i. 13.

Hence—2. Any poet or musician. [Poetical.]

—3. Originally, one of a class of singers of negro melodies and delineators of life on the Southern plantations which originated in the United States about 1830: called negro minstrels, although they are usually white men whose faces and hands are blackened with burnt cork. The characteristic feature of such a troupe or band is the middle-man or interlocutor, who leads the talk and gives the cues, and the two end-men, who usually perform on the tambourine and the bones, and between whom the indispensable conundrums and jokes are exchanged.

changed. As now constituted, a negro-minstrel troupe retains but little of its original character except the black faces and the old jokes.

minstrel-squire (mīn'strēl-skwir), n. A minstrel who was attached to one particular person.

minstrelsy (mīn'strēl-si), n. [< ME. minstral-cie, mynstralcy, menstralcy, minstracie, menstracye, etc., < OF. menestralcie, minstrelsy, < menestral, minstrel: see minstrel.] 1. The art or occupation of minstrels; singing and playing in the manner of a minstrel; lyrical song and music.

Holliche thanne with his host hizede to here tentes
With merthe of alle menestracie, and made hem attese.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1296.

When every room
Hath blaz'd with lights and bray'd with minstrelsy.
Shak., T. of A., ii. 2. 170.

Originally . . . the profession of the jocularist included all the arts attributed to the minstrels; and accordingly his performance was called his minstrelsy in the reign of Edward II., and even after he had obtained the appellation of a tragetour. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 287.

2. An assemblage or company of minstrels; a body of singers and players.

So many maner minstracie at that mariage were.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 5010.

The bride hath paced into the hall—
Red as a rose is she!
Nodding their heads before her goes
The merry minstrelsy.
Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, l.

3†. A collection of instruments used by minstrels.

For sorwe of which he brak his minstralcie,
Bothe harpe and lute, and giterne and saultra.
Chaucer, Manciple's Tale, l. 163.

Lutte and rybybe, bothe gangande,
And all manere of mynstraleye.
Thomas of Erseeldoune (Child's Ballads), l. 106.

4. A collection or body of lyrical songs and ballad poetry, such as were sung by minstrels: as, Scott's "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border."

The body of traditional minstrelsy which commemorated the heroic deeds performed in these wars.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., Int.

mint¹ (mīnt), n. [< ME. mint, mynt, menet, munet, < AS. mynet, mynit, mynyt (not mynt*), a coin, coin, coinage, money (cf. mynet-smiththe, a place for coinage, a mint), = OFries. menote, mente, monte, munte = D. munt = MLG. LG. munte, monte = OHG. muniza, muniz, MHG. G. münze, a place for coining money, a coin, = Icel. mynt, mint, = Sw. mynt, a place for coining money, a coin, money, = Dan. mynt, a coin, money, mönt, a place for coining money, = OF. monete, monote, F. monnaie (> E. money) = Pr. Sp. moneda = Pg. moeda = It. moneta, money, < L. moneta, a place for coining money, money, coin, < Moneta, a surname of Juno, in whose temple at Rome money was coined, lit. adviser, < monere, warn, advise: see monish, monitor. Cf. money, a doublet of mint.] 1†. A coin; coin; coined money; money.

Thes if me spende, or mynt for them receyve,
The sonner wol they brymme ayelne and brynge Forth pigges moo.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

2. A place where money is coined by public authority. The coining of money is now considered a prerogative of government. In early times there were many mints in England, but now the only one in that country is the Royal Mint, Tower Hill, London. The United States Mint was established by act of April 2d, 1792, and located at Philadelphia. Other mints have since been established at San Francisco, New Orleans, Carson City, and Denver (but the last two are, properly speaking, assay offices). The United States Mint is a bureau of the Treasury Department, under the charge of an officer called the Director of the Mint.

And so (vpon the matter) to set the mint on work, and to giue way to new coines of siluer, which should bee then minted.
Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 215.

In one higher roome of this Mint . . . I saw fourteene marvellous strong chests, . . . in which is kept nothing but money.
Coryat, Crudities, l. 242.

3. Figuratively, a source of fabrication or invention.

And haue a mint in their pragmaticall heads of such supersubtle inuentions.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 393.

The busy mint
Of our laborious thoughts is ever going.
And coining new desires. Quarles, Emblems, ii. 2.

4. A quantity such as a mint turns out; a great supply or store: as, a mint of money.

And so tasselled and so ruffled with a mint of bravery.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, p. 129.

5. [cap.] A place of privilege or asylum in Southwark, London, near the Queen's Prison, where persons sheltered themselves from justice, under the pretext that this place was an ancient palace of the crown. (Rapalje and Lawrence.) The privilege is now abolished.—

Minstrel.—From the Maison des Musiciens, Rheims, France; 13th century.

Master of the mint, an officer in the English administration who presided over the mint. The office has been abolished, the mint being now under the direct control of the chancellor of the exchequer.—Warden of the mint, formerly, an officer of the English mint next in rank to the master. He collected the seigniorage, and superintended the manufacture of the coins.

mint¹ (mint), v. t. [*< ME. *mīnten, myn̄ten, < AS. mynnetian (= OS. munitōn = OFries. muntia, muntia = D. MLG. muntion = OHG. munison, MHG. G. münzen = Sw. mynta = Dan. mynte), coin, < mynet, a coin: see mint¹, n.] 1. To coin; stamp and convert into money.

Silver and gold coyns, then mynted of purpose, was cast among the people in great quantitie.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 467.

A sovereign prince calls in the good old money . . . to be new marked and minted.
Lamb, Ella, p. 218.

2. To invent; forge; fabricate.

Look into the titles whereby they hold those new portions of the crown, and you will find them of such natures as may be easily minted.
Bacon, War with Spain.

And such mint [minted] phrase, as 'tis the worst of canting, By how much it affects the sense it has not.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, iv. 1.
A full catalogue of exotic words, such as are daily minted by our Logodædali.
 Evelyn, To Sir Peter Wyche.

mint² (mint), n. [< ME. mīnte, mynte, mente, < AS. mīnte = MD. D. munt = LG. mynte, mīnte = OHG. mīnza, mūnza, MHG. G. mīnzo, mūnzo = Icel. mīnta = Sw. mynta = Dan. mynte (= F. menthe, > Sp. It. menta), < L. menta, mentha, < Gr. μίνθα, μίνθη, mint.] 1. A plant of the genus Mentha. The most familiar species are the peppermint, M. piperita, and the spearmint (garden-mint, mackerelmint), M. viridis, well known as medicines and condiments. The bergamot-mint, affording a perfumers' oil, is M. aquatica; the crisped or curled mint, the variety crispa of the same. The water-mint (or brook-mint) of older usage was M. sylvestris, now called horsemint. The corn-mint is M. arvensis. The pennyroyal-mint or pennyroyal is M. pulegium—that is, sea-mint. The whorled mint is M. sativa; the wild mint of the United States, M. Canadensis. See cut under Mentha.

The mynte is in this moone yswa.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 192.

Then rubb'd it o'er with newly gather'd mint,

A wholesome herb, that breath'd a grateful scent.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., viii. 88.

2. One of several other, mostly labiate, plants with mint-like properties. Compare catmint.—Green mint, a cordial flavored with peppermint.—Mint julep. See julep.

mint³ (mint), v. i. [< ME. mīnten, menten, myn̄ten, < AS. myntan, gemyntan, mean, intend, purpose, think, suppose, < mūnan (pres. man), think, consider, remember: see mine³, mind¹.] 1. To aim; purpose; endeavor. [Old Eng. and Scotch.]

Wyth grete wrath he can mynte,

But he fayled of hys dynte.

MS. Cantab. Ff. II. 88, l. 189. (Halliwell.)

They that mint at a gown of gold will always get a sleeve of it.

Scott, Monastery, xvii.

2. To insinuate; hint. [Scotch.]

mintage (min'tāj), n. [< mint¹ + -age. Cf. F. monnayage = It. monetaggio, < ML. monetagium, < L. moneta, money: see money, monetage.] 1. The act of coining or fabricating; formation; production by or as if by minting.

Few literary theories of modern mintage have more to recommend them. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 15.

The chief place of mintage in these regions was the great trading and colonizing city of Miletus.

B. F. Head, Historia Numorum, Int., p. xli.

2. That which is minted, or formed by or as if by coining or stamping; hence, a fabrication or manufacture; a coinage.

Stamped in clay, a heavenly mintage.

Sterling.

Of one of his mintages [coined words] Mr. Reade is, apparently, not a little proud.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 26.

3. The charge for or cost of minting; the duty or allowance for coinage; seigniorage on coins.

Some small savings would accrue from the less amount of mintage required.

Jevons, Money, p. 168.

mint-bush (mint'būsh), n. A plant of the Australian genus Prostanthera.

mint-drop (mint'drop), n. 1. A sugar-plum flavored with peppermint.—2. A coin. [Slang, U. S.]

minter (min'tēr), n. [< ME. mīnter, < AS. myn̄tere, one who coins, one who deals in money, a money-changer, = OS. muniteri, a money-changer, = OFries. menotere, mentere, mēntre, munter = D. munter, munster = MLG. munter, = OHG. munizari, MHG. munzer, G. münzer, a money-changer, = F. monnayeur = It. monetiere, < LL. monetarius, a master of the mint, a coiner, < L. moneta, mint, money, coin: see mint¹ and money. Cf. moneyer and monetary.] A coiner; one who mints or stamps coin; hence, one who fabricates or makes as if by coining.

Since priests have been mīnters, money hath been worse than it was before.

Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

The mīnter must adde of other weight . . . if the siluer be so pure.

Camden, Remains, p. 204.

God stamped his image upon us, and so God is . . . our mīnter, our statuary.

Donne, Sermons, vii.

mint¹, n. An obsolete variant of mint².

The primrose, and the purple hyacinth,

The dainty violet, and the wholesome mīnt¹.

Peele, Arraignment of Paris, l. 1.

mintjac (mint'jak), n. Same as muntjac. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 602.

mint-julep (mint'jū'lep), n. See julep.

They were great roysters, much given to revel on hock-cake and bacon, mint-julep and apple-toddy.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 247.

mintmant (mint'man), n. A coiner; one skilled in coining or in coins.

Let such as are to inform councils out of their particular professions (as lawyers, sea-men, mint-men, and the like) be first heard before committees.

Bacon, Of Counsel (ed. 1887).

mint-mark (mint'märk), n. A private mark put upon coins by the mint authorities for purposes of identification. Sometimes this mark indicates the place of mintage, as "S" on certain sovereigns of Queen Victoria, denoting that the pieces were coined at Sydney in Australia; sometimes it relates to the mint-master or other official.

mint-master (mint'mās'tēr), n. [= D. munt-meester = MHG. G. münzmeister = Sw. mynt-mästare = Dan. myntmester; as mint¹ + master.] 1. The master or superintendent of a mint.

That which is coined, as mintmasters confessed, is alloyed with about a twelfth part of copper.

Boyle.

2. One who invents or fabricates.

That the Jewes were forward Mint-Masters in this new-coyned Religion of Mahomet. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 283.

Setting aside the odde coinage of your phrase, which no mintmaster of language would allow for sterling.

Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

mint-sauce (mint'sās'), n. In cookery, mint chopped and mixed with vinegar and sugar, used especially as a sauce for roast lamb.

mint-stick (mint'stik), n. Sticks of candy flavored with peppermint. [Local, U. S.]

The soldiers hunger for dates, figs, mint-stick, . . . that the sutler keeps for sale.

New York Tribune, June 13, 1892. (Barlett.)

mint-tree (mint'trē), n. A plant of the Australian genus Prostanthera, especially P. lasiantha.

mint-warden (mint'wār'dn), n. See warden of the mint, under mint.

mint-while, n. Same as minute-while.

minuend (min'ū-ēnd), n. [< L. minuendus, to be diminished, gerundive of minuere, lessen: see minute¹.] In arith., the number from which another number is to be deducted in the process of subtraction.

minuet (min'ū-et), n. [= Sp. minuete, minué = Pg. minuete = It. minueto, < F. menuet, a dance so called from the small steps taken in it, < menuet, smallish, little, pretty, thin (Cotgrave), dim. of menu, small, < L. minutus, small: see minute¹.] 1. A slow and graceful dance, invented, probably in Poitou, France, about the middle of the seventeenth century. Throughout the eighteenth century it was the most popular of the more stately and ceremonious dances.—2.

Music for such a dance, or in its rhythm, which is triple and slow. Minuets are frequently found in the old suite, and also in the later sonata and symphony. They properly consist of two contrasted sections of sixteen measures each, the second of which is generally called a trio, because originally written for but three instruments; but this regular form is often considerably modified. Beethoven was the first to replace the minuet in the sonata and the symphony by the scherzo, which resembled the minuet somewhat in rhythm, but was more sprightly and unrestricted in form and spirit.

minum, n. An obsolete form of minim. Cotgrave.

minus (mī'nus), a. [< L. minus, neut. of minor, less: see minor.] 1. Less (by a certain amount): followed by a noun as an apparent object (a preposition, by, to be supplied): as, the net amount is so much minus the waste or tare; 25 minus 9 is 16. In algebra and arithmetic this sense is indicated by the sign —, called the minus sign or sign of subtraction: as, $a - b = x$, which is read " a minus b equals x "; $25 - 9 = 16$.

2. Less than nothing; belonging to the inverse or negative side, as of an account; lying in the direction from the origin of measurement opposite to ordinary quantities; below zero, or below the lowest point of positive or upward reckoning: as, a minus amount or sum (that is, an amount or sum representing loss or debt); a minus quantity in an equation (that is, one having the minus sign before it); the temperature was minus twenty degrees (written — 20°, and read "twenty degrees below zero"). In some common mathematical phrases, minus seems to be used as an adverb modifying the numeral adjective. Thus astronomers speak of the year minus 584 of the Christian era, meaning 585 A. C.

3. Marking or yielding less than nothing or less than zero; negative in value or result: as, the minus sign (see def. 1).—4. Deprived or devoid of; not having; without, as something necessary: as, he escaped minus his hat and coat; a gun minus its lock. [Colloq. or humorous.]—5. Lacking positive value; wanting. [Colloq.]

His mathematics are decidedly minus, but the use of them is past long ago. C. A. Bristol, English University, p. 74.

Minus acceleration. See acceleration (b).

minuscule (mi-nus'kū-lā), n.; pl. minuscule (-lā). [NL.: see minuscule.] Same as minuscule.

minuscule (mi-nus'kūl), a. and n. [= F. minuscule = Sp. minúscula = Pg. It. minúsculo, < NL. minúscula (sc. littera), fem. of L. minúsculus, rather small; dim. of minor, minus, less: see minor, minus. Cf. majuscule.] 1. a. Small; of reduced form, as a letter; of or pertaining to writing in minuscule.

Minuscule letters are cursive forms of the earlier uncials.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 71.

II. n. The kind of reduced alphabetical character which, originating in the seventh century, was from about the ninth substituted in writing for the large uncial previously in use, and from which the small letter of modern Greek and Roman alphabets was derived; hence, a small or lower-case letter in writing or printing, as distinguished from a capital or majuscule.

The minuscule arose in the 7th century as a cursive monastic script, more legible than the old uncial, and more rapidly written than the uncial, and constructed by a combination of the elements of both.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 160.

The period of the uncials runs from the date of the earliest specimens on papyrus to the 9th century, that of the minuscule from the 9th century to the invention of printing.

Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 146.

minutary (min'ī-tā-ri), a. [< minute², n., + -ary.] Consisting of minutes. [Rare.]

This their clock gathering up the least crumb of time, presenting the minutary fractions thereof.

Fuller, Worthies, Berkshire.

minute¹ (mi-nūt'), a. [= F. menu = Pr. menuet = Sp. menudo = Pg. mudo = It. minuto, < L. minutus, little, small, minute, pp. of minuere, make smaller, lessen, diminish, < minu-, stem of minor, smaller, less, minimus, smallest, least: see minor and min².] 1. Very small, diminutive, or limited; extremely little in dimensions, extent, or amount.

We have also glasses and means to see small and minute bodies perfectly and distinctly.

Bacon, New Atlantis.

He was fond of detail—no little thing was too minute for his delicate eye.

Theodore Parker, Historic Americans, Washington.

2. Very small in scope or degree; relating to or consisting of small points or matters; particular; closely precise or exact: as, minute details of directions; minute criticism.—3. Attending to very small particulars; marking or noting little things or precise details; very close or careful: as, minute observation.

These minute philosophers . . . plunder all who come in their way.

Berkeley, Minute Philosopher, I.

If we wish to be very minute, we pronounce the i in the first syllable long.

Walker.

Bacon was fond of display, and unused to pay minute attention to domestic affairs.

Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

Minute anatomy. See anatomy.—Syn. 1. Little, diminutive, slender, fine.—2. Circumstantial, Particular, Minute, exact, detailed. A circumstantial account gives the facts in detail; while circumstantial may include only the leading circumstances, a particular account gleams more closely, gathering all that are of any importance or interest; a minute account details even the slightest facts, perhaps those that are trivial and tedious.

minute² (min'it), n. and a. [< ME. minute, mynute, mynet (in comp. also mynt), a minute (of time), a moment (also a small piece of money), = MD. minute, D. minuut = G. minute = Sw. Dan. minut, < OF. minute, F. minute, f., = Sp. Pg. It. minuto, < LL. minutum, a small portion or piece, ML., a small part (of time), a minute, neut. of minutus, small: see minute¹.] 1. n. 1. Something very small; an unimportant particular; a petty detail; a trifle; specifically, a mite or half-farthing.

But whanne a pore widewe was come, sche cast two myntis, that is, a fetherling.

Wyck, Mark xli. 42.

Let me hear from thee every minute of news.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, I. 2.

Curious of minutes, and punctual in rites and ceremonials, but most negligent and incurious of judgment and the love of God.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1836), I. 268.

2. The sixtieth part of any unit. Especially—(a) The sixtieth part of an hour; loosely, a short space of time.

Every degree of the bordure containeth 4 minutes—that is to say, minutes of an hour. Chaucer, Astrolabe.

For the lachesse
Of half a minute of an hour,
Fro first he began labour,
He loste all that he had do.

Gower, Conf. Amant, iv.

Nor all the pleasures there
Her mind could ever move one minute's stay to make.
Drayton, Polyolbion, vi. 53.

(b) In geom., the sixtieth part of a degree of a circle. Division of units by sixtieths is the characteristic of the Babylonian system. Ptolemy, following the Babylonian astronomers, divides the diameter of the circle into 120 tmemata or degrees, and these into sixty parts and these again into sixty parts. These subdivisions were translated into Latin as partes minutae primae and partes minutae secundae, whence our minutes (primes) and seconds. In modern astronomical works minutes of time are denoted by the initial letter m, and minutes of a degree or of angular space by an acute accent ('). See degree, 8.

After goynge be See and be Londe toward this Contree of that I have spoke, and to other Yles and Landes beyond that Contree, I have founden the Sterre Antaryk of 38 Degrees of heghte, and mo myminutes.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 181.

(c) In arch., the sixtieth part of the diameter of a column at the base, being a subdivision used for measuring the minute parts of an order. See module.

3. A written summary of an agreement or of a transaction, interview, or proceedings; a note to preserve the memory of anything: usually in the plural. Specifically, the minutes are the record of the proceedings at a meeting of a corporation, board, society, church court, or other deliberative body, put in writing by its secretary or other recording officer.

When I came to my chambers, I writ down these minutes.
Steele, Spectator, No. 454.

Into all the duties he had to perform he brought what is better than "Treasury minute" or rule or precedent—a warm heart, a careful conscience, and a good head.
Westminster Rev., CXXV. 92.

= Syn. Instant, etc. See moment.

II. a. 1. Repeated every minute: as, a minute gun.—2. Made in a minute or a very short time: as, a minute pudding; minute beer.—Minute bell, a bell tolled at intervals of a minute as a sign of mourning.—Minute gun, one of a series of discharges of cannon separated by intervals of a minute, in token of mourning, as at the funeral of a military officer of rank, or of distress, as on board a vessel at sea.

*minute*² (min'it), v. t.; pret. and pp. minuted, ppr. minuting. [*< minute*², n.] To set down in a short sketch or note; make a minute or memorandum of; enter in the minutes or record of transactions of a corporation, etc.

I no sooner heard this critick talk of my works but I minuted what he had said, and resolved to enlarge the plan of my speculations.
Spectator.

There stands a city!
Perhaps 'tis also requisite to minute
That there's a Castle and a Cobbler in it.
Berham, Ingoldsbay Legends, I. 90.

minute-wheel (min'it-hwél), n. Same as dial-wheel. E. H. Knight.

minute-while (min'it-hwíl), n. [ME. mynet-while, mynetwhile; *< minute*² + while.] A minute's time; a moment.

Ysekeles [icicles] in eusses, thorw hete of the sonne, Melteth in a mynt-while to myst and to watre.
Piers Plowman (B), xvii. 228.

A guard of chosen shot I had
That walked about me every minute while.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., I. 4. 54.

minutia (mi-nū'shi-ä), n.; pl. minutiae (-ë). [= F. minutie = Sp. Pg. minucia = It. minuzia, < L. minutia, smallness, pl. minutiae, small matters, trifles, < minutus, small: see *minute*¹, a.] A small particular or detail; a minute or trivial matter of fact: generally in the plural.

I can see the precise and distinguishing marks of national characters more in these nonsensical minutiae than in the most important matters of state.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 51.

minutiose (mi-nū'shi-ös), a. [= F. minutieux = Sp. Pg. minucioso = It. minutioso, < ML. as if "minutiosus", < L. minutia, smallness: see minutia.] Giving or dealing with minutiae or minute particulars.

More than once I have ventured, in print, . . . an expression like "minutiose investigations," which seems to me to be not only unexceptionable, but much needed.
F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 168.

minutissimic (min-ü-tis'i-mik), a. [< L. minutissimus, superl. of minutus, small (see *minute*¹), + -ic.] Extremely small. [Rare.]

Of these minutissimic yet adult forms, more than fifteen are Gastropoda.
Amer. Nat., XXII. 1014.

*minx*¹ (mings), n. [Formerly minks, mynze; a reduced form of minken, with added -s (as also mawke, for mawkin, malkin).] 1. A pert girl; a hussy; a jade; a baggage.

Mar. Get him to say his prayers, good Sir Toby, get him to pray.
Mal. My prayers, minx! Shak., T. N., III. 4. 183.

Why, you little provoking minx!
Sheridan, St. Patrick's Day, I. 2.

2. A female puppy.
*minx*² (mings), n. [Also minks; an erroneous form of mink, due to the pl., or perhaps (as NL. minx) to conformation with lynx: see mink.] Same as mink.

minx-otter (mings'ot'er), n. The mink.

miny (mī'ni), a. [*< mine*², n., + *-y*¹.] 1. Abounding with mines.—2. Of the nature of a mine or excavation in the earth.

The miny caverns, blazing on the day,
Of Abyssinia's cloud-compelling cliffs.
Thomson, Autumn, I. 790.

Miocene (mī'ō-sēn), a. and n. [= F. miocène, < Gr. μειων, less, + καινός, recent.] 1. a. In geol., one of Lyell's subdivisions of the Tertiary. See Tertiary.

II. n. In geol., the Miocene strata. Also spelled Meiocene.

Miocenic (mī'ō-sen'ik), a. [< Miocene + -ic.] Miocene. Also spelled Meiocenic.

M. Gaudry drew attention to a gigantic animal of the middle of the miocenic period of the Wyoming.
Lancet, No. 3436, p. 45.

Miohippus (mī'ō-hip'us), n. [Also Meiohippus; NL., < E. Mio(cene) + Gr. ἵππος, horse.] A genus of fossil perissodactyl ungulates referred to the family Equidae, occurring in the Miocene strata of North America. These animals were about the size of sheep.

mionite, melonite (mī'ō-nit), n. [So called from its low pyramids; < Gr. μειων, less, + -ίτης.] A mineral of the scapolite group, occurring on Monte Somma, Vesuvius, in transparent colorless tetragonal crystals.

Mionornis (mī'ō-nōr'nis), n. [NL., < Gr. μειων, less, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of sub-fossil dinornithic birds of New Zealand, of the family Dinornithidae, including two species separated from the genus Dinornis by Julius Haast in 1874. Also Meionornis.

miophylly (mī'ō-fil-i), n. [< Gr. μειων, less, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A diminution of the normal number of leaves in a whorl, due to actual suppression. It differs from abortion in the suppressed organs having never started to grow. Miophylly occurs also in the calyx, corolla, androecium, and gynoecium. Also spelled metophylly.

miosis (mī'ō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μειωσις, a lessening, < μειων, lessen, < μειων, less, irreg. compar. of μικρός, small, or ὀλίγος, few.] Diminution. Specifically—(a) In anat.: (1) A figure by which a thing is represented as less than it really is, as in belittling an opponent's statement, affecting to scorn an accusation, etc. (2) Understatement so as to intensify; especially, expression by negation of the opposite; litotes. (b) In pathol., that period of a disease in which the symptoms begin to diminish. Also meiosis.

miostemonous (mī'ō-stem'ō-nus), a. [< Gr. μειων, less, + στέμον, for 'stamen': see stamen.] Having the stamens less in number than the petals: said of plants. Also meiostemonous.

miotaxy (mī'ō-tak-si), n. [NL., < Gr. μειων, less, + τάξις, arrangement.] The suppression of an entire whorl of the members of any organ in a flower, as the sepals, petals, stamens, or styles. The androecium and gynoecium are most frequently suppressed, producing male or female flowers exclusively, as the case may be. Also spelled meiotaxy.

miour, n. See *mier*¹.

mi-parti (mē'pär-tē'), a. [F., < mi (< L. medius), half, + parti, part: see medium and party.]

1. Of two colors and equally or nearly equally divided between them: as, mi-parti hose, of which one leg is of a different color from the other.—2. In her., divided per pale half-way down the escutcheon, the partition-line being met at the fesse-point by some other line, which must also be expressed in the blazon.

mir (mēr), n. [Russ. mir, union, concord, peace, also world, = O Bulg. mir, peace, world, = Serv. Bohem. Pol. mir = Albanian mir = Lett. mers, peace.] A Russian commune; a community of Russian peasants. The rural population of Russia has been from ancient times organized into *mir*s or local communities, in which the land is held in common, the parts of it devoted to cultivation being allotted by general vote to the several families for varying terms. Redistributions and equalization of lots take place from time to time. Houses and orchards are theoretically the property of the mir, but usually remain for a long time under the same ownership. Meadows and forests are frequently apportioned, and there is generally a common for grazing. Every mir in matters of local concern governs itself through its own assemblies and elected officers.

mirabillary (mī-rab'i-lā-ri), n. [Prop. mirabiliary, q. v.: see mirable.] A relater of wonders.

The use of this work . . . is nothing less than to give contentment to the appetite of curious and vain wits, as the manner of the mirabillaries is to do.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

mirabile dictu (mī-rab'i-lē dik'tū), [L.: mirabile, wonderful; dictu, abl. supine of dicere, say: see mirable and diction.] Wonderful to relate.

mirabile visu (mī-rab'i-lē vī'sū), [L.: mirabile, wonderful; visu, abl. supine of videre, see: see vision.] Wonderful to see.

mirabiliary (mir-a-bil'i-ä-ri), a. and n. [< LL. mirabiliaris, a worker of wonders or miracles, prop. adj., < L. mirabilis, wonderful: see mirable.] 1. a. Having to do with the working or the relation of wonders.

And wee leave to you the stile of Mirabiliary Miracle-mongers.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 93.

II. n. A book in which wonderful things are noted; a treatise on miracles, portents, prodigies, omens, and the like.

Mirabilis (mī-rab'i-lis), n. pl. [NL. (Choisy, 1849), < mirabilis + -ea.] A tribe of dicotyledonous apetalous plants of the natural order Nyctagineae, the four-o'clock family. The fruit is a utricle, surrounded by the base of the perianth, which keeps on growing after flowering; the embryo is much curved, with an elongated radicle. The tribe embraces 16 genera, Mirabilis being the type, and about 112 species, nearly all of which are confined to the western hemisphere.

Mirabilis (mī-rab'i-lis), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), < L. mirabilis, wonderful: see mirable.] A genus of nyctaginaceous plants, type of the tribe Mirabilieae. The flowers are surrounded by an involucre of united bracts, which remain unchanged after flowering; the elongated perianth is rarely campanulate. They are handsome branching herbs with opposite leaves, the lower ones petiolate and the upper sessile, and with quite large, often fragrant flowers, which are white, scarlet, or variegated, and arranged in branching cymes. There are 10 or 12 species, natives of the warmer parts of America. M. Jalapa is the common four-o'clock or marvel of Peru. A few other species are somewhat cultivated. See afternoon-ladies.

mirabilite (mī-rab'i-lit), n. [So named by Glauber to express his surprise at its artificial production; < L. mirabilis, wonderful (see mirable), + -ite.] A name given to the hydrous sulphate of sodium, or Glauber salt, occurring usually in a state of efflorescence about salt-springs. It is used as a substitute for soda in the manufacture of glass.

mirablet (mī-rā-bl), a. [= OF. mirable = Sp. (obs.) mirable = Pg. miravel = It. mirabile, < L. mirabilis, wonderful, < mirari, wonder at, < mirus, wonderful: see admire. Cf. marvel, a. and n., ult. < L. mirabilis, wonderful.] Wonderful.

Not Neoptolemus so mirable,
On whose bright crest fame with her loud 'st Oyes Cries "This is he!" Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 142.

mirabolant, mirabolant, n. See myrobalan.
miracle (mī-rā-kl), n. [ME. miracle, myracle, < OF. miracle, F. miracle = Pr. miracle = Sp. milagro = Pg. milagre = It. miracolo = D. G. Dan. Sw. mirakel, < L. miraculum, a wonderful work, a miracle, a wonder, < mirari, wonder at, < mirus, wonderful: see admire.] 1. A wonder, or a wonderful thing; something that excites admiration or astonishment.

Be not offended, nature's miracle,
Thou art allotted to be ta'en by me.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 3. 54.

He has faults,
Belike, though he be such a miracle.
Shirley, Love's Cruelty, I. 1.

I have beheld the Ephesian's miracle —
Its columns strew the wilderness.
Byron, Child Harold, iv. 168.

How exquisitely minute,
A miracle of design!
Tennyson, Mand., xiv. 1.

2. An effect in nature not attributable to any of the recognized operations of nature nor to the act of man, but indicative of superhuman power, and serving as a sign or witness thereof; a wonderful work, manifesting a power superior to the ordinary forces of nature.

That Cyteetuk Josue, be miracle of God and commandment of the Angel, and destroyed it, and cursed it, and alle hem that byiled it azen. Mandeville, Travels, p. 98.

Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou dost except God be with him. John iii. 2.

Miracles have been wrought to convert idolaters and the superstitious, because no light of nature extendeth to declare the will and true worship of God.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 152.

To speak properly, there is not one miracle greater than another, they being the extraordinary effects of the hand of God, to which all things are of an equal facility.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, I. 17.

A miracle may be accurately defined a transgression of a law of Nature by a particular volition of the Deity, or by the interposition of some invisible agent.

Hume, Human Understanding, Of Miracles, x., note.

What are miracles? They are the acts and manifestations of a Spiritual Power in the universe, superior to the powers and laws of matter. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 248.

The definition of a miracle as a violation of the laws of nature is, in reality, an employment of language which, in the face of the matter, cannot be justified.

Huxley, Hume, p. 129.

3†. A miraculous story; a legend.

Whan seyð was al this miracle, every man
As sobre was, that wonder was to se.
Chaucer, Prolog to Sir Thopas, l. 1.

4. In the middle ages, one of a class of spectacles or dramatic representations exhibiting the lives of the saints or other sacred subjects; a miracle-play, somewhat resembling that still held at Oberammergau in Bavaria. Compare *mystery*¹, 4.

At marketts & miracles we medleth vs nevere.

Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 107.

The theatrical exhibitions in London, in the twelfth century, were called Miracles, because they consisted of sacred plays, or representations of the miracles wrought by the holy confessors. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 227.

To a miracle, wonderfully; admirably; beyond conception: as, he did his part to a miracle.

miracle† (mī-rā-kl), v. [ME. miraculen; < miracle, n.] 1. intrans. To work wonders or miracles.

This is the 5. beyng of blood deyn, and miracles more than man mal bileue but if he se it.

Book of Quinte Essenes (ed. Furnivall), p. 11.

II. trans. To make wonderful.

Who this should be,
Doth miracle itself, loved before me.

Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2. 29.

miracle-monger (mī-rā-kl-mung'gér), n. A wonder-worker; an impostor who pretends to work miracles.

These miracle-mongers have alarmed the world round about them to a discernment of their tricks.

South, Works, III. xi.

miracle-play (mī-rā-kl-plā), n. See miracle, 4.

Their usual name was plays, miracle plays or miracles; the term mysteries not being employed in England. Yet their character is essentially that of the plays termed mysteries in France.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I. 21.

miracle-worker (mī-rā-kl-wér'kér), n. One who works miracles; a thaumaturgist.

He was deeply displeased by the demand for miracles, and repelled the support which men were ready to give to a miracle-worker.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 134.

miraculist† (mī-rā-klīst), n. [< miracle + -ist.] One who records miracles.

Hears the miraculist report it, who himselfe was an actor. Declaration of Popish Impostures (1603). (Nares.)

miraculizet (mī-rak'ū-līz), v. t. [< L. miraculum, a miracle (see miracle), + -ize.] To represent as a miracle; attribute to supernatural power. Shaftesbury.

miraculous (mī-rak'ū-lus), a. [< F. miraculeux = Sp. milagroso = Pg. milagroso, miraculoso = It. miracolo, < *ML. miraculosus (in adv. miraculose), wonderful, < L. miraculum, a wonder, miracle: see miracle.] 1. Exceedingly surprising or wonderful; extraordinary; incomprehensible: as, a miraculous escape.

The invariable mark of wisdom is to see the miraculous in the common. Emerson, Nature.

2. Of the nature of a miracle; working miracles; performed by, involving, or exhibiting a power beyond the ordinary agency of natural laws; supernatural.

Behind the high altar they have what they call a miraculous picture of the virgin Mary, which, they say, was painted by St. Luke, but it is not to be seen.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 138.

Generation after generation the province of the miraculous has contracted, and the circle of scepticism has expanded.

Lecky, Rationalism, I. 104.

=Syn. 2. Preternatural, Superhuman, etc. See supernatural.

miraculously (mī-rak'ū-lus-li), adv. In a miraculous manner; wonderfully; by extraordinary means; by means of a miracle; supernaturally.

Except themselves had beene almost miraculously skilfull in Languages. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 47.

The Sickness is miraculously decreased in this City, and Suburbs.

Hovell, Letters, I. iv. 24.

Porteus, Works, II. xiv.

miraculousness (mī-rak'ū-lus-nes), n. The quality of being miraculous.

mirador (mī-rā-dōr'), n.; pl. miradores (mī-rā-dō-res). [Sp. > Pg. miradouro = F. miradore, < mirar, behold: see mirage, mirror.] A belvedere or gallery commanding an extensive view. See cut under belvedere.

Meantime your valiant son, who had before Gain'd fame, rode round to every mirador.
Dryden, Conquest of Granada, I. i. 1.

When he departed from the Alhambra, she betook herself to her mirador, overlooking the vega, whence she watched the army, as it went, in shining order, along the road leading to Loxa.

Ivings, Granada, p. 107.

mirage (mī-rāzh'), n. [< F. mirage (= Pg. miragem = It. miragio), < mirer, < ML. mirare, look at: see mirror.] 1. An optical illusion due to excessive bending of light-rays in traversing adjacent layers of air of widely different densities, whereby distorted, displaced, or inverted images are produced. The requisite change in density arises only near the earth's surface, and the hot shining of the sun seems to be an invariable antecedent. The mirage of the desert presents an appearance of objects reflected in a surface of water; in this case the heated earth rarefies the air in the lower strata faster than it can escape, and the flatness of the ground conduces to the maintenance of the resulting abnormal distribution of density. Displacement by mirage is commonly vertical, but is lateral when the density-gradient is more or less inclined to the vertical. Looming and fata Morgana are species of mirage. See these words. Hence—2. Deceptiveness of appearance; a delusive seeming; an illusion.

The poetry which had preceded him [Chaucer] . . . at last had well nigh lost itself in chasing the mirage of allegory.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 285.

mirbane (mēr'bān), n. A fanciful name under which nitrobenzol is sold as oil of mirbane or essence of mirbane.

miŕe¹ (mīr), n. [< ME. mire, myre, < Icel. mýrr, later mýri = Norw. myre = Sw. Dan. myr, a bog, swamp, = OHG. mios, MHG. G. mics, a bog, swamp, also moss (a plant), = AS. meós, moss (a plant): see *moss*¹, *moss*².] 1. Wet, slimy soil of some depth and of yielding consistency; deep mud.

He [the parson] sette not hys benefice to hyre,
And leet his scheep encombred in the myre.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T. (ed. Morris), l. 508.

I sink in deep miŕe, where there is no standing. Pa. lrix, 2.

2. Filth.—Dun in the miŕe. See *dun*¹.

miŕe² (mīr), v.; pret. and pp. mired, ppr. miring. [*< miŕe*¹, n.] 1. trans. 1. To plunge and fix in mire; set or stall in mud; sink in mud or in a morass.

Nor do I believe that there is a single instance of a skeleton of one of the extinct mammals having been found in an upright position, as if it had been mired.

Darwin, Geol. Observations, II. 351.

2. To soil or daub with slimy mud or foul matter.

Smirch'd thus, and mired with infamy.

Shak., Much Ado, iv. 1. 135.

Harpies miring every dish. Tennyson, Lucretius.

II. intrans. To sink in mud; especially, to sink so deep as to be unable to move forward; stick in the mud.

Paint till a horse may miŕe upon your face.

Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 147.

miŕe^{2†} (mīr), n. [< ME. mire, also mouere (not in AS.), < Icel. maurr = Sw. myra = Dan. myre = D. miere, mier = MLG. LG. mire (> G. miere), an ant; cf. mirish (mír'ish), a. [< mirel + ish]. Miry.

miriti-palm (mir'i-ti-pám), n. Same as ita-palm.

mirk, mirkily, etc. See murk, etc.

mirligoes, n. See merligoes.

miro (mé'rô), n. [Native name.] A New Zealand coniferous tree, Podocarpus ferruginea, called black pine by the colonists. It yields a hard brown timber suitable for turnery, cabinet-making, and civil architecture.

mirret, n. A Middle English form of myrrh.

mirror (mir'or), n. [Early mod. E. also mirrour, myrror; < ME. mirroure, myrroure, myrroure, myrroure, mirour, < OF. mireor, mirour, mirur, F. miroir = Pr. mirador = It. miratore, miradore, a looking-glass (= Sp. mirador, a look-out, balcony; see mirador), < ML. as if "miratorum", < L. mirari, wonder at, ML. mirare (> It. mirare = Sp. Pg. mirar = F. mirer), look at, < mirus, wonderful; see admire, miracle.] 1. A polished surface, as of metal, or of glass backed by a metal or other opaque substance, used to reflect objects, especially to reflect the face or person as an aid in making the toilet. The mirrors of the ancients were of polished metal, as are those of the Japanese and some other Oriental nations. Glass mirrors, consisting of transparent glass with a backing of metal to act as the reflecting surface, did not become common until the sixteenth century. Mirrors have been used for decoration of the person, being sewed to the material of the dress and serving as larger and more brilliant spangles; they have also been used in the interior decoration of buildings, especially in Persia and the East Indies. (Compare ardak.) The common method of preparing glass mirrors is to coat one side of the glass with an amalgam of tin and mercury (called silvering); but mirrors are now often made by depositing pure silver on the glass.

Now in this mirrour loke you see;
In yowre free wille the choise lijs.
To heuen or helle whither ye wille goo.
Hymns to Virgins, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 78.
In this mirrour she shall see
Her self as much transform'd as me.
Congress, Semole, III. 2.

2. Specifically, in optics, a surface of glass or polished substance that forms images by the reflection of rays of light; a speculum. Optical mirrors are plane, convex, or concave. A plane mirror gives a virtual image whose apparent position is on the opposite side of the mirror from the reflected body and at an equal distance from it. A concave spherical mirror (supposing that it includes only a small part of a large spherical surface) reflects rays parallel to its axis, as those from the sun, to a point (F in fig. 1) called the principal focus, whose distance from the mirror is equal to half the radius of the sphere of which the surface of the mirror forms a part. Rays proceeding from a luminous point upon the axis beyond the center (L in fig. 2) are reflected to a focus, f, between the center and F; and these two points are called conjugate foci, since they are interchangeable; a luminous body at L has a real inverted and diminished image formed at f. If, however, the luminous body be at f, the image is formed at L, also real and inverted, but magnified. If the luminous body is at F, the principal focus, the reflected rays are sent out in parallel lines; if nearer the mirror than F, the rays after reflection are divergent, and the image is virtual, erect, and magnified. In a concave parabolic mirror parallel rays are brought exactly to a focus at the geometrical focus; hence this form is suitable for reflectors, as in the headlight of a locomotive. The images formed by convex mirrors are always virtual and smaller than the object.

3. Figuratively, that in or by which anything is shown or exemplified; hence, a pattern; an exemplar.

That book [the Koran] sayth also that Jesu was sent from God alle myghty for to ben Myrrour and Ensample and Tokne to alle men.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 183.
How farrest thou, mirror of all martial men?
Shak., I Hen. VI., I. 4. 74.

4. In arch., a small oval ornament surrounded by a concave molding; a simple form of cartouche.—5. In ornith., same as speculum.—Archimedeian mirror, a mirror intended for burning an enemy's ships or hoardings: proposed or essayed more than once in the middle ages. In imitation of the mirrors mentioned by Lucian as used by Archimedes. Groes, Mill. Antiq., II. 167.—Axis of a spherical, concave, or convear mirror. See axis.—Glaude Lorrain mirror, a blackened convex glass designed to show the effect of a landscape reflected in somewhat exaggerated perspective: so called from the fancied similarity of its effects to the pictures of Claude Lorrain (1600-82), a landscape-painter celebrated for his rendering of sunlight and shadow and light-effects in general. Also called Claude glass.—Conjugate mirrors. See conjugate.—Cylindrical mirror. See cylindric.—Easel-mirror, a small mirror having a prop or foot fastened to the back of it by a hinge so that, at pleasure, the mirror may be set up on one edge.—Magic mirror. (a) A mirror in which, in various systems of fortune-telling or divination, a person was supposed to see reflected scenes in his future life, or an answer to some question. (b) A Japanese mirror of cast-metal, which, when made to reflect the sun's rays upon a screen at a proper distance, shows in the reflection bright images which are counterparts of raised figures or characters on the back of the mirror. These, like all Japanese mirrors, are generally circular in form, are about one eighth of an inch thick in the thinnest part, and are usually surrounded on the back by a raised rim. The surface of the mirror is generally slightly convex, and coated with an amalgam of mercury and the metal forming the mirror. The surface is locally modified in its curvature by the characters, either by the shrinkage of the metal in cooling, or by its deformation in the process of amalgamation or of polishing. Only a few of the mirrors which apparently answer to the general description in respect to their construction possess the "magic" property in any great degree.—Bosmering's mirror, in microscopy, a plane mirror of polished steel, smaller than the pupil of the eye, placed before the eyepiece of the microscope to be used like the camera lucida in making drawings.

MIRROR (mir'or), v. t. [< mirror, n.] To reflect in or as in a mirror.

Bending to her open eyes,
Where he was mirror'd small in paradise.
Keats, Lamia, II.

Fiction . . . more than any other branch of literature mirrors the popular philosophy of the hour.
Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 500.

mirror-black (mir'or-blak), a. An epithet applied to any ceramic ware having a lustrous black glaze, especially a rare and highly esteemed Japanese stoneware of ancient manufacture.

mirror-carp (mir'or-kärp), n. A variety of the common carp, Cyprinus carpio, in which the skin is mostly naked, but has patches of very large scales on the back and also above the anal fin, and on the tail and the posterior part of the lateral line. It is the result of artificial selection and domestication, and is regarded as a better table-fish than the ordinary carp. See cut under carp.

mirror-galvanometer (mir'or-gal-va-nom'e-tér), n. A galvanometer with a mirror attached to the needle which reflects a beam of light intercepted by a scale of equal parts. The spot of light on the scale serves as an index.—Thomson's mirror-galvanometer. See galvanometer.

mirror-script (mir'or-skript), n. Writing as seen (reversed) in a mirror. Such writing is characteristic of a certain form of aphasia.

mirror-stonet (mir'or-stôn), n. Muscovite: so called because it "represents the image of that which is set behind it." E. Phillips, 1706.

mirror-writer (mir'or-ri-tér), n. One who writes mirror-script.

Mirror-writers, it would appear, if they did not "live before Agamemnon," lived not very long after him; for the first seven letters of that chieftain's name are so written in an inscription in the Louvre (Hall of Phidias, 69).
Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 41.

mirth (mèrth), n. [< ME. mirth, mirth, merthe, mirth, myrthe, murtthe, murgthe, < AS. mīrīth, mīrīth, mīrīth, mīrīth, pleasure, joy: with abstract formative -th, < mirig, myrig, pleasant: see merry.] 1. Pleasure; joy.

For-thi god of his godnesse the fyrste gome Adam,
Sette hym in solace and in soueraigne myrthe.
Piers Plowman (B), xviii. 217.

He schall brynge tham to blys
That now in bale are boune,
This myrthe we may not mys,
For this same is Goddis sonne.
York Plays, p. 189.

2. A state or feeling of merriment; demonstrative gaiety; jollity; hilarity.

So mekill mirth gan with tham mete
Of nobill noyse and sauore swete.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 76.

Present mirth hath present laughter.
Shak., T. N., II. 2. 49.

Great was the mirth in the kitchen,
Likewise intill the ha'.
Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 276).

3. A cause or subject of merriment; that which excites gaiety or laughter. [Rare.]

Fayn wolde I don yow mirth, wiste I how.
And of a mirth I am right now bythought,
To doon you see, and it shal coste nought.
Chaucer, Prolog. to G. T., I. 767.

He's all my exercise, my mirth, my matter.
Shak., W. T., I. 2. 106.

=Syn. Mirth, Cheerfulness.
I have always preferred cheerfulness to mirth. The latter I consider as an act, the former as a habit, of the mind.

Mirth is short and transient; cheerfulness, fixed and permanent. Those are often raised into the greatest transports of mirth who are subject to the greatest depressions of melancholy; on the contrary, cheerfulness (though it does not give the mind such an exquisite gladness) prevents us from falling into any depths of sorrow. Mirth is like a flash of lightning, that breaks through a gloom of clouds, and glitters for a moment; cheerfulness keeps up a kind of daylight in the mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual serenity.
Addison, Spectator, No. 581.

mirtht (mèrth), v. [< ME. mirthen; < mirth, n.]

I. trans. To please or make merry.
Lorde, som prayer thou kenne vs,
That somewhat myght mirtht vs or mende vs.
York Plays, p. 241.

II. intrans. To rejoice. Halliwell.

mirthful (mèrth'fùl), a. [< mirth + -ful]. 1. Full of mirth or gaiety; characterized by or accompanied with merriment; jovial; festive.

The Feast was serv'd: the Bowl was crown'd;
To the King's Pleasure went the mirthful round.
Prior, Solomon, II.

The mirthful is the aspect of ease, freedom, abandon, and animal spirits. The serious is constituted by labour, difficulty, hardship, and the necessities of our position, which give birth to the severe and constraining institutions of government, law, morality, education, etc.
A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 251.

2. Causing or provoking mirth or merriment.

And now what rests, but that we spend the time
With stately triumphs, mirthful comic shows?
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 7. 44.

Tell mirthful tales in course that fill the room with laughter.
Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, I. 1.

=Syn. 1. Jovial, etc. (see jolly), gay, gleeful, sportive, playful.

mirthfully (mèrth'fùl-i), adv. In a mirthful or jovial manner: as, the visitors were mirthfully disposed.

mirthfulness (mèrth'fùl-nes), n. The state of being mirthful; mirth; merriment.

A trait which naturally goes along with inability so to conceive the future as to be influenced by the conception is a childish mirthfulness—merriment not sobered by thought of what is coming.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 34.

mirthless (mèrth'les), a. [< mirth + -less]. Without mirth or hilarity; joyless.

Whilst his gamesome cut-tailed cur
With his mirthless master plays.
Drayton, Shepherd's Sirena.

mirthlessness (mèrth'les-nes), n. Absence of mirth.

mirtlet, n. An obsolete spelling of myrtle.

miry (mir'i), a. [< ME. myry; < mirel + -y]. Abounding with mire or mud; of the nature of mire or mud; full of mire: as, a miry road; a miry lane.

Thou should'st have heard in how miry a place, how she was bemolled.
Shak., T. of the 8., iv. 1. 77.

miryachit, n. A neurosis observed in Siberia, characterized by extreme excitability and sometimes exhibitions of terror, with imitation of word and deed and often obscene speech. It is similar to or identical with the lath of southern Asia and the Malay archipelago, and the affection of the Jumpers or jumping Frenchmen of Maine.

mirza (mir'zā or mèr'zā), n. [Pers. mīrzā (> Hind. mīrzā, prop. mīrzā), prince; said to be a corruption of amīrzadeh, son of a prince, < amīr, prince, ameer (see ameer, amīr), + zadeh, son; cf. mīr, a lord, chief, prob. for amīr.] A Persian title. When placed after the name of a person it designates him as a royal prince; when before the name it is the title for a scholar.

mist, n. and adv. A Middle English form of miss.

mis-. [< ME. mis-, mys-, improp. missa, < AS. mis- = OS. mis- = OFries. mis- = D. mis- = MLG. mis- = OHG. missa-, missi-, MHG. misse-, G. miss-, mis- = Icel. mis- = Sw. miss- = Dan. mis- = Goth. missa-, a prefix, 'wrong,' 'bad,' as in AS. misdād, a wrong deed, misdeed, mīswād, bad advice, mīsdōn, do wrong, misdo, mīslādan, mislead, mīstācan, mistake, mīscritan, miswrite, etc.; orig. an independent word, 'wrong,' 'erroneous,' 'having missed': see miss.] A prefix of Anglo-Saxon origin, meaning 'wrong,' 'bad,' 'erroneous,' or, taken adverbially, 'wrongly,' 'badly,' 'erroneously,' prefixed to nouns, as in misdeed, misfortune, misinform, etc., and verbs, misdo, miscarry, misguide, misrule, etc., including participles, as mistaking, misbelieving, etc., mistaken, misspent, etc. It is different from the prefix in mischance, mischievous, miscount, etc., with which it is more or less confused. (See mis-2.) The prefix mis-1 is never accented; the prefix mis-2 has the accent in some of the older words, as mischievous, miscreant, where its force as a prefix is no longer felt. In the following words in mis-, the prefix is uniformly given as mis-1 except when the word in which it occurs can be traced to an Old French source. In such forms as misadventure, etc., it is often indifferent whether the formation be regarded as mis-1 + adventure or as misadvent + -ment.

mis-². [< ME. mis-, mys-, mes-, < OF. mes-, F. mé-, mes-, Pr. mes-, mens- = Sp. Pg. menos- = It. mis-, < L. minus, less; used in Rom. as a depreciatory prefix: see minus.] A prefix of Latin origin, meaning literally 'minus,' 'less,' and hence used in Romance, etc., as a depreciative or negative prefix, as in misadventure, mischance, mischief, miscount, miscreant, misnomer, etc. It is mostly merged with mis-¹, from which in most cases it can be distinguished only by the etymology of the word.

misacceptation (mis-ak-sep-tā'shon), n. [< mis-¹ + acceptation.] The act of taking or understanding in a wrong sense; a false acceptance.

misacception (mis-ak-sep'shon), n. [< mis-¹ + acceptation.] Misacceptation.

The apostle, . . . contemning all impotent misacceptions, calls them what he finds them, a froward generation. Bp. Hall, Sermon to the Lords, Feb. 18, 1634.

misaccount (mis-ə-kount'), v. t. [< ME. mis-accounten, misacompten, < OF. *mesacompter, count wrongly, < mes- + acompter, account: see mis-² and account.] To miscalculate; misreckon.

He thought he misaccounted hadde his day. Chaucer, Troilus, v. 1185.

misachievement (mis-ə-čhev'ment), n. [< mis-¹ + achievement.] Wrong-doing; an achievement that is not desirable or commendable. Davies.

Let them sink into obscurity that hope to swim in credit by such misachievements. Fuller, Worthies, Cornwall, I. 306.

misact (mis-akt'), v. t. [< mis-¹ + act.] To act or perform badly.

The player that misacts an inferior and unnoted part carries it away without censure. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 391. (Davies.)

misadjust (mis-ə-just'), v. t. [< mis-¹ + adjust.] To adjust badly; put out of adjustment. Jer. Taylor.

misadjustment (mis-ə-just'ment), n. [< mis-¹ + adjustment.] The state or condition of being badly adjusted; disagreement; lack of harmony.

The misadjustment of nature to our physical being. Mark Hopkins, Discussions for Young Men, p. 228.

misadmeasurement (mis-ad-mezh'ūr-ment), n. [< mis-¹ + admeasurement.] A faulty estimate or measurement.

The liability of the understanding to underrate or to overvalue the importance of an object through mere misadmeasurement of its propinquity. E. A. Poe, Sphinx.

misadventure (mis-ad-ven'tūr), n. [< ME. misaventure, mesaventure, messaventure, contr. misaunter, mesauter, < OF. mesaventure, F. mésaventure, < mes- + aventure, adventure: see mis-² and adventure.] An unfortunate adventure or hap; a mischance; ill luck.

Certes, it were to vs grete harme yef this denell lyve longe, what myseaventure hath he be suffred so longe. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), III. 589.

Your looks are pale and wild, and do import some misadventure. Shak., R. and J., v. 1. 29.

Homicide by misadventure. See homicide².

misadventured (mis-ad-ven'tūrd), a. [< misadventure + -ed.] Unfortunate.

A pair of star-cross'd lovers take their life; Whose misadventured piteous overthrows Do with their death bury their parents' strife. Shak., R. and J., Prol., I. 7.

misadventurous (mis-ad-ven'tūr-us), a. [< OF. mesaventureux; as misadventure + -ous.] Characterized by misadventure; unfortunate.

The tidings of our misadventurous synod. Sir H. Taylor, Edwin the Fair, IV. 1. (Davies.)

misadvertence (mis-ad-vér'tens), n. [< mis-¹ + advertence.] Want of proper care, heed, or attention; inadvertence.

Once by misadvertence Merlin sat In his own chair (the Siege Perilous). Tennyson, Holy Grail.

misadvise (mis-ad-viz'), v. t.; pret. and pp. misadvised, ppr. misadvising. [< ME. misadvisen, misavisen; < mis-¹ + advise.] 1. To give bad advice to.

If it be when they hem misadvise. Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale.

2. To misinform; deceive; cause or lead to act under a misapprehension.

Pardon my passion, I was misadvised. B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, IV. 2.

Here also happened another pageant in a certain monk (if I be not misadvised) of Gloucester College. Foote (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 108).

misadvisedly (mis-ad-vi'zed-li), adv. Under a misapprehension; inconsiderately.

misadvisedness (mis-ad-vi'zed-nes), n. The state of being misadvised or under a misapprehension; the state of being mistaken.

Unadvisedness coupled with heedlessness, and misadvisedness coupled with rashness, correspond to the culpa sine dolo. Bentham, Intro. to Morals and Legislation, IX. 17.

misaffected (mis-ə-fekt'), v. t. [< mis-¹ + affect¹.] To dislike.

That peace which you have hitherto so perversely misaffected. Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

misaffected (mis-ə-fek'ted), a. [< mis-¹ + affected.] Ill-affected; ill-disposed.

These men are farther yet misaffected, and in a higher strain. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 575.

misaffection (mis-ə-fek'shon), n. [< mis-¹ + affection.] A wrong affection.

Earthly and grosse with misaffections, . . . It ushars the flesh of sinful courses. Bp. Hall, Character of Man.

misaffirm (mis-ə-fèrm'), v. t. [< mis-¹ + affirm.] To affirm incorrectly or wrongly.

The truth of what they themselves know to be here misaffirm'd. Milton, Eikonoklastes, Pref.

misaimed (mis-əmd'), a. [< mis-¹ + aimed.] Not rightly aimed or directed. Spenser.

misallegation (mis-al-ē-gā'shon), n. [< mis-¹ + allegation.] An incorrect or false statement or assertion. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 361.

misallege (mis-ə-lej'), v. t.; pret. and pp. misalleged, ppr. misalleging. [< mis-¹ + allege¹.] To allege erroneously; cite falsely as a proof or argument.

Now-a-days they are only used to exclude and drive forth episcopacy; but then they misallege antiquity. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 248.

misalliance (mis-ə-li'āns), n. [< F. mésalliance, < mes- + alliance, alliance: see mis-² and alliance.] An improper alliance or association; specifically, a marriage relation considered as degrading to one of the parties, owing to the inferior birth or standing of the other: in the latter sense often used in the French form, mésalliance.

Their purpose was to ally two things in nature incompatible, the Gothic and the classic unity; the effect of which misalliance was to discover and expose the nakedness of the Gothic. Bp. Hurd, Chivalry and Romance, VIII.

misallied (mis-ə-lid'), a. [< mis-¹ + allied.] Improperly allied or connected; affected by a misalliance.

A misallied and disparaged branch of the house of Nimrod. Burke, Letter to a Noble Lord.

misallotment (mis-ə-lot'ment), n. [< mis-¹ + allotment.] A wrong allotment.

misalter (mis-əl'ter), v. t. [< mis-¹ + alter.] To alter wrongly or for the worse.

These are all . . . which have so mis-altered the leiturgy that it can no more be known to be itself. Bp. Hall, Ana. to Apol. for Smeectymnuus, § 2.

misanswer (mis-ən'sér), n. [< mis-¹ + answer.] Misuse; failure.

After the misanswer of the one talent. Bp. Hall, Vayle of Moses.

misanthrope (mis-ən-thrōp), n. [= F. misanthrope = Sp. misántropo = Pg. misanthropo = It. misantropo, < Gr. μισάνθρωπος, hating mankind, < μισειν, hate (< μισος, hatred), + άνθρωπος, a man: see anthropic. Cf. philanthrope.] A hater of mankind; one who harbors dislike or distrust of human character or motives in general.

Alas! poor dean! his only scope Was to be held a misanthrope. Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

misanthropic (mis-ən-thrōp'ik), a. [= F. misanthropique = Sp. misántropico = Pg. misanthropico = It. misantropico; as misanthrope + -ic.] Having the character of a misanthrope; characteristic of a misanthrope or of misanthropy. = Syn. Cynical, Misanthropic, Pessimistic. Cynical expresses a perverse disposition to put an unfavorable interpretation upon conduct, or to exercise austerity under profession of a belief in the worthlessness of any offered form of enjoyment. Misanthropic expresses a hatred of mankind as a race. Pessimistic is primarily and generally a philosophical epithet, applying to those who hold that the tendency of things is only or on the whole toward evil. Byron's Childe Harold is "a jaded and misanthropic voluptuary": such a person is apt to take a cynical view of others, in their motives, their virtues, their happiness, etc. It is disputed whether Swift's "Gulliver's Travels" is really misanthropic or only cynical.

misanthropical (mis-ən-thrōp'i-kal), a. [< misanthropic + -al.] Same as misanthropic.

misanthropically (mis-ən-thrōp'i-kal-i), adv. In a misanthropic manner.

misanthropist (mis-ən-thrō-pist), n. [As misanthrope + -ist.] Same as misanthrope.

misanthropize (mis-ən-thrō-piz), v. t.; pret. and pp. misanthropized, ppr. misanthropizing. [As misanthrope + -ize.] To render misanthropic. [Rare.]

misanthropist, n. [< Gr. μισάνθρωπος: see misanthrope.] A misanthrope; a man-hater.

I am Misanthropos, and hate mankind. Shak., T. of A., IV. 2. 53.

misanthropy (mis-ən-thrō-pi), n. [= F. misanthropie = Sp. misantropía = Pg. misanthropia = It. misantropia, < Gr. μισάνθρωπια, hatred of men, < μισάνθρωπος, hating man: see misanthrope.] Hatred or dislike of mankind; the habit of distrusting or of taking the worst possible view of human character or motives.

But let not knaves misanthropy create, Nor feed the gall of universal hate. Langhorne, Enlargement of the Mind, I.

Misanthropy is only philanthropy turned sour. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 228.

misapplication (mis-ap-li-kā'shon), n. [< mis-¹ + application.] A wrong or false application or purpose.

He brings me informations, pick'd out of broken words in men's common talk, which, with his malicious misapplication, he hopes will seem dangerous. Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, I. 2.

misapply (mis-ə-pli'), v. t.; pret. and pp. misapplied, ppr. misapplying. [< mis-¹ + apply.] To make an erroneous application of; apply or dispose of wrongly: as, to misapply a name or title; to misapply one's talents or exertions; to misapply public money.

Virtue itself turns vice, being misapplied. Shak., R. and J., II. 2. 21.

misappreciate (mis-ə-prē'shi-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. misappreciated, ppr. misappreciating. [< mis-¹ + appreciate.] To fail in rightly appreciating; undervalue.

misappreciation (mis-ə-prē'shi-ā'shon), n. [< mis-¹ + appreciation.] The act or fact of misappreciating.

There is still a sufficiency of survivors to check any grave misappreciation of facts. Edinburgh Rev., CXLV. 161.

misappreciative (mis-ə-prē'shi-ā-tiv), a. [< mis-¹ + appreciative.] Not appreciating rightly; not showing due appreciation.

A man may look on an heroic age . . . with the eyes of a valet, as misappreciative, certainly, though not so ignoble. Lowell, Among my Books.

misapprehend (mis-ap-rē-hend'), v. t. [< mis-¹ + apprehend.] To apprehend incorrectly or wrongly; misunderstand; take in a wrong sense.

misapprehension (mis-ap-rē-hen'shon), n. [< mis-¹ + apprehension.] A mistaking or mistake; wrong apprehension of one's meaning or of a fact.

Patient sinners may want peace through mistakes and misapprehensions of God. Stillingfleet, Works, III. III.

Well, sir, I see our misapprehension has been mutual. Sheridan, The Duenna, II. 2.

= Syn. Misconception, misunderstanding.

misapprehensively (mis-ap-rē-hen'siv-li), adv. By misapprehension or mistake.

misappropriate (mis-ə-prō'pri-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. misappropriated, ppr. misappropriating. [< mis-¹ + appropriate.] To appropriate wrongly; put to a wrong use: as, to misappropriate funds intrusted to one.

misappropriation (mis-ə-prō'pri-ā'shon), n. [< mis-¹ + appropriation.] 1. Wrong appropriation; application to a wrong use: as, misappropriation of money.

Mishnah (mish'nä), n. [*Also Mishna; Heb.
mishnäh, repetition, explanation, < shänäh, repeat.*] 1. In Jewish lit., a collection of halachoth or binding precepts and legal decisions deduced by the ancient rabbis from the Penta-teuch, and itself forming a second or oral law.
See halachah. These halachoth, which had been preserved for several centuries by tradition among the doctors of the synagogue, were gradually committed to writing. The first who attempted to reduce them to order was Hillel I. (B. C. 75-A. D. 10), president of the Sanhedrim, who arranged them in six Sedarim or orders. The final redaction, however, was made by Rabbi Jehudah, surnamed
"the holy," about the end of the second century of our era.
The Mishnah is divided into six parts, each of which contains a number of treatises, which are subdivided into chapters, and these again into paragraphs or mishnoth.
The first part relates to agriculture; the second regulates the manner of observing festivals; the third treats of women and matrimonial cases; the fourth of damages and losses in trade, etc.; the fifth is on "holy things"—that is, oblations, sacrifices, etc.; and the sixth treats of the several sorts of purification. The Mishnah forms the text on which the Gemara is based. See Gemara and Talmud.

The Mishnah consists chiefly of Halakhab; there is, comparatively speaking, little Agadah to be found in it.
It is not, however, as many think, either a commentary on the Halakhic portions of the Pentateuch, or on the ordinances of the Sopherim, or on both together. It rather presupposes the knowledge of and respect for both the Mosaic and the Sopheric laws, and it only discusses, and finally decides on, the best mode and manner of executing these. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 508.

2. [I. c.; pl. mishnoth (mish'noth).] A paragraph of the Mishnah.

A mishnah, if genuine, never begins with a passage of the Pentateuch, and even comparatively seldom brings direct proof from or gives reference to it.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 508.

Mishnaic (mish-nä'ik), a. [< Mishna(h) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Mishnah; traditional.

The weighty reference to the Mishnaic usage remains,

5. Specifically, in printing, a failure on the part of the person feeding the blank sheets to a press to supply a sheet at the right moment for impression. The miss must be corrected by running through several sheets to absorb the ink put on the blanks by the form.

6. In the game of loo, an extra hand dealt out, for which the players in turn have the option of exchanging their own.—A miss is as good as a mile, a narrow escape is no worse than a remote one; so one escapes a danger it does not matter much how near it approached.

miss¹ (mis), adv. [ME. mis, mys, myse = D. mis = Icel. mis, adv., wrong, amiss; see miss¹, v. Cf. miss, n., amiss.] Wrongly; badly; amiss. The things ben so mys entrenchanged.

Chaucer, Boethius, IV. prose 5.

To correcten that is mis I mente.

Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, I. 448.

miss² (mis), n. [An abbr. of mistress, at first prob. as a title, the form Mistress, as written Mrs. and pronounced mis'ez, being still commonly abbreviated in rustic use in New England and among the Southern negroes, to Miss, often printed Mis. Cf. also def. 3. See mistress, Mrs.] 1. Mistress: a reduced form of this title, which, so reduced, came to be regarded, when prefixed to the name of a young woman or girl, as a sort of diminutive, and was especially applied to young girls (corresponding to master as applied to young boys), older unmarried girls or women being styled mistress even in the lifetime of the mother; later, and in present use, a title prefixed to the name of any unmarried woman or girl. In a restricted use, the title Miss, with the surname only, now distinguishes the eldest daughter of a family, the younger daughters having the title Mis prefixed to their full name: as, Miss Brown, Mis Mary Brown, etc. Some matronly unmarried women, holding independent positions as householders or otherwise, are still styled Mistress (Mrs.) as a mark of special respect, at least in some parts of the United States. In speaking or writing of two or more persons of the same name by the title of Miss, the plural form is often given to the name as a whole, as the Miss Smiths, instead of to the title, as the Misses Smith.

The four Miss Williams. Dickens, Sketches, III.

Miss Guest held her chin too high, and . . . Miss Laura spoke and moved continually with a view to effect. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, IV. 9.

Her says to me "Are you Mrs. or Miss?" "Neither, ma'am," I says, "I am a servant." That young woman respected herself and her calling.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 256.

2. A young unmarried woman; a girl. In this sense chiefly colloquial; in trade use it has reference to sizes, etc.: as, ladies' misses, and children's shoes.

Where there are little masters and misses in a house, they are great impediments to the diversions of the servants. Swift.

Sometimes I half wish I were merely A plain or a penniless miss.

Locker, A Nice Correspondent.

3. A mistress (of a household). [Southern U. S., in negro use.]—4. [In this use a direct abbr. of mistress in the same sense—a slang use, independent of the above.] A kept mistress.

She being taken to be the Earle of Oxford's miss (as at this time they began to call lewd women).

Keelyn, Diary, Jan. 9, 1662.

Undeent women, . . . inflaming several young noble-men and gallants, became their misses. Keelyn, Diary, Oct. 18, 1666.

If after all you think it a disgrace
That Edward's miss thus perks it in your face.
Pope, Epil. to Rowe's Jane Shore, I. 46.

missa (mis's), n. [LL. missa; see mass¹.] 1. The mass; a mass.—2. In the Mozarabic liturgy, a variable prayer or address, called more fully the Oratio Missæ (Prayer of the Mass), answering to the Gallican Præfatio Missæ (Preface of the Mass). It probably derived its name from the fact that the dismissal (missa) of the catechumens originally preceded it.

missal (mis'al), a. and n. [I. a. = OF. missal, < ML. missalis, of the mass, < missa, the mass; see mass¹. II. n. = F. missel = Sp. misal = Pg. missal = It. messale, < ML. missale, a mass-book, neut. of missalis, of the mass; see I.] I. a. Pertaining to the mass, or to the missal or Roman Catholic mass-book.

The missal sacrifice. Sp. Hall.

Missal litany. See litany, 2.

II. n. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., the book containing all the liturgical forms necessary for celebrating mass throughout the year. Origin.

nally the ordinary, canon, and some other parts of the mass were contained in the sacramentary, which also included the offices for the other sacraments. In addition to this the antiphony, lectionary, and evangeliary had to be used. Early in the eighth century the name of missal (missalis (sc. liber), missale) came to be applied to the sacramentary, and later to books containing additional parts of the mass. A book like the modern missal, containing all the forms of the mass, was called a plenary missal (missale plenum). The modern Roman missal (the "reformed missal") was issued substantially in its present form under Pius V. in 1570, and revised again under Clement VIII. and Urban VIII. It is the only Latin missal allowed to be used in the Roman Catholic Church, with the exception of the limited local use of the Ambrosian, Mozarabic, and some monastic rites. Roman Catholic priests in England do not follow the Sarum and other ancient English uses, but the present Roman rite. The Uniate and other Latinizing communities in Oriental countries are allowed to retain their ancient offices, with alterations more or less considerable. In the Roman missal, after the introductory matter (calendar, general rubric, etc.), come the introits, collects, epistles, gospels, graduals, offertoria, secrets, communions, postcommunions, etc., throughout the year. The ordinary and canon of the mass are placed in the middle of the book, between the proper of Holy Saturday and that of Easter Sunday. After these masses de tempore follow the common of saints, votive and special masses, etc., and masses allowed to be used in special places. The euchology of the Greek Church answers not to the missal, but to the original sacramentary.

The Sacramentary became subdivided into the full mass-book or missal properly so named.

Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. II. 19.

As tender and reverential . . . as a nun over her missal. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, II.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), I. 257.

mister (mis'tēr), n. [Also dial. mester, measter, < ME. maister, mayster, etc., whence also E. master, of which mister is merely a variant form, now differentiated in use: see master.] 1.

Master: a word which has lost its real meaning, and become a mere conventional title: nearly always written in the abbreviated form Mr.

(a) Prefixed to the name of a gentleman, or now, by extension, to that of any man, as a conventional title of address or mention. [The abbreviation Mr. (also M.), as found in books of the sixteenth century and for some time later, is to be read Master. (Compare master, n., 7.) Mister is simply a weaker form of Master.]

Has his majesty dubb'd me a Knight for you to make me a Mister?

Footes, Mayor of Garratt, I.

You will come down, Mister Bertram, as my guest to Wycombe Hall?

Mrs. Browning, Lady Geraldine's Courtship, xiii.

(b) Prefixed to the official designation of certain officers or dignitaries in formal address, as Mr. President, Mr. Secretary, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Clerk.

You, Mr. Dean, frequent the great.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. vi. 118.

2. Sir: used alone, in address, when the man's name is not known: as, mister, you've dropped your gloves; have a paper, mister? [The disappearance of master and mister, and the restricted and obsolescent use of sir, as an unaccompanied term of address, and the like facts with regard to mistress, Mrs., and madam, tend to deprive the English language of polite terms of address to strangers. Sir and madam or ma'am as direct terms of address are old-fashioned and obsolescent in ordinary speech, and mister and lady in this use are confined almost entirely to the lower classes.]

mister (mis'tēr), n. [*< ME. mister, mystir, mystir, mistere, misteir, mester, meister, mestier, < OF. mestier, mester, trade, calling, occupation, need, F. métier = Sp. mester = Pg. mester = It. mestiere, trade, calling, occupation, < L. ministerium, service, office, ministry: see ministry. mistle², v. i. An obsolete form of mizzle¹.
mistlethrush (mis'-l-thrush), n. [Also commonly missel-thrush; formerly also miselthrush, missel-trush; so called because it is fond of the berries of the mistle or mistletoe; < mistle¹ + thrush¹. Cf. equiv. G. misteldrossel (drossel = E. thrush) and mistler.] A species of thrush, the Turdus viscivorus, common in most parts of Europe, and some parts of western Asia and northern Africa. Like the fieldfare, mavis, redwing, blackbird, and ring-ouzel, it is an abundant and well-known English thrush. It is the largest European bird of its kind, measuring from 11 to 11½ inches in length and about 19½ in extent of wings. The form is stout, and the coloration most like that of the song-thrush, T. musicus. The upper parts are grayish-brown, grayer on the head, and of a yellowish tinge on the rump; there is a whitish streak from the bill over the eye, and the under parts are whitish, profusely spotted with black. Also called, locally, storm-cock, thrice-cock, holmthrush, screechthrush.

Mistlethrush (Turdus viscivorus).

We meet in Aristotle with one kind of thrush called the misel thrush, or feeder upon miseltoe.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 6.

mistletoe (mis'- or mis'-l-tō), n. [Formerly also miseltoe, mistletoe, miseltoe, mistleto, var. misselden, misseldine, miscleden; < ME. mistelton* (?), < AS. misteltān, mistiltān (= Icel. mistilteinn = Dan. mistelten), mistletoe, < mistel, bird-lime, also mistletoe, and basil, + tān, a twig: see mistle¹ and tan². The second element, having passed out of common use as a separate word, suffered alteration to -toe, the radical final n being appar. taken as the old plural suffix -n.] 1. A European plant, Viscum album, of the natural order Loranthaceae, growing parasitically on various trees. It is a jointed dichotomous shrub, with sessile, oblong, entire leaves, and small yellowish-green flowers, the whole forming a pendent bush, which is covered in winter with small white berries containing a glutinous substance. The shrub is said to be disseminated by birds, which eat the berries and disperse the undigested seeds in their droppings. It is found on a great variety of trees, especially the apple-tree, but seldom on the oak. The mistletoe (compare def. 2) was consecrated to religious purposes by the ancient Celtic nations of Europe, and was held in peculiar veneration by the Druids, especially when found growing on the oak. Traces of this old superstitious regard for the mistletoe still survive in European countries, as in the custom of kissing under it at Christmas. It was formerly highly esteemed as an antispasmodic, but is not now so used. It seems, however, to have some pharmaco-dynamic properties.

Branch of Mistletoe (Viscum album), with fruits. a, longitudinal section through the male flower; b, the female inflorescence.

Like some rare Fruit-Tree over-topped with spight
 Of Briers and Bushes . . .
 Till choakt withall, it dies as they do growe,
 And beareth nought but Moss and Mistletoe.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Vocation.
 The mistletoe hung in the castle hall,
 The holly branch shone on the old oak-wall.
T. H. Bayly, The Mistletoe Bough.

2. A plant of some other species of Viscum, or of one of the genera Loranthus, Phoradendron, and Arceuthobium, their species almost all having the same parasitic habit. The mistletoe (Viscum) mentioned by Latin writers in their account of the Druids is thought by some to have been Loranthus Europæus of southern Europe, said to grow on a species of oak in the south of France. The mistletoe of the eastern United States is Phoradendron flavescent, common on various trees, especially the tupelo and red maple. See gad-bush.

'the master-wind,' < maestre, master, < L. magister, master: see master¹.] In southern France and vicinity, a cold and dry northwest wind which blows in furious gusts from time to time in much of that region, notably in winter. The mistral derives its peculiar properties from the character of the country over which it blows; it extends from the mouth of the Ebro to the Gulf of Genoa, but is strongest and most frequent over Provence, and especially in the delta of the Rhone. Also written maestral.

When the Mistral blows, the sky is almost always blue and cloudless, and the air very dry; the contrast between the prevailing sunshine and the piercing cold of the wind is very striking. In the Rhone valley every second day is a Mistral day; in Marseilles it blows 175 days in the year.

Fletcher.

It is only truth to say, however, that the mistral, an odious, cold, cutting northeast wind, blows here in the winter, and gives Avignon a bad name.

C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, I.

1753), named after John Mitchell, a botanist of Virginia.] A genus of plants of the natural order Rubiaceae and the tribe Anthospermeae, characterized by having perfect flowers with a funnel-shaped corolla, which is from three- to six-lobed, the stamens inserted upon its throat, and by the hairy style, which has four thread-shaped lobes. They are creeping herbs, with opposite round-ovate leaves having minute stipules, and small white fragrant dimorphic flowers, which are axillary or terminal, and grow in pairs. The fruit is a scarlet berry-like double drupe. There are 2 species, an American, M.
repens, the partridge-berry, and a Japanese, which, however, may be identified with the American. See partridge- berry.

mite¹ (mit), n. [ME. mite, myte, < AS. mite = MD. mijte, D. mijt = MLG. LG. mite = OHG.
miza, miza, MHG. mize, G. (after LG.) miete = Dan. mide (cf. F. mite, Sp. mite, ML. mite, < LG.), a mite; prob. lit. 'cutter,' 'biter,' from the verb shown in Goth. maitan = Icel. meita =
*AS. mētan, cut: see emmet, *ant*¹.] 1. A small arachnid of the order Acarida; any acarid.
Mites once formed a comprehensive genus Acarus or family Acaridae, terms not yet obsolete; but, with the introduction of many more genera, the establishment of several families, and the elevation of the group to the rank of an order, a more elaborate nomenclature has been established, in which neither Acarus nor Acaridae is retained. (See Aca- rida.) Adult mites are eight-legged like most arachnids;
but some six-legged immature forms at one time constituted a supposed genus Leptus. (See Leptus, and cut under harvest-tick.) The species of mites are very numerous, diversified in form, and various in habits. Many are parasitic; others are terrestrial or aquatic; others live in cheese, flour, sugar, etc. Mite is consequently much used in composition. The cheese-mite or flour-mite is Tyrophagus siro or T. longior; the sugar-mite is Glyciphaga prunorum, or another of the same genus. Such mites compose the family Tyrophagidae, and are among those longer known as species of Acarus or Acaridae. Ick-mites are Sarcoptidae, as Sarcoptes scabiei. (See cut under itch-mite.) Mangemites are Demodidae; garden-mites or harvest-mites, Trombididae; spinning-mites, Tetranychidae; beetle-mites or wood-mites, Oribatidae; spider-mites, Gamasidae; watermites, Hydrachnidae; snout-mites, Idolidae; gall-mites, Phytoptidae. Certain mites, the Isoptidae, are commonly distinguished as ticks, as Ixodes ricinus (see cut under Aca- rida), and those of the family Trombididae are indifferently called harvest-mites, harvest-ticks, harvest-bugs, red-bugs, and by other names. See the compound and technical names.

That cheese of itself breeds mites or maggots, I deny.
Ray, Works of Creation, II.

Say what the use, were finer optics given,
To inspect a mite, not comprehend the heaven?
Pope, Essay on Man, l. 196.

2. Some insect like or likened to a mite, as a dust-louse (Psocus).

For life is so high a perfection of being that in this respect the least fly or mite is a more noble being than a star.
South, Works, III. x.

mite² (mit), n. [ME. mite, myte (= OF. mite, a small coin, = Sp. mite, a payment, assessment, tribute), < MD. mijte, D. mijt, small coin, a mite;
prob. akin to *mitel*¹, from the same root, Goth.
maitan, etc., cut: see *mite*¹.] 1. A small coin of any kind, of slight value; any very small sum of money. No coin seems to have been so called specifically.

William wíðtill with-oute any more,
Greithed him as gall as any gom thurt bene,
Of alle tñe a-tñr that to knígt longed,
So that non migt a-mend a mits worth, I wene.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 4543.

And though the number of sheep increase never so fast, yet the price falleth not one mite, because there be so few sellers.
Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), l.

There came a certain poor widow, and she threw in [i. e.
into the treasury] two mites [tr. Gr. λεπτόν: see lepton and minute], which make a farthing. Mark xii. 42.

We usually observe the same routine. I put down my mite first; then my young family enroll their contributions, . . . and then Mr. Pardiggle brings up the rear.
Dickens, Bleak House, viii.

2t. An English weight somewhat heavier than a grain troy.—3t. An old money of account, the twenty-fourth part of a penny.

4 mites is the aliquot part of a peny, viz. 1, for 6 times
4 is 24, and so many mites marchants assigne to 1 peny.

T. Hall, Arithmetic (1600), III. l.

4. Anything very small; a very little particle or quantity: also applied to persons.

"Now ich see," saide Lyt, "that surgerye ne phisike May nat a myte availle to medden a-gens Elde."
Piers Plowman (C), xxiii. 179.

I felt benevolence for her, and resolved some way or other to throw in my mite of courtesy, if not of service.
Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 19.

The White Sulphur waters, she said, had not done her a mite of good. C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 256.

mited (mi'ted), a. [*mite*¹ + -ed.] Damaged or spoiled by insufficient salting, as cured fish.
Perley.

Mitella (mi-tel'ä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700),
< L. mitella, dim. of mitra, a turban: see miter.]
A genus of plants of the natural order Saxifraga- ceae and the tribe Saxifragaceae, characterized by a one-celled ovary with parietal placentae which are alternate with the stigmas, five petals which are three-cleft or pinnatifid, and a superior capsule without beaks. They are herbs, with long-petiolate heart-shaped lobed or crenate leaves, which have membranaceous stipules attached to the petioles, and an erect slender scape bearing an elongated raceme of small greenish flowers, which are often drooping. There are 5 species, indigenous to the temperate parts of North America, one of which is also found in Siberia. M. diphylla and
M. nuda are the best-known. See bishop's-cop.

miter, mitre (mi'tér), n. [Early mod. E. also myter, mytre; < ME. mitre, myter, mytir, mytre, < OF. mitre, F. mitre = Pr. Sp. Pg. mitra = It.
mitra, Olt. metra, a miter, < L. mitra, < Gr.
μίτρα, a belt, girdle, fillet, head-band, turban.]
1. A form of head-dress anciently worn by the inhabitants of Lydia, Phrygia, and other parts of Asia Minor.—2. A sacerdotal head-dress, as that worn by the ancient Jewish high priest, or that worn by a bishop. The Jewish miter was made of linen, and wrapped in folds about the head, like a turban. Before the fourteenth century the miter in the Christian church was low and simple; but now it consists of a coronet, surmounted by a lofty and deeply cleft cap. The privilege of wearing the miter in the Roman Catholic Church was a concession of the popes, and was formerly exercised by cardinals and the higher dignitaries. Bishops and abbots (if to be mitered) receive the miter from the consecrat-ing bishop. Three kinds of miters are distinguished:
(1) the precious miter, made of gold or silver plate and adorned with jewels, (2) the auriphyrgate miter, and (3)
the simple miter of white silk or linen. The bishops of the Church of England wore miters as late as the coronation of George III., and some Anglican bishops occasionally wear them at the present day.
See tiara, and cut under auriphyrgia.

Episcopal Miter.—French type of the 14th century.

Her golden cup she cast unto the ground,
And crowned mitre rudely threw aside.
Spenser, F. Q., I. viii. 25.

The Cardinal [Wolsey] sent to the King, to lend him the Mitre and Pall, which he used to wear at any great Solemnity.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 279.

His Miter on his head of cloth of silver, with two long 1-bells hanging downe behind his neck.
Coryat, Crudities, l. 37 (sig. D).

All the old known mitres still in existence have a white ground.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, II.
[109, note.]

There, other trophies deck the truly brave, . . .
Such as on Hough's unsullied
mitre shine.
Pope, Epil. to Satires, II. 239.

3. A chimney-cap or -pot of terra-cotta, brick, stone, or metal, designed to exclude rain and wind from the flue, while allowing the smoke, etc., to escape; a cowl; hence, anything having a similar use.

For, like as in a Limbeck th' heat of Fire
Raiseth a Vapour, which still mounting higher
To the Still's top; when th' odoriferous sweat Above the Miter can no further get,
It, softly thickning, falleth drop by drop.
Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 8.

To bestow a miter upon; raise to a rank to which the dignity of wearing a miter belongs, especially to episcopal rank.

More than al thy marchauns other thy mytrede bisshopes.
Piers Plowman (C), v. 188.

From such apostles, O ye mitred heads, Preserve the church! Cowper, Task, II. 329.

2. To ornament with a miter.

Your first essay was on your native laws;
 Those having torn with ease and trampled down,
 Your fangs you fasten'd on the mitred crown.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, I. 202.

3. In carp., to join with a miter-joint; make a miter-joint in. See miter-joint.—4. In needle-work, to change the direction of, as a straight band, border, or the like, by cutting it at an abrupt angle, sacrificing a three-cornered piece, and bringing the cut edges together: a term derived from carpenter-work.—5. In bookbinding, to join perfectly, as lines intended to meet at right angles.—Cut and mitred string. See string.—Mitred abbey or monastery, an abbey or monastery presided over by a mitred abbot.

The abbess received a ring, which, however, was not bestowed on any abbot unless his house were a mitred abbey.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, II. 194.

Mitred abbot, back, border, etc. See the nouns.

II. intrans. In arch., to meet in a miter-joint.

miter-block (mī'tēr-blok), n. In joinery, a block arranged for sawing pieces to an angle of 45°. E. H. Knight.

miter-board (mī'tēr-bōrd), n. A miter-box in which a piece is laid while the saw reciprocates between guides which cause it to make the kerf at the prescribed angle. E. H. Knight.

miter-box (mī'tēr-boks), n. In carp., a long narrow wooden box consisting of a bottom and two sides in which kerfs at an angle of 45° (or some other angle) are cut for the reception of a saw: used in cutting pieces of wood to form miter-joints. The piece of wood to be mitred is laid in the box, and the saw, being worked through the guide-cuts in the vertical sides, cuts the wood to the necessary angle. (See miter-joint.) Another form consists of a bed and a fence, against which the work rests, and an adjustable guide for the saw, so that it admits of cutting at any required angle. In printing the name is given to a square channel of wood or iron having diagonal cuts in the sides, in which a saw can move freely in cutting pieces of wood or brass of uniform angles.

miter-cut (mī'tēr-kut), n. In glass-manuf., a groove cut in the surface of plate-glass for ornamentation. The cross-section of the groove or cut is very nearly an equilateral triangle.

miter-dovetail (mī'tēr-duv'tāl), n. In joinery, a form of concealed dovetail presenting only a single joint-line, and that on the angle. E. H. Knight.

miter-drain (mī'tēr-drān), n. A drain laid within the metaling of roads, to convey the water to the side drains.

miter-flower (mī'tēr-flou'ēr), n. A plant of the genus Cyclamen.

miter-gage (mī'tēr-gāj), n. A gage for determining the angle of a miter-joint or bevel-joint for picture-frames, moldings, etc. E. H. Knight.

mitering-machine (mī'tēr-ing-mā-shēn'), n. 1. In carp. and joinery, a machine for sawing or cutting to a true angle of 45° the ends of pieces to be joined, in order that they may be united by a miter-joint, or for cutting the pieces to any desired angle to make a bevel-joint. One form of this machine consists of a table with a circular saw and adjustable guides or fences; another consists of a bed and guide, with two blades at right angles, for making a downward cut, fixed at an angle of 45° to the guide and actuated by a lever. The latter form is used for mitring picture-frames and small moldings.

2. In printing, a mechanism of iron and steel, designed to cut the ends of metal rules with exact bevells and secure true joints at any angle. This is done in some machines by a saw, in others by a file or chisel.

miter-iron (mī'tēr-ī'ēr), n. A fagot for forging, composed of a group of bars of angular section wedged about a cylindrical bar within a hoop.

miter-jack (mī'tēr-jak), n. A simple form of miter-box or templet, consisting merely of a bed and a fence, against which the work rests. It is used for making miter-joints on small moldings.

miter-joint (mī'tēr-joint), n. A joint in which the plane of the abutting surfaces bisects the angle (properly 90°) formed by the abutting pieces.

Each of the abutting pieces is dressed to an angle of 45°; when they are dressed to an angle greater or less than 45° they are generally termed bevel-joints. When the angle formed by the junction of two parts is 45°, and the plane of division bisects this angle, the joint is sometimes called a half miter-joint. Also called miter.

miter-mushroom (mī'tēr-mush'rōm), n. A kind of mushroom of the genus Helvella, H. crispa: so named from the shape of the pileus. It grows in woods, and is delicate eating.

miter-plane (mī'tēr-plān), n. In carp.: (a) A plane in which the bit is set at an acute angle with the longitudinal axis of the stock. The effect of this arrangement is to give the action of the plane the character of a draw-cut. (b) A plane which runs in a race in angular relation to fences or gages, usually adjustable, by which the stuff to be planed is held to the action of the tool.

miter-post (mī'tēr-pōst), n. Same as meeting-post.

miter-shaped (mī'tēr-shāpt), a. Having the shape of a miter: said especially of a form of head-dress worn by women in the middle of the fifteenth century.

miter-shell (mī'tēr-shel), n. The turreted shell of a mollusk of the genus Mitra or family Mitridae; a tiara-shell. See cut under Mitra.

miter-sill (mī'tēr-sil), n. A raised step against which the foot of a canal-lock gate shuts on the floor of a lock-bay. E. H. Knight.

miter-square (mī'tēr-skwār), n. In carp., an immovable bevel for striking upon a piece of stuff an angle of 45°.

miter-valve (mī'tēr-valv), n. A valve of which the lid or plug is the frustum of a cone, the face of the seat being inclined at an angle of 45° to the axis of the valve.

miter-wheel (mī'tēr-hwēl), n. 1. In mech., a particular kind of bevel-wheel, the bevel being limited to an angle of 45°, and the teeth of the wheel meshing with the teeth of another of the same bevel and diameter. The shafts of the wheels are at right angles with each other; and rotary motion in any plane is, by this mechanism, translated, without change of velocity, into motion in another plane at right angles with the first. Miter-wheels are much used in mill-work. See bevel-wheel and bevel-gear.

Miter-wheels.

2. In glass-cutting, a wheel used for cutting a groove of triangular section.

miterwort (mī'tēr-wért), n. A name common to all plants of the genus Mitella.—False miterwort. See coolwort and Tiarella.
mithe, v. t. [ME. mithe, < AS. mithan (= OS. mithan = OFries. for-mitha = OHG. midan, MHG. miden, G. meiden), avoid, conceal, refrain from, forbear, intr. lie concealed: see miss.] To avoid; conceal.

His sorwe he couthe ful wel mithe.

Havelok, I. 943.

mithier (mīw'ēr), n. A Scotch form of mother.

mithic, a. An obsolete spelling of mythic.

Mithra, n. See Mithras.

Mithradatic (mith-rā-dat'ik), a. Same as Mithridatic, 1.

Mithræum (mith-rē'um), n. [NL., < L. Mithras, Mithras: see Mithras.] In Rom. antiqu., a shrine or sanctuary of Mithras: usually an underground cell, grotto, or crypt in which the secret mysteries of Mithras were celebrated.

In the Mithræum there were—there are still, because we have saved the place from destruction, and added it to the curiosities of Rome—the remnant of the seven torches . . . which were kept burning before the image of Mithras Tauroctonos.

Lanciani, Anc. Rome in the Light of Mod. Discov., p. 192.

Mithraic (mith-rā'ik), a. [Mithras + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the ancient Persian and late Roman god Mithras.

Two statues of Mithraic torch-bearers.

C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 206.

The Mithraic doctrines appear to have comprised all the prominent features of the Magian or Chaldean system, and we need not be surprised, therefore, that they are represented as embracing magical, occult, and thaumaturgical science.

A. Wüder, in Knight's Anc. Art and Myth (1876), p. xix.

Mithraicism (mith-rā'is-izm), n. [Mithraic + -ism.] Same as Mithraism.

Mithraicism, with explanations of its alliance with Occidental Christianity.

Pop. Sci. Mo., Literary Notices, XXXII. 500.

Mithraism (mith'ra-izm), n. [Mithras + -ism.] The worship of Mithras.

The religion of Mithra . . . played an important part in the thought of the early centuries of the Christian era, yet little is known of Mithraism at the present time.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 283.

Mithraist (mith'ra-ist), n. [Mithras + -ist.] A worshiper of Mithras.

This fact suggests a question . . . whether the Christians borrowed from the Mithraists, or the Mithraists from the Christians, or whether the coincidences are casual.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 283.

Mithraize (mith'ra-iz), v. i.; pret. and pp. Mithraized, ppr. Mithraising. [Mithras + -ize.] To teach, profess, or practise Mithraic doctrines; observe the rites of Mithras.

Mithras, Mithra (mith'ras, mith'rā), n. [L. Mithras, Mithres, < Gr. Μῦθρας, < OFers. Mitra = Skt. Mitra, lit. 'friend'.] 1. A deity of the ancient Persians, the god of light or of the sun, who came at last to be regarded as the ruler of both the material and the spiritual universe, and was worshiped with an elaborate ritual, with accompaniment of ceremonial mysteries. In this form his worship was adopted by the Romans under the early empire, and enjoyed great popularity. Representations of Mithras are common in Roman art, usually showing him as a youth in Oriental dress performing the mystic sacrifice of a bull. Sacred caves or grottoes were the regular seats of his worship.

They call upon no peculiar name of God, but only Mithra; in the which word they all agree together in one nature of the divine Majesty, whatsoever it be.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), II. 11.

The sacred grotto of Mithras, in the Campus Martius [Rome], . . . in the plot of ground which is now occupied by the Marlignoli palace.

Lanciani, Anc. Rome in the Light of Mod. Discov., p. 166.

2. A genus of South American lycaenid butterflies. Hübner, 1816.—3. A genus of spiders. Koch, 1835.

mithridate (mith'ri-dāt), n. [Also methridate, and improp. mithradite; < OF. mithridat, methridat, F. mithridate = Sp. It. mitridato = Pg. mitridato, < ML. mithridatum for LL. mithridatium, an antidote, neut. of L. Mithridatius, Mithridateus, of Mithridates, < Mithridates, < Gr. Μιθραδάτης, Μιθριδάτης, Mithridates VI., King of Pontus (died about 63 B. C.), who fortified himself against poisons by taking antidotes; a name of Pers. origin: cf. Mithras.] In old phar., one of various compositions of many ingredients in the form of electuaries, supposed to serve either as an antidote or as a preservative against poison.

I feel me ill; give me some mithridate;

Some mithridate and oil, good sister, fetch me.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, IV. 6.

Wine, as it be thy will! strong lusty wine!
 Well, fools may talk of mithridates, cordials, and elixirs;
 But from my youth this was my only physic.

Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, v. 2.

This is a course that will . . . alter slander into plety,
 . . . that the viper's flesh may become mithridate.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 758.

Mithridate mustard, a kind of penny-cress. See peppervort.

Mithridatic (mith-ri-dat'ik), a. [= F. mithridatique = Pg. mithridatico, < L. Mithridaticus, pertaining to Mithridates, < Mithridates, Mithridates: see mithridate.] 1. Of or pertaining to Mithridates, specifically to Mithridates VI. of Pontus (died about 63 B. C.): as, the Mithridatic wars. Also Mithradatic.—2t. [I. c.] Pertaining to or of the nature of mithridate.

mithridatum, n. [Improp. methridatum (after methridate); < ML. mithridatum for LL. mithridatium, an antidote: see mithridate.] Same as mithridate.

But what brave spirit could be content to sit in his shop, with a flappet of wood before him, . . . selling Mithridatum and dragons-water to visited houses [during the plague]? Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, I. 3.

mitigable (mit'i-gā-bl), a. [*LL. mitigabilis (in adv. mitigabiliter), < mitigare, mitigate: see mitigate.] Capable of being mitigated.

The vigour of that ceremonious law was mitigable.

Barrow, Works, II. xv.

mitigant (mit'i-gant), a. [= F. mitigant = Sp. It. mitigante, < L. mitigan(t)s, ppr. of mitigare, mitigate: see mitigate.] Mitigating; lenitive; soothing; alleviating. Bailey, 1727.

mitigate (mit'i-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. mitigated, ppr. mitigating. [L. mitigatus, pp. of mitigare (> It. mitigare = Sp. Pg. mitigar = F. mitiger), make mild, gentle, soft, or tender, < mitis, mild, etc., + agere, make: see agent.] 1. To make milder or more tolerable; reduce in amount or degree, as something objectionable, reprehendsible, distressing, harmful, etc.; moderate; alleviate; assuage.

And dieted with fasting every day,
The swelling of his wounds to mitigate.

York Plays, p. 314.

mitis (mi'tis), n. [NL. use of L. mitis, mild, gentle.] A South American cat: same as cati.

mitis-casting (mi'tis-kās'ting), n. The name given by P. Ostberg, the inventor of the process, to a method of increasing the fluidity and lowering the fusing-point of iron and steel, by adding a small quantity of aluminium (about half of one per cent.) to the charge in the crucible the moment it has been melted. This is said greatly to facilitate the casting process, and to add to the strength of the metal. The aluminium is added in the form of an alloy of 8 to 10 per cent. of that metal with iron. This alloy is made by a patented process consisting, as is stated, in adding clay to the iron in the process of smelting. The mitis-castings are said to be rapidly taking the place of malleable-iron castings.

mitis-green (mi'tis-grēn), n. Same as Paris green or Scheele's green. See *green*¹.

Mitosata (mi-tō-sā'tā), n. pl. [NL., irreg. < Gr. mitos, a thread, + -ata².] In Fabricius's system of classification, the centipeds and millepeds: equivalent to Myriapoda. [Not used.]

mitotic (mi-tō'sik), a. [< mitos(is) + -ic.] Pertaining to, characterized by, or exhibiting mitosis. Also mitotic.

mitosis (mi-tō'sis), n.; pl. mitoses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. mitos, a thread, + -osis.] 1. Splitting of the chromatin of a nucleus, or subdivision of any minute granular bodies embedded in living protoplasm. The mitosis occurring in nuclear kinetics is commonly qualified as karyomitosis. — 2. A figure occurring during mitosis as a result of that process.

mitotic (mi-tō'tik), a. [< mitosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Same as mitotic.

This scheme of Remak's . . . is now contrasted with another mode of division, the mitotic division ("karyomitosis," . . . "mitosis," or "indirect division" of Fleming; "karyokinesis" or "karyokinesis" division of Schleicher).
Microsc. Sci., XXX. II. 168.

mitotically (mi-tō'ti-kā-li), adv. By mitosis.

It may be doubted whether these cells divide only mitotically.
Microsc. Sci., XXX. II. 196.

Mitra (mī'trā), n. [NL., so called from the shape of the shell, < L. mitra, < Gr. mitra, a miter, turban: see miter.] 1. The typical genus of Mitridae, having a heavy long fusiform shell with well-developed spire and plicate columella, likened to a bishop's miter. There are over 200 species, mostly from the Philippine and related waters, but also from other warm seas, as the West Indian. The best-known is M. episcopalis, ornamented with square spots of red, orange, or salmon color. An arctic species is M. (Volutimitra) greenlandica.

2. A genus of aculeophs.

Mitracea (mi-trā'sē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Mitra + -acea.] Same as Mitridae.

mitracean (mi-trā'sē-an), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Mitracea or Mitridae; mitriform.

II. n. A miter-shell; any member of the Mitracea.

mitraille (F. pron. mē-trā'ly'), n. [< F. mitraille, small bits of grape-shot, with unorig. r, < OF. mitaille, fragments, as coarse filings, < mite, a small piece of money, a mite: see mite².] Small missiles, especially grape, canister, fragments of iron, and the like, when fired, as upon an enemy at close quarters.

mitraille (F. pron. mē-trā'ly'), v. t.; pret. and pp. mitrilled, ppr. mitrilling. [< F. mitriller, fire mitraille, < mitraille, mitraille: see the noun.] To fire mitraille at. [Rare.]

At the moment when the regiment nearest the enemy was beginning a retreating movement, in order to entice the Prussians on, the latter emerged from a wood between Borney and Colombey, and mitrilled the French.
Scotman.

mitrailleuse (F. pron. mē-trā'lyez'), n. [F., fem. noun of agent, < mitriller, fire mitraille: see mitraille, v.] A machine-gun or combination of gun-barrels and mechanism intended to discharge small missiles in great quantity and with great rapidity; especially, a form of machine-gun introduced in the French army about 1868, and first brought into service in the Franco-German war of 1870-1. See cuts under machine-gun.

The Maxim mitrailleuse or machine gun of rifle caliber.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LX. 102.

mitral (mī'tral), a. [*< F. mitral = It. mitrale, < ML. mitrallis (neut. mitrale, a box in which to keep a miter), < mitra, a miter: see miter.] 1. Of or pertaining to a miter; resembling a miter.

Wholly omitted in the mitral crown.
Sir T. Browne, Garden of Cyrus, II.

2. In anat., mitriform; bivalvular: specifically applied to that valve in the heart which guards the left auriculoventricular orifice. Also called bicuspid. — 3. In med., pertaining to the mitral valve: as, mitral sounds; mitral insufficiency; mitral disease.

mitrate (mī'trāt), a. [< miter (mitr-) + -ate¹.] In bot., bonnet-shaped, or rounded and folded: said of the pileus of certain fungi.

mitre, n. and v. See miter.

Mitrephorus (mī-tref'ō-rus), n. [NL., also Mitrephorus, < Gr. mitrophoros, mitrophoros, wearing a turban or miter, < mitra, turban, miter (see miter), + -phoros, < pherein = E. bear¹.] 1. In entom., a singular genus of curculios, having the prothorax armed with an anterior horn. The only species is M. waterhousei of Brazil. Schönherr, 1837. — 2. In ornith., a genus of small olivaceous flycatchers of the family Tyrannidae, named by Selater in 1859. It includes several species, as M. fulvifrons, inhabiting the southwestern United States, Mexico, and tropical America. The name being preoccupied in entomology, it was changed to Mitrephanes. Coues.

3. A genus of worms.

Mitridae (mī'tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mitra + -idae.] A family of rachioglossate pectinibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Mitra; the miter-shells. The family is related to the volutes and olives, and is often merged in Volutidae. The teeth of the odontophore are disposed in three longitudinal rows, and the long turreted shell has a narrow aperture with the columella plaited near the anterior end. About 400 species have been described, chiefly from tropical seas; those of the Pacific are of large size and striking colors, though the pattern may be concealed in the living state by the horny epidermis. Also called Mitracea. See cut under Mitra.

mitriform (mī'tri-fōrm), a. [= F. mitriforme, < L. mitra, a miter, + forma, form.] 1. In bot., resembling a miter; conical, hollow, open at the base, and either entire there or irregularly cut: applied to certain fruits and to the calyptra of mosses. See calyptra. — 2. In conch., shaped like a miter-shell; resembling the Mitridae.

Mitridae (mī'tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mitra + -idae.] 1. A subfamily of Mitridae, nearly equivalent to the family. — 2. The Mitridae regarded as a subfamily of some other family, as the Volutidae or the Muricidae.

mitry (mī'tri), a. [< OF. mitré, pp. of mitrer, miter: see miter, v.] In her., charged with a number of miters, as a bordure, a fesse, or the like.

mitt (mit), n. [Also mit; abbr. of mitten.] 1. Same as mitten. — 2. A sort of glove without fingers, or with very short fingers. Mitts sometimes cover the hand only and sometimes the forearm to the elbow. A common material is black lace; they are also knitted of silk of various colors. They were especially worn by women early in the nineteenth century; the fashion has recently been revived.

3. Something resembling a mitt.

The hands and forearms of the women (of Yap, in the Western Carolines) are tattooed with mitts, as in the Marshall Islands.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX. 208.

mitten (mit'n), n. [Early mod. E. also mittain; < ME. mitaine, mytane, myteine, myteyne, < OF. (and F.) mitaine (ML. mitana, mitanna), also mitan, miton (= Sp. mitor); cf. ML. mita, mitten: derived by some, in the supposed orig. sense of 'half-glove,' from OHG. mittamo, MHG. mittemo, middle, midmost (superl. of mitte, middle: see *mid*¹); by others referred to a Celtic source: cf. Gael. Ir. mutan, a thick glove, a muff, Gael. miotag, miotog, a mitten, Ir. mutog, a stump, a hand or glove without fingers.] 1. A glove; a covering for the hand, with or without fingers.

4. In chem., a blending of several ingredients without chemical alteration of the substances, each of which still retains its own nature and properties; distinguished from combination, in which the substances unite by chemical attraction, lose their distinct properties, and form a compound differing in its properties from any of the ingredients.—5. In organ-building, a flue-stop having two or more pipes to each digital, the pipes being so tuned as to give certain sets of the shriller harmonics of the fundamental tone of the digital; a compound stop. The stop is known as "of two ranks," "of three ranks," etc., according to the number of pipes to a digital. The harmonics chosen for reinforcement vary with the pitch of the fundamental tone, a low tone being provided with higher harmonics than a high one. The points in the compass where changes from one set of harmonics to another take place are called breaks. The harmonics usually chosen are those that lie at the intervals of fifths or octaves from the fundamental tone, rarely at those of thirds and sevenths. Mixtures serve two purposes: to enrich the total effect of heavy combinations by reinforcing the brilliant overtones of the harmony, and to emphasize the upper tones of heavy chords by reinforcing their nearer harmonics. They are never properly used except in combination with foundation-stops. Mixtures are variously named, as cornet, flute, etc.

6. A cloth of variegated or mottled coloring, usually of sober tints.—7. In printing, type-setting that calls for the use of three or more distinct faces or faces and bodies of type. [Eng.]—8. Also called Oxford gray, pepper-and-salt, and thunder-and-lightning.—Prince's mixture, a dark kind of snuff scented with attar of roses.—Rule of mixtures. Same as allegation, 2.—Syn. 2. Mixture, Miscellany, Medley, Farrago, Hotchpotch, Jumble; variety, diversity. Mixture is a general term denoting a compound of two or more ingredients, more often, but not necessarily, congruous. Miscellany is a collection of things not closely connected, but brought together by rational design: "A miscellany has the diversity without the incongruity of a medley." (C. J. Smith, Syn. Disc., p. 564.) Specifically, a miscellany is a collection of independent literary pieces, the unity lying only in their general character. A medley is a mixture or collection of things distinctly incongruous: the word has the specific sense of a song or tune made up of scraps of other songs or tunes ingeniously and amusingly fitted together. Farrago emphasizes the confusion or indiscriminateness of the mixture or collection: it is applied chiefly to printed or spoken discourse. Hotchpotch is a still more energetic expression of the confusion of the collection, the idea being drawn from the boiling together of shreds of all sorts of food. Jumble implies the idea of a heap turned over and over till everything is hopelessly mixed. The figurative uses correspond essentially to the literal.

Pure from passion's mixture rude, Ever to base earth allied. Lowell, Comm. Ode.

The world lies no longer a dull miscellany and lumber-room, but has form and order. Emerson, Misc., p. 94.

They have 9 primaries, 12 rectrices, scutellate tarsi, and a moderate bill usually notched and furnished with rictal vibrissae. There are many genera and upward of 100 species, all confined to America. They are small and usually prettily colored birds of the woodland, all insectivorous and in temperate and cold regions migratory. They abound in species and individuals in eastern portions of the United States, where they form a very characteristic feature of the avifauna. Leading genera in that country are Dendroica, Mniotilta, Parula (or Compsothlypis), Protonotaria, Helminthophila, Geothlypis, Icteria, Myiodytes, and Setophaga. The family is usually divided into 3 subfamilies: Mniotiltinae (or Sylviocolinae), Icteriinae (or Geothlypinae), and Setophaginae, or the wood-warblers, ground-warblers, and fly-catching warblers respectively. Also called Dendroicae.

mob-story (mob'stō'ri), n. A vulgar story or tale. Addison.

moccadot, mockadot (mok'ā-dō), n. [Also mochado, mockador, mockadoo; cf. OF. moucade, also mocayart, moceado (Cotgrave), < OIt. mociaro, mociarorro, moceado (Florio); perhaps so called as used for handkerchiefs: see moccador, muckender.] 1. A stuff in use in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It is mentioned as being made of wool and of silk, and apparently of a mixture of either with flax, and was a substitute for the more expensive velvet. It was probably a material similar to velveteen, and of many grades of fineness and beauty.

Who would not think it a ridiculous thing to see a Lady in her milke-house with a velvet gowne, and at a bridall in her cassock of moccado?

Pottenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 238.

2. Sham; mockery.

Neither of them would sit, nor put their hats on: what mockado is this to such a poor soul as I!

Richardson, Pamela, II. 37. (Davies.)

moccadori, n. [Also moccador, mockadour, muckador, etc., and hence muckender, q. v.; < ME. mokadour = F. mouchoir, a handkerchief, = It. moccatore, moccadore, a snuffer, *< ML. as if mucatorium, < mucare, wipe the nose, < mucus, mucus, mucus: see mucus.] A handkerchief.

For eyen and nose the nedethe a mokadour

Or sudary. Lydgate, Advice to an Old Gentleman, xl.

moccasin¹ (mok'ā-sin or -sn), n. [Also moccason, moccasin, moccassen, < Algonkin mawcahsun, makkasun, makasin; a shoe (see def.).] A shoe or cover for the feet, made of deer-skin or other soft leather, Moccasin.

without a stiff sole, and usually ornamented on the upper side; the shoe customarily worn by the American Indians.

All the footsteps had the prints of moccasins.

J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, xli.

Moccasin embroidery. Same as grass-embroidery.

moccasin² (mok'ā-sin or -sn), n. [Also moccason, moccassin (?); appar. short for moccasin-snake, which is then < moccasin¹ + snake; but the reference to moccasin¹ is not explained.] A venomous serpent of the United States. (a)

Ancistrodon (or Toxicophis or Trigonocephalus) piscivorus, a somewhat aquatic snake of the southern United States, resembling the copperhead, Ancistrodon contortrix, specifically called water-moccasin, sometimes water-viper. See cut on following page. (b) The same or a very similar snake found on dry land, the so-called high-land moccasin, A. atrifuscus, known in the southern United States as the cottonmouth, and much dreaded. Moccasins are rather small snakes, commonly about two feet long, dark olive-brown above and yellowish-brown below, with blackish bars and blotches. They are much darker in color than the copperhead, lacking the bright bronzy tints of the latter, and there is a whitish or light streak along the lip: they also have the scales in 25 instead of 23 rows, and no lateral plate. The top of the head is mostly covered with scales like those of the back, instead of large regular plates as in innocuous serpents; it is flat and broad, and shows the pit between the eyes and nose as in all the Crotalidae or pit-vipers.

Water-moccasin (Ancistron piscivorus).

moccasin (mók'a-sin or -sind), a. [< moccasin¹ + -ed².] Wearing or covered with moccasins.

Specifically—(a) The head man of a village, responsible for the collection of the revenue. (b) The head man of a gang of laborers or body of peons. Yule and Burnell.

mod¹, n. A Middle English form of mood¹.

mod, n. An abbreviation (a) of modern; (b) in music, of moderato.

modal (mō'dal), a. and n. [= F. Sp. Pg. modal = It. modale, < ML. modalis, pertaining to a mode, < L. modus, mode: see mode¹, n.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or affected by a mode; relating to the mode or manner, and not to the substance.

When we speak of faculties of the soul, we assert not with the schools their real distinction from it, but only a modal diversity. Glauville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, iii.

Specifically—2. Of or pertaining to a grammatical mode.

Other verb-phrases, of a modal meaning, are made with the auxiliary verbs may, can, must, and ought.

Whitney, Essentials of Eng. Grammar, ¶ 291.

All those adjectives which have a modal secondary force are future.

Modal abstraction, the fixing of the attention upon one particular mode of the object of imagination, to the neglect of the others: opposed to partial abstraction, by which, for example, we may think of the head of an animal without thinking of the rest of the body.—Modal categorical. See categorical.—Modal composition, the composition of an ens with one of those modes which are in their own nature distinguished from the ens.—Modal distinction, a distinction by which one and the same thing is distinguished from itself by its possession of diverse modes, as the distinction of Philip drunk from Philip sober; a formalistic phrase.—Modal enunciation. See enunciation.—Modal identity, either the absence of modal distinction, or the identity of a mode of things which may be really distinct.—Modal proposition, a proposition in which the predicate is affirmed of the subject under some qualification: but the term is almost always confined to propositions in which some fact is said to be possible, contingent, necessary, or impossible.—Modal syllogism, a syllogism one of whose premises is a modal proposition.

II. n. A modal proposition.

Their characteristic property as modals belongs to form rather than to matter; and Aristotle ought not to be considered as unphilosophical for introducing them into the Organon.

Conjunct modal. See conjunct.—Disjunct modal. See disjunct.

modalism (mō'dal-izm), n. [< modal + -ism]. In theol., the doctrine, adopted by Sabellius in the third century, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are different manifestations of one and the same person.

The orthodox doctrine of the Trinity stands between trithelism and modalism, now leaning to the one, now to the other, when either the tripersonality or the unity is emphasized.

P. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 68.

modalist (mō'dal-ist), n. [< modal + -ist]. In theol., one who holds or professes modalism.

modalistic (mō-da-lis'tik), a. [< modalist + -ic]. In theol., of or pertaining to modalism.

Harnack, Encyc. Brit., xli. 127.

modality (mō-dal'i-ti), n.; pl. modalities (-tiz). [= F. modalité = Pg. modalidade = It. modalità, < ML. modalitas (-t)s, < modalis, modal: see modal.] 1. The fact of being a mode.—2. A determination of an accident; a mode.

These excellencies are of more real and eternal worth than the angelical manner of moving so in an instant, and those other forms and modalities of their knowledge and volition.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1885), II. 194.

3. Mode in the logical sense; that wherein problematical, assertoric, and apodictic judgments are distinguished.

Lastly, under the head of Modality, we have seen that all phenomena, as objects, are in themselves contingent, or only hypothetically necessary, i. e. necessary on the presupposition of the existence of something else.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 564.

Just as the adjectives which contain the modal force of possibility can lose this modality, so also certain adjectives can assume the same, although the modality was not originally in them.

Amer. Jour. Philol., x. 44.

4. In civil law, the quality of being limited as to time or place of performance, or more loosely, of being suspended by a condition: said of a promise.—5. Same as modalism.

To object that the faith in the Holy Trinity obliges us to as great a difficulty as the Pontifical modalité is very trifling, since that is only matter of belief indefinite. We are not required to explain the manner of the mystery.

Evelyn, To Rev. Father Patrick.

Adverbial modality. See adverbial.—Categories of modality. See category, 1.

modally (mō'dal-i), adv. In a modal manner; in a manner or relation expressing or indicating a mode or form; as regards mode or manner.

mode¹ (mōd), n. [Also, in grammar, logic, and music, mood; also, as mere L., modus; in ME. mode (def. 8), *< OF. moed, meuf, later mode, F. mode, manner, way, mode, style, fashion, = Sp. Pg. It. modo, manner, mode (also Sp. Pg. It. moda, f., fashion, < F.) (cf. D. mode = G. Mod = Sw. mod = Dan. mode, style, fashion, < F.; G. Sw. Dan. modus, in grammar, < L.), < L. modus, measure, due measure, rhythm, melody, etc., manner, way, mode, mode in grammar, etc.; akin to E. metel. The form mood, as used, along with mode, in grammar, music, and logic, is prob. due in part to some confusion with mood¹, as if 'an attitude of mind.'] 1. A manner of acting or doing; way of performing or effecting anything; method; way.

A table richly spread in regal mode.
Milton, P. R., II. 840

What modes of sight between each wide extreme!
Pope, Essay on Man, l. 211.

Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, cvl.

2. Customary manner; prevailing style; fashion.

It was grown a Mode to be vicious, and they had rather be damned than be out of the fashion.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. xii.

To White Hall, and in the garden spoke to my Lord Sandwich, who is in his gold-buttoned suit, as the mode is, and looks nobly.

Pepys, Diary, II. 8.

If after this we look on the people of mode in the country, we find in them the manners of the last age.

Addison, Country Manners.

3. In gram., the designation, by the form of the verb, of the manner of our conception of an event or fact, whether as certain, contingent, possible, desirable, or the like. The modes of the English verb are the indicative, subjunctive, and imperative; and other verbal phrases are usually called by the name of modes, as potential, conditional, and so on. See these terms. Also commonly, but less properly, mood.

4. The natural disposition or the manner of existence or action of anything; a form: as, heat is a mode of motion; reflection is a mode of consciousness.

There is something in things which neither is the thing itself, nor another thing, nor yet nothing, but a certain medium betwixt them both. And this used to be called a mode: for example, A degree of quality is not quality, nor yet is it wholly nothing, but a mode.

Burgesadicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

A mode is the manner of existence of a thing. Take, for example, a piece of wax. The wax may be round or square or of any other definite figure; it may also be solid or fluid. Its existence in any of these modes is not essential; it may change from one to another without any substantial alteration. As the mode cannot exist without a substance, we can accord to it only a secondary or precarious existence in relation to the substance, to which we accord the privilege of existing by itself, per se existere; but though the substance be not restricted to any particular mode of existence, we must not suppose that it can exist, or at least be conceived by us to exist, in none. All modes are therefore variable states; and though some mode is necessary for the existence of a thing, any individual mode is accidental.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., viii.

I am . . . assured that those modes of consciousness which I call perceptions and imaginations, in as far only as they are modes of consciousness, exist in me.

Descartes, Meditations (tr. by Veitch), iii.

Where the substantiality of God, as the "highest monad," is insisted on, the finite monads become mere modes of his existence.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 82.

That mode or process of the Moral Faculty which we call Conscience. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 341.

5. A combination of ideas. See the quotations.

Modes I call such complex ideas, which, however compounded, contain not in them the supposition of subsisting by themselves, but are considered as dependencies on or affections of substances.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xii. 14.

There are some (modes) which are only variations or different combinations of the same simple idea. . . . as a dozen, or score: which are nothing but the ideas of so many distinct units added together: and these I call simple modes, as being contained within the bounds of one simple idea.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xii. 5.

Combinations of simple ideas of different kinds I have called "mixed modes."

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xii. 5.

6. In logic: (a) A modification or determination of a proposition with reference to possibility and necessity. (b) A variety of syllogism. See mood², the more usual but less proper form.

Tindall would be fayne wit in what figure it is made; he shal finde in the first figure in the third mode.

Sir T. More, Works, p. 504.

(c) The consignification of a part of speech. (d) An accidental determination.—7. In music: (a) A species or form of scale; a method of dividing the interval of the octave for melodic purposes; an arrangement of tones within an octave at certain fixed intervals from each other. Three great systems of modes are to be distinguished—the ancient Greek, the Gregorian, medieval, or ecclesiastical, and the modern. These three were successively derived from each other, but with noteworthy changes of both principle and nomenclature. (1) In the Greek system each mode consisted of two tetrachords (two whole steps and one half-step in each) plus one whole step (the diatonic tone). The nature and the name of the mode varied according to the tetrachord used as a basis and according to the position of the diatonic tone, or, in other words, according to the relative order of the whole steps and half-steps. When the diatonic tone lay between the two component tetrachords, the mode was named simply from the tetrachord used—the mode containing Dorian tetrachords was called Dorian or Doric, etc.; but when it lay below or above both of them, the prefixes hypo- and hyper- respectively were added, as Hypophrygian, Hyperlydian, etc. Below is a table of the nine original modes, reckoned upward, the whole steps being indicated by —, the half-steps by +, the constituent tetrachords by —, and the diatonic tone by +:

I. Dorian,	+ — + — + — + —
II. Phrygian,	— + — + — + — +
III. Lydian,	+ — + — + — + —
IV. Hypodorian, or Eolian,	+ — + — + — + —
V. Hypophrygian, Ionian, or Iastian,	— + — + — + — +
VI. Hypolydian,	+ — + — + — + —
VII. Hyperdorian, or Mixolydian,	— + — + — + — +
VIII. Hyperphrygian, or Locrian,	+ — + — + — + —
IX. Hyperlydian,	— + — + — + — +

These modes were embodied in scales of about two octaves, sometimes called transposing scales, which were more or less susceptible of transposition. By the later theorists fifteen such scales were recognized, each derived from one of the foregoing modes, and beginning at a different pitch, each a half-step higher than the preceding. These scales, though not always differing from each other in mode, but only in relative pitch, were also called modes, and were named like the modes themselves. Assuming the lowest modernness (mod'ern-nes), n. The quality or character of being modern; conformity to modern ideas or ways; recentness.

The modernness of all good books seems to give me an existence as wide as man.

Emerson, Nominalist and Realist.

The more we know of ancient literature the more we are struck with its modernness.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 178.

modest (mod'est), a. [< F. modeste = Sp. Pg. It. modesto, < L. modestus, moderate, keeping measure, discreet, modest, < modes-, a stem appearing as mōder- in moderate, moderate, < mōdus, measure: see modēl, moderate.] 1. Retiring in disposition or demeanor; restrained by a sense of propriety, humility, or diffidence; not ostentatious, bold, or forward; unobtrusive.

And we see him as he moved,

How modest, kindly, all-accomplish'd, wise.

Tennyson, Idylls of the King, Ded.

2. Acting with decorum or delicacy; restrained by chaste or scrupulous feelings; pure in thought and conduct.

And, that augmented all her other prayer,
She modest was in all her deeds and words.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. II. 85.

Mistress Ford, the honest woman, the modest wife.

Shak., M. W. of W., IV. 2. 136.

Thou woman, which wert born to teach men virtue,
Fair, sweet, and modest maid, forgive my thoughts!

Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, v. 5.

3. Manifesting or seeming to manifest humility, propriety, or decorum; not gaudy, showy, or meretricious.

That women adorn themselves in modest apparel.

1 Tim. II. 9.

In peace there's nothing so becomes a man
As modest stillness and humility.

Shak., Hen. V., III. 1. 4.

The yellow violet's modest bell
Peeps from the last year's leaves below.

Bryant, The Yellow Violet.

4. Moderate; not excessive or extreme; not extravagant: as, a modest computation; a modest fortune.

Modest wisdom plucks me

From over-credulous haste.

Shak., Macbeth, IV. 3. 119.

I have in the relation of my wrongs
Been modest, and no word my tongue deliver'd

To express my insupportable injuries
But gave my heart a wound.

Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, II. 1.

5. Unpretentious.

There is, it is true, a modest hotel for the use of those who make a short visit. Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 487.

—Syn. 1. Unassuming, unpretending, coy, shy. See bashfulness.—2. Decent, chaste, virtuous.

modestless (mod'est-less), a. [Irreg. < modest + -less.] Without modesty.

Alas! how faithless and how modestless

Are you, that, in your Ephemerides,

Mark th' year, the month, and day, which euermore

Gainst years, months, days shall dam vp Saturnes dore!

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 1.

modestly (mod'est-li), adv. In a modest manner; with due reserve, propriety, or decorum; unobtrusively; delicately; moderately: as, to speak modestly of one's achievements; to behave, dress, or live modestly.

modesty (mod'es-ti), n. [< ME. modestie, < OF. (and F.) modestie = Sp. Pg. It. modestia, < L. modestia, moderation, < modestus, modest: see modest.] 1. The quality of being modest; moderation; freedom from exaggeration or excess.

Modestie: which worde not being knowen in the Englyshe tongue, ne of all them whiche vnderstande Latine, excepte they had red good auctours, they improperly named this vertue dyscrecion. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, I. 25.

2. Retiring disposition or demeanor; disinclination to presumption, ostentation, or self-assertion; unobtrusiveness; reserve proceeding from absence of over-confidence or self-esteem.

Suit the action to the word, the word to the action; with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty of nature.

Shak., Hamlet, III. 2. 21.

There is a kind of confession in your looks which your modesties have not craft enough to colour.

Shak., Hamlet, II. 2. 289.

The people carried themselves with much silence and modesty.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 91.

Modesty is a kind of shame or bashfulness proceeding from the sense a man has of his own defects compared with the perfections of him whom he comes before.

South, Sermons, II. IV.

Next to Sir Andrew in the club-room sits Captain Sentry, a gentleman of great courage, good understanding, but invincible modesty. He is one of those that deserve very well, but are very awkward at putting their talents within the observation of such as should take notice of them.

Steele, Spectator, No. 2.

3. Decorous feeling or behavior; purity or delicacy of thought or manner; reserve proceeding from pure or chaste character.

Talk not to a lady in a way that modesty will not permit her to answer.

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe.

The sister of St. Gregory of Nyssa was afflicted with a cancer in her breast, but could not bear that a surgeon should see it, and was rewarded for her modesty by a miraculous cure.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 338.

—Syn. 2. Diffidence, Shyness, etc. See bashfulness.
modesty (mod'es-ti), v. t. [< modesty, n.] To lose from modesty: with away. [Rare.]

Twice already have you, my dear, if not oftener, modesty'd away such opportunities as you ought not to have slipped.

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. 83. (Davies.)

modesty-bit (mod'es-ti-bit), n. Same as modesty-piece.

Smile if you will, young ladies! your great-grandmothers wore large hoops, peaked stomachers, and modesty-bits.
Southey, The Doctor, lvi. (Davies.)

modesty-piece (mod'es-ti-pēs), n. See the quotation.

A narrow lace . . . which runs along the upper part of the stays before . . . being . . . a part of the tucker, . . . is . . . called the modesty-piece.
Addison, Guardian, No. 118.

modicum (mod'i-kum), n. [L. modicum, neut. of modicus, moderate, small, lit. keeping within due measure, < modus, measure: see model.] 1. A small or moderate quantity; a scanty or meager allowance; a limited amount or degree.

Though nature weigh our talents, and dispense
 To every man his modicum of sense.
Cowper, Conversation, l. 2.

2. Any small thing; a diminutive person.

Marc. Where are you, you modicum, you dwarf?
 Mari. Here, giantsess, here.
Massinger, Duke of Milan, iii.

3. Something eaten to provoke thirst.

There was no boot to bid runne for drams to drive down this undigested modicum.
Armin, Nest of Ninnies (1608). (Nares.)

Lay open all thy secrets and the mystical hieroglyphick of rashers a' th' coales, modicums, and shoving-hornes.
Dekker, Gull's Hornbook (1609).

modifiability (mod-i-fi-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< modifiable + -ity: see -bility.] Capability or susceptibility of being modified or varied, as in character, type, form, or function.

Living matter once originated, there is no necessity for another origination, since the hypothesis postulates the unlimited, though perhaps not indefinite, modifiability of such matter.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 41.

Other causes than those which are usual become conceivable; other effects can be imagined; and hence there comes an increasing modifiability of opinion.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 486.

modifiable (mod'i-fi-a-bl), a. [< F. modifiable, *< L. as if modificabilis, < modificare, modify: see modify.] Capable of being modified or varied; capable of being changed in character, type, form, or function.

It appears to me more difficult to conceive a distinct visible image in the uniform unvariable essence of God than in variously modifiable matter.
Locke, Examination of Malebranche.

At the same time . . . we clearly recognize the limits which separate what is modifiable from what is unmodi-fiable.
G. H. Leves, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 26.

modifiableness (mod'i-fi-a-bl-nes), n. Modifiability.

Buffon, who contended for the modifiableness of species.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 117.

modifiable (mod'i-fi-a-bl), a. [*< L. as if modificabilis, < modificare, modify: see modify.] Same as modifiable. Bailey.

modificate (mod'i-fi-kāt), v. t. [< L. modificate, pp. of modificare, moderate: see modify.] To qualify; to modify.

He [Christ] shall reign for ever and ever, not only to the modified eternity of his mediatorship. . . . but also to the complete eternity of the duration of his humanity.
Dr. Pearson, The Creed, vi.

modification (mod'i-fi-kā'shon), n. [< F. modification = Sp. modificación = Pg. modificacão = It. modificazione, < L. modificatio(n), a measuring, < modicare, limit, control, modify: see modify.] 1. Determination by a mode or quality; qualification.

The use hereof [of sense] being only to minister to the modification of life in the vital principle, wherein the essence of sense doth consist.
N. Greu, Cosmologia Sacra, II. 3.

2. The act or process of modifying or altering in character, form, or function; the act or process of producing variation.

Unity of type, maintained under extreme dissimilarities of form and mode of life, is explicable as resulting from descent with modification; but is otherwise inexplicable.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 136.

3. Alteration or change: often specifically in the sense of abatement or reduction.

The chief . . . of all signes . . . is Humane voice, and the several modifications thereof by the Organs of Speech, viz. the Letters of the Alphabet, formed by the several Motions of the Mouth.
Holder, Elem. of Speech, p. 6.

For those progressive modifications upon modifications which organic evolution implies, we find a sufficient cause in the modifications after modifications which every environment over the Earth's surface has been undergoing, throughout all geologic and pre-geologic times.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 169.

4. The result of variation or alteration; that which marks or shows variation of character, form, or function; mode, form, or condition reached through process of change, or through being modified.

If it [the soul] be neither matter nor any modification of matter.
Clarke, To Mr. Dodswell.

The word modification is properly the bringing a thing into a certain mode of existence, but it is very commonly employed for the mode of existence itself.
Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., viii.

Every act of will for the control of the mental train, or for the apperception of an object of sense, through concentrated attention, is defined by some particular mental state or modification upon which it is directed.
G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 537.

5. In Scots law, the determining of the amount of the stipend of the minister of a parish. This is fixed by a decision of the Court of Teinds, called a decree of modification.—6. In music, same as temperament.—Latent mental modification, an unconscious activity of mind. Hamilton.—Mental modification, a state of the mind. = Syn. Change, alteration, variation, qualification.

modificative (mod'i-fi-kā-tiv), n. [= F. modificatif = Sp. Pg. It. modificativo; as modificate + -ive.] That which modifies or serves to modify or qualify.

We may observe that the Spirit of Truth itself, where numbers and measures are concerned, in times, places, and persons, useth the aforesaid modificatives ["almost",
 and "very nigh"].
Fuller, Worthies, I. xxi.

modifier (mod'i-fi-kā-tōr), n. [< modificate + -or.] A modifier.

Nitrogen is an agent distinctly sedative and anti-catarrhal; sulphuretted hydrogen, a modifier of the skin and of mucous membranes.
Science, XIV. 318.

modificatory (mod'i-fi-kā-tō-ri), a. [< modificate + -ory.] Tending to modify or produce change in form or condition; modifying.

A certain modificatory syllable.
Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 181.

modifier (mod'i-fi-ēr), n. One who or that which modifies.

modify (mod'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. modified, ppr. modifying. [< ME. modifien, < F. modifier = Sp. Pg. modificar = It. modificare, < L. modicare, limit, control, regulate, deponent, modificari, measure off, set bounds to, moderate, < modus, measure, + facere, make: see model and -fy.] 1. To qualify; especially, to moderate or reduce in extent or degree.

Of his grace
 He modifies his first severe decrea. Dryden.

Morton, at once archbishop and chancellor, allowed his judgment on a fraudulent executor to be modified by the reflexion that he would be "damnée in hell."
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 817.

2. To change the properties, form, or function of; give a new form to; alter slightly or not very much; vary: as, to modify the terms of a contract; a prefix modifies the sense of a word; light is modified by its transmission through certain media. In crystallography one crystalline form is said to modify another when the two occur together in the same crystal, the modified form predominating; thus, the cube may be modified by the trapezohedron. A highly modified crystal is one showing a large number of different crystalline forms.

The sixteenth statute doth me grete grevaunce,
 But ye must that releasse or modifie.
Court of Love, l. 1014.

The middle part of the broad beam of white light which fell upon the paper did, without any confine of shadow to modify it, become coloured all over with one uniform colour.
Newton, Opticks.

Modify implies the continued existence of the subject-matter to be modified, but with some change or qualification in form or qualities without touching the mode of creation. It implies no power to create or bring into existence, but only the power to change or vary in some particular an already created or existing thing.
State v. Lawrence, 12 Oreg. 297.

Thus I can understand how a flower and a bee might slowly become, either simultaneously or one after the other, modified and adapted to each other in the most perfect manner, by the continued preservation of all the individuals which presented slight deviations of structure mutually favorable to each other.
Darwin, Origin [of Species, p. 98].

Modified logic. See pure logic, under logic.

modii, n. Plural of modius.

modilich, adv. A Middle English form of modily.

modillion (mō-dil'-yon), n. [< OF. modillon, modillon, F. modillon = Sp. modillon = Pg. modilhão, < It. modiglione, Romanesque Modillion.

 Church of Celle (Loire), France.

a modillion, < L. modulus, a model: see model, module, modulus.] In arch., a block carved into the form of an enriched bracket, used normally under the corona in the cornice of the Corinthian and Composite, and occasionally of the Roman Ionic, orders, and in Renaissance and modern designs based upon these, and also in appropriate forms in the various medieval styles; a corbel; a bracket. Compare mutule. Also spelled modillon.—Angular modillion, a modillion at the return of a cornice, in the diagonal vertical plane passing through the angle or miter of the cornice.

Modiola (mō-dī'ō-lā), n. [NL., < L. modiolus, a bucket on a water-wheel, nave of a wheel, etc.: see modiolus.] In conch., a common and well-known genus of mussels, of the family Mytilidae, much resembling Mytilus, but not having the umbones terminal; the horse-mussels, M. modiola and M. plicatula are abundant on European and American beaches. There are numerous others, some of great size, all resembling the common mussel. Also Modiolus.

Horse-mussel (Modiola lithophaga).

modiolar (mō-dī'ō-lār), a. [= F. modiolaire; as modiolus + -ar.] Same as modioliform.

modioli, n. Plural of modiolus, 1.

modioliform (mō-dī'ō-li-fōrm), a. [< L. modiolus, a bucket on a water-wheel, a nave (see modiolus and NL. Modiola), + forma, form.]

1. Shaped like the nave of a wheel; barrel-shaped.—2. In conch., resembling a mussel of the genus Modiola; mytiliform or mytiloid.—3. Resembling a modiolus; columelliform or columellar.

modiolus (mō-dī'ō-lus), n. [NL., < L. modiolus, a bucket on a water-wheel, nave of a wheel, a trepan (ML. dim. of modius, a measure of grain), a peck, also the socket of a wheel, < modus, measure: see model.] 1. Pl. modioli (-li). In anat., the columella cochleæ or central pillar around which the cochlear lamina winds in a spiral like a staircase.—2. [cap.] In conch., same as Modiola. Lamarck, 1799.—Central canal of the modiolus. See canal.

modish (mō'dish), a. [< model + -ish.] According to the mode or customary manner or style; fashionable; stylish: often used with a suggestion of contempt. [Obsolescent.]

'Tis not modish to know Relations in Town.
Congreve, Way of the World, III. 15.

A nurse in a modish Paris cap. Hood, Miss Kilmansegg.

This [two young ladies in white evening dresses], as a modish portrait, has much merit, the drawing of the faces being admirable, and much delicate and unobtrusive skill being lavished on the rendering of the stuffs and ornaments.
The Academy, May 25, 1889.

modishly (mō'dish-li), adv. In a modish or fashionable manner.

modishness (mō'dish-nes), n. The quality of being modish; stylishness; fashionableness.

modist (mō'dist), n. [< model + -ist.] A follower of the mode or fashion.

modiste (mō-dēst'), n. [F. (= Sp. Pg. It. modista), a milliner, < mode, mode, fashion: see model.] A woman who deals in articles of fashion, particularly in women's apparel; a milliner or dressmaker.

They [the English] may make good colonists, sailors, and mechanics; but they do not make good singers, dancers, actors, artists, or modistes.
Smiles, Character, p. 263.

modius (mō'di-us), n.; pl. modii (-i). [L. modius (> Gr. μόδιος), a dry measure (see def. 1), a vessel of this capacity, < modus, measure: see model.] 1. A Roman dry measure, one third of the amphora, containing about 8½ liters or 550 cubic inches, and thus equal to nearly 2 English gallons.—2. In classical art, a head-dress of high cylindrical form, approaching that of modius, the measure of capacity (see def. 1), worn typically by certain divinities. See cut on following page.

modiwart, n. Same as modwarp.

Modot (mō'dō), n. [Appar. a made name. Cf. Mahu.] The prince of darkness; the fiend.

The prince of darkness is a gentleman: Modo he's called, and Mahu.
Shak., Lear, III. 4. 149.

Modoc whistle. See whistle.

modo et forma (mō'dō et fōr'mā). [L. modo, abl. of modus, manner; et, and; forma, abl. of forma, form: see model and form.] In manner and form: a phrase used in old Latin law-pleadings.

modoqua (mō'dō-kwā), n. Same as madoqua.

modulant (mō'dū-lant), n. [< L. modulān(t)-s, ppr. of modulari, modulate: see modulate.]

Modius.—Head of Statuette of Kora or Proserpine, found at Cnidus.

That which modulates or varies. See modulate, r. t., 2.

In modern English verse alliteration only plays the subordinate part of a modulant, not to be unduly decried where not overdone.

E. Wadham, Eng. Versification, p. 119.

modular (mod'ū-lār), a. [= F. modulaire; as module + -ar.] Pertaining to modulation; pertaining to or regulated by a module or a modulus. — Modular equation. See equation. — Modular focus, a focus of a conicoid or quadric surface. "The distance of any point on the quadric from such a focus is in a constant ratio to its distance from the corresponding directrix, the latter distance being measured parallel to either of the planes of circular section." (Salmon.) — Modular function, a higher periodic function connected with a group of periods where $ad - bc = 1$. — Modular method of generation of quadrics, a method based on the fundamental property of the modular foci. — Modular numbers, in Landen's transformation, numbers approximating to the value of the new modulus. They are the successive approximations in the process of finding the arithmetico-geometrical mean of the old complementary modulus and unity. — Modular ratio, the modulus of a system of logarithms. See logarithm. — Modular transformation of an elliptic integral, a transformation of the elliptic integral into another with a different modulus.

modulate (mod'ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. modulated, ppr. modulating. [L. modulatus, pp. of modulari, measure, regulate, modulate, < modulus, measure: see modulus. Cf. module, v.] I. trans. 1. To modify; adjust; adapt; regulate.

With the gift of song, Carlyle would have been the greatest of epic poets since Homer. Without it, to modulate and harmonize and bring parts into their proper relation, he is the most amorphous of humorists, the most shining avatar of whim the world has ever seen.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 148.

2. To vary or inflect the sound or utterance of, especially so as to give expressiveness to what is uttered; vary or adapt in tone.

In all vocal music it [the tongue] helpeth the wind-pipe to modulate the sounds.

N. Grev, Cosmologia Sacra, I. v. 16.

He listened to the voice of nature, and modulated his own unto it.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, v. 3.

Calus Gracchus, it is said, when he harangued the Roman populace, modulated his tone by an oratorical flute or pitch-pipe.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 213.

We are conscious of a murmuring humble voice: it is a beggar, who is modulating a prayer for alms and bowing assiduously.

Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 680.

3. To vary the pitch of; inflect; melodize.

The master's hand, in modulated air,
Bids the loud organ breathe.

Somerville, The Chase, III.

He [Glück] is to play on a set of drinking-glasses, which he modulates with water.

Walpole, Letters, II. 14.

4. In music, to change from one key (tonality) to another, by utilizing one or more of the tones common to both.

II. intrans. 1. In music, to pass from one key (tonality) into another, or from the major into the minor mode, or vice versa. See modulation, 3 (b). Hence—2. To vary, oscillate, or fluctuate. [Rare.]

It is written from no well-defined standpoint, but modulates from illustrations of the Rochefort experimenters to the telepathic drawings of the English society for psychic research, and thence to the localization diagrams of Ferrier, with no clear method.

Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 516.

modulation (mod'ū-lā'shən), n. [F. modulation = Sp. modulación = Pg. modulação = It. modulazione, < L. modulatio (n-), < modulari, regulate, modulate: see modulate.] 1. The act of modulating. (a) The act of modifying, adjusting, or adapting.

The emperours . . . delited in daunsyng, perceyving therein to be a perfecte measure, whiche maye be called modulation.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, I. 20.

When we fix ourselves upon the meditation and modulation of the mercy of God, even his judgments cannot put us out of tune, but we shall sing and be cheerful even in them.

Donne, Sermons, II.

(b) The act of inflecting the voice or any instrument in a musical manner.

The rings of the wind-pipe are fitted for the modulation of the voice.

N. Grev, Cosmologia Sacra, I. v. 10.

(c) The modification of the voice or of utterance to express various shades of meaning or emotion.

The poets of Elizabeth had attained an art of modulation which was afterwards neglected and forgotten.

Johnson, Waller.

2. A state or condition reached by a process of modulating, modifying, or varying.

That delicate modulation of surface treatment which gives high value to the best Florentine metal work.

C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 124.

3. (a) In Gregorian music, one of the tones in a mode with which every phrase of a melody in that mode must begin and end. The regular modulations of each mode include the final, the dominant, the mediant, and the participant, each of which has its own peculiar functions. (See these words, and also mode.) To these are added two other tones in each mode, called conceded modulations, which are of minor importance.

(b) In mod. music, the act, process, or result of changing, in the course of a piece, from one key (tonality) to another, so that a new tone becomes the key-note and the relative significance of all the tones common to both tonalities is altered. When a tone foreign to the original tonality of a piece is used, a modulatory effect is nearly always produced. If this effect is carried out into a cadence in the new key, the modulation is called final; otherwise it is passing or transient. All modulations, however, require a return to the original key before the end of the piece. The tone by which the transition is introduced or effected is called the note of modulation; this tone in the simpler forms of modulation is usually the fourth or the seventh tone of the new key. The simplicity of a modulation depends upon the closeness of relationship between the keys involved. The simplest modulations are into the keys either of the dominant or of the subdominant, and are effected by sharpening the fourth tone or flattening the seventh tone respectively of the original key. Modulations into the relative minor or into the minor keys of the supertonic or of the mediant are effected by sharpening the fifth, the first, or the second tone of the original key respectively. Numerous other more intricate modulations are possible, especially in instrumental music. A modulation is abrupt, distant, or extraneous, when it leads into a key not closely related with the original one. It is deceptive when it utilizes a series of chords in an unusual and startling way. It is melodic when produced by the introduction of a tone foreign to the original tonality, and harmonic when produced by the use of a chord common to both tonalities first in its relation to one and then in that to the other. It is enharmonic when it is effected on an instrument of fixed intonation, like the pianoforte, by calling a key (digital) first by one name and then by another, as when E₄ in the key of B₄ is called D₅ in the key of B₅. Modulation is one of the most important resources of modern music. It introduces endless variety of both melodic and harmonic effect, with great possibilities in the way of sequences and imitations. It increases the unity of a composition and the importance of the original tonality by introducing a temporary disturbance of original tonal relations, with a subsequent complete and emphatic resumption of them. It affords means for the expression of very complex emotional conditions, particularly those of unrest, contrast, etc. In the style of Wagner it has often been pushed to the limit of toleration, so as almost to destroy that sense of fixed tonality which is the basis of musical certitude. The most remarkable harmonic convenience for modulation, at least in instrumental music, is a chord of four tones consisting of three minor thirds successively superposed, which is called the chord of the diminished seventh. This chord may be regarded as based upon any one of its four tones, which is then the seventh tone of either a major or a minor scale. Its harmonic nature is therefore peculiarly ambiguous and unstable. (c) A musical composition exemplifying modulation.—4. Sound modulated; melodious.

Innumerable songsters, in the freshening shade Of new-spring leaves, their modulations mix Mellifluous.

Thomson, Spring, l. 600.

5. In arch., the proportion of the different parts of an order according to a module. = syn. 1 (b). Accent, etc. See inflection.

modulator (mod'ū-lā-tor), n. [= F. modulateur = Sp. Pg. modulador = It. modulatore, < L. modulator, a regulator, director, < modulari, regulate: see modulate.] 1. One who or that which modulates.

What a variety of uses hath nature laid upon that one member, the tongue, the grand instrument of taste, the faithful judge, the centinel, the watchman of all our nourishment, the artful modulator of our voice!

Derham, Physico-Theology, v. 5.

2. A chart of the musical scale, indicating the relations of its essential tones to each other and of the whole scale to its related scales. The form of modulator generally used in the tonic sol-fa system of teaching music is shown in the accompanying chart.

modulatory (mod'ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [< modulate + -ory.] Of or pertaining to modulation.

Modulations are really governed by the same laws which apply to any succession of harmonies whatsoever, and the possibilities of modulatory device are in the end chiefly dependant upon intelligible order in the progression of the parts.

Grove's Dict. Music, II. 345.

module (mod'ūl), n. [< F. module = Sp. módulo = Pg. It. modulo, a measure, module, < L. modulus, a small measure, a measure, mode, meter, dim. of modus, measure: see model. Cf. modulus, model, mold.] 1. A little measure; hence, a small quantity.—2. In arch., a standard of measure often taken, particularly in antiquity and the middle ages, to regulate the proportions of an order or the disposition of an entire building. In the classical styles the diameter or semidiameter of the column at the base of the shaft is usually selected as the module, and this is subdivided into parts or minutes, the diameter generally into sixty or the semidiameter into thirty. Some architects employ no fixed number of divisions of the module, but divide it into as many parts as they deem serviceable for the work in hand.

3. A model or representation; a mold; a pattern.

Among so many Modules admirable,

Th' admired beauties of the King of Creatures,
Com, com, and see the Womans raptures features.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 6.

4. In numis., the size of a coin or medal, measured by the diameter. [Rare.]

modulet (mod'ūl), r. t. [< F. modulet = Sp. Pg. modular = It. modulare, modolare, modulate, < L. modulari, regulate, modulate: see modulate.] 1. To model; shape.

O, would I could my father's cunning use,
And souls into well moduled clay infuse.

Sandys, Ovid (1638), p. 10. (Latham.)

2. To modulate.

That Charmer of the Night, . . .
That modulet her tunes so admirably rare,
As man to set in parts at first had learn'd of her.

Drayton, Polyolbion, xiii. 10.

modulet (mod'ū-let), n. [< module + -et.] A small model; a microcosm.

But soft, my Muse: what? wilt thou re-repeat
The Little-Worlds admired Modulet?

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 7.

Modulidae (mō-dū'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Modulus + -idae.] A family of tænioglossate rostriferous gastropods represented by the genus Modulus. The animal has a radula like that of the Cerithiidae, but has no siphon, and the shell is holostomatous and trochiform, but with a columellar tooth. The species are inhabitants of tropical seas, and one, Modulus tectum, is abundant in the West India.

modulizet (mod'ū-liz), r. t. [< module + -ize.] To model.

While with the Duke, th' Eternal did deulse,
And to his inward sight did modulize
His Tabernacle's admirable Form.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Lawe.

modulus (mod'ū-lus), n. [< L. modulus, a measure, dim. of modus, measure: see module, model.] 1. In math., a real positive number that serves as measure or parameter of a function or effect. Represented by M. or μ.—2.

In physics, the measure of an effect under conditions whose measure is unity. Thus, a physical modulus is not a number, but a physical quantity.—3. [cap.] In conch., a genus of gastropods, referred to the Littorinidae or periwinkles, or made type of the family Modulidae. The shell is depressed and trochiform, with a deeply cut columellar tooth and many-whorled operculum.—Absolute modulus of gravitation, the acceleration due to the gravitation of a body toward a mass of one gram at a distance of one centimeter. It amounts to 648×10^{-10} centimeters per second.—Angle of the modulus, in math., the angle of which the modulus is the sine.—Complementary modulus, in math., the cosine of the angle of the modulus.—Gravity-modulus in physics, a modulus of elasticity in which the weight of a unit mass is taken as the unit of force.—Length of modulus, in physics, a modulus of elasticity expressed as a length by taking the weight of the unit volume of the material referred to as the unit of force.—Modulus of a congruence, in math., that measure or divisor which gives equal remainders when the two congruent numbers are divided by it, this constituting the congruence. Thus, 23 is congruent to 2, the modulus being 7; and this is written by Gauss and others $23 \equiv 2 \pmod{7}$.—Modulus of a linear transformation, in math., the square of the determinant of the matrix of transformation—that is, if the transformation takes place according to the equations

$$\begin{aligned}x &= a\xi + b\eta + c\zeta \\y &= d\xi + e\eta + f\zeta \\z &= g\xi + h\eta + i\zeta,\end{aligned}$$

then the modulus of transformation is

$$\begin{vmatrix}a & b & c \\d & e & f \\g & h & i\end{vmatrix}^2$$

Modulus of a machine, the ratio of the load to the power in equilibrium.—Modulus of a matrix, in math., the determinant of the matrix, this having the same constituents arranged in the same way.—Modulus of an elliptic integral, differential, or function, in math., that positive number less than unity the square of which multiplies the square of the sine of the amplitude or variable angle in the delta or square root which enters into the expression of such a quantity.—Modulus of an imaginary, in math., that real positive number which multiplied by a root of unity gives the imaginary.—Modulus of a system of logarithms, in math. See logarithm.—Modulus of elasticity, in physics, in its general sense, the quantity of elasticity or the ratio of a stress to the strain that occasions it: but applied by older and less careful writers to Young's modulus (named after its inventor, Dr. Thomas Young, a celebrated English physicist (1773–1829)), which is the pressure or tension on the end of a bar per unit of section divided by the compression or elongation per unit of length so produced. See elasticity.—Modulus of gravitation, in astron., the square root of the component acceleration due to gravitation of any body toward the sun at a distance equal to the mean distance of the earth. See absolute modulus, above.—Modulus of propulsion. See the quotation.

As 100 cubic inches of cylinder capacity are needed to move an engine with 20 tons adhesive weight one inch, if we divide 100 by 20 we get the cylinder capacity needed for each ton. That is, $100 \div 20 = 5$ cubic in. cylinder capacity per ton (of 2,000 lbs.) of adhesive weight is needed to move any locomotive one inch. This quantity we have named the modulus of propulsion.

Forney, Locomotive, p. 415.

Quadratic modulus, in math., the square of the determinant.—Young's modulus. See modulus of elasticity, above.

modus (mō'dus), n. [L. modus, manner, mode: see mode.] 1. Manner; mode: same as mode. 1.

We are not to hope that the modus of it should fall, or be comprehended, under human enquiry.

Bacon, Physical Fables, viii., Expi.

The same evangelical power did institute that calling, for the modus of whose election it took such particular order.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 164.

2. In Rom. and civil law, and early Eng. law, the manner or qualifying terms of a gift or disposition of property. The introduction of writing as the instrument of gift or transfer enabled donors to vary the customary legal consequences by expressing an intent as to the manner or mode in which the act should have effect; and that part of the instrument which thus qualified what otherwise would have been the ordinary legal effect was termed the modus, and the same term was used to designate the legal qualification thus imposed. Hence, more specifically—(a) The clause in a will or other gift (and the legal obligation created thereby) by which the donor charged an obligation upon the legatee or donee, not as a condition the breach of which would create a forfeiture, but as a personal obligation, which the legatee would assume by accepting the gift. (b) Also, in early Eng. law, the clause in a conveyance enlarging or restricting the estate which otherwise would be granted by it, as for instance by giving to the donee and his heirs, or his heirs and assigns, or by giving to the donee and only a specified class of heirs. Hence the old common-law maxims modus et conventio vincunt legem and modus legem dat donationem, meaning specific qualification and express agreement override the law, or give the law to the transfer. (c) In eccles. law, the exemption, or partial exemption, from the payment of tithes, termed modus decimandi and modus non decimandi respectively.

One terrible circumstance of this bill is turning the tithe of flax and hemp into what the lawyers call a modus, or a certain sum in lieu of a tenth part of the product. Swift.

A tithe of turf and a tithe of furze had been lately introduced, and certain moduses, or compositions, which had elsewhere been substituted for other tithes, were in this province [Munster] unknown.

Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvi.

Modus operandi, a plan or mode of working.—Modus ponens, in logic, inference from a hypothetical proposition and the truth of the antecedent to the truth of the consequent: as, If I am bad, I deserve punishment; I am bad, hence I deserve punishment.—Modus tollens, in logic, the inference from a hypothetical proposition and the falsity of the consequent to the falsity of the antecedent: as, If I were to jump out of the window, I should break my neck; now I won't break my neck, hence I sha'n't jump out of the window.—Modus vivendi, a manner or way of living; a temporary arrangement pending a settlement of matters in debate, as between two nations.

modwall (mōd'wāl), n. [Also mudwall, mid-wall; origin obscure.] The bee-eater, Merops apiaster. [Local, British.] modity (mō'di), a. [L. modus + -y.] Fashionable; modish.

Mr. Longman, you make me too rich and too modity.
Richardson, Pamela, I. 128. (Davies.)

modity², a. An obsolete form of moody.

moe¹, a. and adv. See mo.

moe², n. and v. An obsolete form of move.

moeblet, a. and n. Same as *moble*¹.

moellon (mō'el-lon), n. [F., < OF. moillon, moylon, broken stone, rubble, cf. moillon, moelon, middle, center, < moelle, marrow, pith, = Sp. mocollo = Pg. medulla = It. midollo, < L. medulla, marrow, pith, crumbs, < medius, middle. Cf. OF. moye, moie, the soft part of stone, < L. media, fem. of medius, middle: see medium. Cf. moiety.] Rubble-stone, sometimes used in architecture, set in mortar, for such uses as filling between the facing-walls of a structure or in the spandrels of a bridge.

moerologist (mō-rol'ō-jist), n. [moerology + -ist.] A professional mourner. [Rare.]

moerology (mō-rol'ō-ji), n. [Gr. μοῖρα, part, lot, fate, + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] The practice or art of professional mourning.

Moesogoth (mō'sō-goth), n. [L. Mæsi, Gr. Μαῖοι, a people of Thrace, L. Mæsia, Gr. Μαισία, Μαίσις (Μαίσις ἡ ἐν Εὐρώπῃ, Mysia in Europe, in distinction from Mysia in Asia Minor), their country (see def.), + Gothi, Gr. Γόθοι, Goths: see Goth.] One of those Goths who settled in Mæsia, a Roman province north of the Balkans, south of the Danube, and east of Illyricum, and there, under the protection of the Roman emperors, devoted themselves to agricultural pursuits. The Moesogoths were converted to Christianity in its Arian form by Bishop Ulfilas in the fourth century. See Goth.

Moesogothic (mō-sō-goth'ik), a. and n. [L. Mæsiogothicus, < Mæsiogothi, the Moesogoths: see Mæsiogothi.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Moesogoths or their language.

II. n. The language of the Moesogoths. See Gothic, n.

mofet, v. An obsolete form of move.

mofette (mō-fet'), n. [= Sp. mofeta, < It. (dial.) mofetta, < L. mephitis, a noxious exhalation: see mephitis.] An irrespirable gas escaping from the earth: a gas-spring. It is sometimes (although rarely) applied by writers in English to carbonic-acid gas escaping from the rocks in regions of nearly extinct volcanism, and, by extension, to the openings from which this gas escapes. The mofettes are analogous to the soufflé or "blow-holes," but betoken a still further advance of the region toward complete extinction of the volcanic forces.

moffle (mof'l), v. i.; pret. and pp. moffled, ppr. moffling. [Freq. of muff (1). Cf. maffle.] To do anything clumsily or ineffectually; botch. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

mofussil (mō-fus'il), n. [Hind. mufassal, the country as distinguished from the town, lit. separate, < Ar. fasala, separate, fassala, cut, cut out, detail.] In India, the country stations and districts as distinguished from the residences; or, in a district, the rural localities as distinguished from a station or official residency; the country as distinguished from towns.

A whiff of freshness and fragrance from the mofussil will be as the mangoes and the dorianas.

J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 308.

mog¹, v. i. See mug².

mog² (mog), v. i.; pret. and pp. mogged, ppr. mogging. [Origin obscure.] To move away. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

Mogadore gum. Same as Barbary gum (which see, under *gum*²).

Mogdad coffee. See coffee.

moggan (mog'an), n. [Gael. and Ir. mogan.] A footless stocking. [Scotch.]

mogilalia (mō-i-lā'li-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. μογιλία, < μογί, hardly speaking, < μῶγος, hardly, + λαλέω, talk, prattle.] In pathol., stammering speech.

Mograbian (mō-grā'bi-an), a. and n. [Ar. and Turk. Moghrab, Mograb (see Mograb), + -ian.] Same as Mograb.

Mograb (mō'gra-bin), a. and n. [Also Maghrabin, Mughrabin, Mohgrabin (f), Maughrabin; < Ar. Turk. Moghrabi, < Moghrab, Mograb (see def.). Cf. Mograbian.] 1. a. Relating to Mograb, a region in northern Africa, regarded as nearly equivalent to the coast-region of Morocco and Algeria.

II. n. An inhabitant of Mograb.

My proper name is only known to my brethren. The men beyond our tents call me Hayraddin Maughrabin—that is, Hayraddin the African Moor.

Scott, Quentin Durward, xvi.

Mogul (mō-gul'), n. and a. [= F. Sp. Pg. Mogol = Ar. Moghul = Pers. Moghol, Mughal = Turk. Mughul, < Hind. Mughal, < Mongolian Mongol, Mongol: see Mongol.] 1. n. 1. A Mongol or Mongolian; specifically, in hist., one of the followers of Baber, conqueror of Hindustan in the sixteenth century.—2. A name for the best quality of playing-cards.—Mogul engine. See engine.—The Great Mogul. (a) The common designation among Europeans of the sovereign of the so-called Mogul empire, or empire of Delhi, at one time including most of Hindustan, established by Baber about 1526, and brought under British control in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the last nominal emperor being deposed in 1857. Also called simply the Mogul.

King, poet, priest, the Mogul was to the good Mahomedan what a descendant of the House of Jesse would be to a nation of Jews. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 62. Hence—(b) Any great personage.

II. a. Of or relating to the Moguls, or the Mongol empire in India: as, the Mogul language; the Mogul dynasty.—Mogul architecture, the style of Mohammedan architecture evolved and carried out by the Mogul emperors in India, from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century. The period was one of lavish expenditure in building, and innumerable mosques, royal tombs, and palaces testify to its artistic originality, to its excellent use of both arched and columnar construction, and of the dome, characteristically of bulbous form, and to the delicacy and good taste of its decorators in carving and in inlaying with precious stones. The arches are usually pointed, and as a rule resemble in outline the so-called Tudor arch. Minarets and especially small pavilions covered with domical roofs, either surrounding a large dome or placed in great numbers at the angles or along the parapets of the copings of palaces, are other characteristic features.

Moguntine (mō-gun'tin), a. [L. Moguntia, also Mogontiacum, Magontiacum, Magontiacus, the ancient name of the city now called in G. Mainz, sometimes Mentz, in F. Mayence.] Of or pertaining to Mainz, a city at the junction of the Rhine and the Main.

moha (mō'hā), n. The grass Setaria Italica, or Italian millet.

mohair (mō'hār), n. and a. [Formerly also mockaire; < OF. mouhaire, mouaire, mohere, F. moire (> E. moire, G. mohr, moire = Pr. moira = Sp. moare, muér, mué = Pg. morim = It. moero), mohair; cf. It. mocajardo, haireloth; prob. < Ar. mukhayyar, a fabric of goat's hair, a kind of camelot.] 1. n. 1. The hair of the Angora goat, a native of Asia Minor.—2. A kind of fine camelot made of such hair, sometimes watered (see moire); also, an imitation of the real mohair made of wool and cotton, much used for women's dress.

Cloth of Wooll, Karsies, Mockaires, Chamlets, and all sorts of Silks. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 273.

She . . . when she sees her friend in deep despair, Observes how much a chintz exceeds mohair! Pope, Moral Essays, II. 170.

Mohair glacé, a French dress-goods made of cotton and goat's hair.

II. a. Made of mohair: as, a mohair cloak.—Mohair braid, worsted braid used for binding garments.—Mohair luster, a black dress-goods of cotton and mohair. It has some resemblance to alpaca.

mohair-shell (mō'hār-shel), n. In conch., a certain species of Voluta, of a closely and finely reticulated texture, having a resemblance to mohair.

Mohamedan, a. and n. An obsolete form of Mohammedan.

Mohammedan (mō-ham'e-dan), a. and n. [Also Mohammadan, Muhammadan (also Mahomedan, Mahometan, q. v.) (= D. Mohamedaan = G. Mohamedaner = Sw. Mohammedan, Muhamedan = Dan. Muhamedaner = Hind. Muhammadī), < Mohammed, < Ar. Muhammad, a man's name, lit. 'praised,' < hamada, praise. From the Ar. Muhammad are also ult. E. Mahound, Mahoun, maumet, mammet, etc.] 1. a. Pertaining to Mohammed, or Mahomet (about A. D. 570 to 632), the founder of the Moslem religion, and after his flight from Mecca (622) the creator of the realm which grew into the Saracenic empire; pertaining to the religious and social system founded by Mohammed.—Mohammedan calendar, era, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. A follower of Mohammed, the founder of the Moslem religion; one who professes Mohammedanism; a Moslem or Mussulman.

Mohammedanism (mō-ham'e-dan-izm), n. [< Mohammedan + -ism.] 1. The Mohammedan religion and polity; the religious and ethical system taught in the Koran; Islamism.—2. Belief in or adherence to the teachings of Mohammed.

Mohammedanize (mō-ham'e-dan-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Mohammedanized, ppr. Mohammedanizing. [< Mohammedan + -ize.] To make conformable to the principles or rites of Mohammed; make Mohammedan; convert to Islam. Also spelled Mohammedanise.

Mohammedism (mō-ham'e-dizm), n. [< Mohammed + -ism.] Same as Mohammedanism.

Mohammedize (mō-ham'e-diz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Mohammedized, ppr. Mohammedizing. Same as Mohammedanize.

moharra, mojarra (mō-har'jā), n. [Pg.] 1. An embiotocoid fish, Hypsurus caryi, having a very short anal fin: so called from its resemblance to the Gerridae, which are known by the same name. [Local, Monterey, California.]—2. Any fish of the family Gerridae.

Moharram (mō-har'gām), n. Same as Muharram.

Mohawk (mō'hāk), n. [Formerly also Mohock, Mohack; Amer. Ind.] 1. One of a tribe of American Indians of the Huron-Iroquois family, situated along the Mohawk river. It was the easternmost of the Five Nations. See Iroquois.—2. A ruffian; specifically [cap. or l. c.], one of those who infested the streets of London about the beginning of the eighteenth century: so called from the Indian tribe of that name.

Give him [a youngster] Port and potent Sack;
From a Milkop he starts up Mohack.
Prior, Alma, III.

Did I tell you of a race of rakes, called the Mohocks, that play the devil about this town every night, slit people's noses and beat them, etc.?
Swift, Journal to Stella, March 8, 1711.

The Mohock-club, a name borrowed it seems from a sort of cannibals in India, who subsist by plundering and devouring all the nations about them.
Steele, Spectator, No. 824.

Who has not trembled at the Mohock's name?
Gay, Trivia, III. 326.

Mohegan (mō-hē'gān), a. and n. Same as Mohican.

Mohican (mō-hē'kān), a. and n. [Also Mohegan; from the native name.] 1. a. Of or relating to the Mohicans or Mohegans.

II. n. One of a tribe of American Indians of the Algonkin stock.

Moho (mō'hō), n. [NL., < Hawaiian moho, the bird here defined.] 1. A genus of meliphagine birds peculiar to the Sandwich Islands, named by Lesson in 1831. The bill is arcuate, longer than the head, with naked operculate nostrils; the tarsal are boot-ed; and the plumage is blackish with yellow pectoral tufts and some white tail-feathers. There are 2 species, M. nobilis and M. apicalis, formerly called yellow-tufted bee-eater. Also Mohoa (Reichenbach, 1850) and Aeroloceros (Cabanis, 1847).
2. [l. c.] Any bird of this genus.

Mohocki, n. An obsolete form of Mohawk.

mohoe (mō-hō'), n. [Also moho, mohaut.] Same as mohoc, 1.

mohr (mōr), n. [Ar.: cf. mohr, a colt.] An African antelope or gazel, Gazella mohr. The horns are annulated with ten or twelve complete rings. It is much sought after by the Arabs, on account of producing the bezoar-stones so highly valued in Eastern medicine, commonly called in Morocco mohr's eggs. A related species, Gazella semmerringi, is known as Sömmerring's mohr. Also mohor and mohorr.

mohsite (mō'sit), n. [Named after Friedrich Mohs, a German mineralogist (1773-1839).] Native titanite iron, or ilmenite.

mohur (mō'hér), n. [Also mohar; < Hind. muhar, muhr, mohr, < Pers. muhur, muhr, mohr, a seal, a gold coin.] A modern gold coin of India under the British dominion, equivalent Obverse. Reverse.

Mohur. (Size of the original.)

to 15 rupees, or about $7; also, a gold coin of the native princes of India from the sixteenth century onward.

mohwa-tree, n. See mahwa-tree.

molder (mōi'dér), v. [Also moither; cf. muddle.] 1. trans. 1. To confuse; perplex; distract; bewilder.

I've been strangely moyder'd e're sin 'bout this same news oth' French king. I conno believe 'tis true.
Wit of a Woman (1706). (Nares.)

You'll happen be a bit moithered with it [a child] while it's so little.
George Eliot, Silas Marner, xiv.

2. To spend in labor.

She lived only to scrape and hoard, moldering away her loveless life in the futile energies and sordid aims of a miser's wretched pleasure.
Cornhill Mag.

[Obsolete or prov. Eng. in both uses.]

II. intrans. To labor hard; toil. [Prov. Eng.]

moldore (mōi'dör), n. [Also moedore; < Pg. moeda d'ouro, lit. money or coin of gold: moeda, < L. moneta, money; de, < L. de, of; ouro, < L. aurum, gold: see money, *de*², and aurum, or³.]

Obverse. Reverse.
Moldore. (Size of the original.)

A gold coin (also called lisbonine) formerly current in Portugal. It was equivalent in value to about $6.50.

He says his expenses in the relief of our prisoners have been upwards of fifty moldores.
Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 231.

moiety (mōi'e-ti), n.; pl. moieties (-tiz). [Formerly also moitie; < F. moitié = Sp. mitad = Pg. metade = It. metà, a half, < L. medieta (-t)s, a half, the middle, a middle course, < medius, middle: see mediety and medium.] 1. A half part or share; one of two equal parts: as, a moiety of an estate, of goods, or of profits.

The charge there would be so great by crauers and expenses that the moities of the profits would be wholly consumed.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 257.

2. A portion; a share.

Methinks my moiety, north from Burton here,
In quantity equals not one of yours.
Shak., I Hen. IV., III. 1. 96.

Anti-moiety law, a United States statute of 1874, which repealed all United States moiety acts.—Moiety act, a statute giving one half of fines, penalties, and forfeitures to informers or private prosecutors.—Moiety system, a system at one time adopted by the United States government for finding out the names and indebtedness of delinquent taxpayers, by which the informer or person making the discovery and aiding in the collection received as compensation a certain proportion of the amount collected.

moill (mōil), v. [Early mod. E. also moile, moyle; < ME. moilen, moillen, moylen, moisten, < OF. moiller, moiler, moillier, muiller, F. mouiller = Pr. molhar = Sp. mollear, mojar = Pg. molhar = It. mollare, wet, moisten, < L. as if moliare*, for mollire, soften, < mollis, soft: see *moll*². Connection with L. moliri, toil (see molimen), or with W. mael, toil, or with obs. *E. moil*², a wale, need not be assumed.] 1. trans. 1. To wet; moisten.—2. To soil; dirty; daub.

When the day was therefore come, and that he saw that it rayned still worse then it did before, hee pitied the centinels so too moyled and wette.
Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 354. (Richardson.)

All they which were left were moyled with dirt and mire by reason of the deepness of the rotten way.
Knolles, Hist. Turks.

At first happy news came, in gay letters moyled With my klasses.

Mrs. Browning, Mother and Poet, st. 7.

3. To fatigue by labor; weary.

II. intrans. 1. To soil one's self; wallow in dirt.

A simple soule much like my selfe dyd once a serpent find,
Which (almost dead with cold) lay moyling in the myre.
Gascogne, Constance of a Louer.

2. To drudge; labor; toil.

I never heard a more pertinent Anagram than was made of his Name, William Noy, I moyl [moyl] in Law.
Howell, Letters, I. vi. 17.

They saw him daily moyling and delving in the common path, like a beetle.
Longfellow, Kavanaugh, I.

moll¹ (mōil), n. [*< moill*¹, r.] 1. Defilement.

The moll of death upon them.
Browning.

2. Labor; drudgery.

Made to tread the mills of toil,
Up and down in ceaseless moll.
Whittier, Barefoot Boy.

moll², n. [Early mod. E. also moyle; *< ME. moile, *< OF. moile, mule, a mule: see mule.] A mule.

And at the sayd Noualassa we toke moyses to stay us vp the mountayne.
Sir R. Guyford, Pylgrymage, p. 80.

mollere, n. See *muller*¹.

molly (mōi'li), n. Same as muley. [Prov. Eng.] moineau (mōi'nō), n. [< F. moineau, a bastion (see def.), a ravelin, a piece of ordnance (Cotgrave); appar. a fig. use of moineau, a sparrow, < OF. moinel, moinsel, contr. of moissonel, dim. of moisson, a sparrow, < L. as if muscio* (-n), < musca, a fly: see Musca.] In fort., a small flat bastion raised in front of an intended fortification, to defend it from attacks by means of small-arms.

moire (mwor), n. [< F. moire, watered silk: see mohair.] 1. A clouded or watered appearance on metals or textile fabrics.—2. A kind of watered silk; also, watered mohair. See watered.

My wife and I went to Pater-Noster Rowe, and there we bought some greene-watered Moire, for a morning waste-coat.
Pepys, Diary, Nov. 21, 1660.

Moire antique, silk watered in the antique style so as to resemble the materials worn in olden times.

moiré (mwō-rā'), n. [F.] Same as moire, 1.—Moire antique. See moire antique, under moire.—Moire metallique, tin-plate, or iron-plate which has been first coated with tin, so treated by acids as to give it a clouded, variegated, or variously crystallized surface. The effect is enhanced by heating the plate irregularly with a blowpipe immediately before applying the acids, or by first heating the plate, and then sprinkling it with water to cool it irregularly, and immediately applying the acids. The surface to be treated is first cleaned by washing with alkaline water, then dried, then dipped in dilute nitric or hydrochloric acid, then washed in pure water, and afterward in lime-water, to neutralize any remaining traces of acid, and dried. Lastly, the surface is usually covered with a tinted transparent lacquer. Plates of clean iron dipped in melted zinc, in the so-called galvanizing process, often acquire a beautiful crystalline surface, resembling in general effect the moiré metallique.

moiré (mwō-rā'), v. t.; pret. and pp. moiréd, ppr. moiréing. [< moiré, n.] To give a variety of shades to, by the moiré metallique process of tin-coating.

The solution [salt, or sal ammoniac] may be applied to the surfaces to be moiréd with the aid of a sponge.

Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T., l. 457.

2. Damp; slightly wet; suffused with wetness in a moderate degree: as, moist air; a moist hand.

In places drie and hoote we must assigne
Hem moodes moist, and ther as it is colde.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 81.

The hills to their [the clouds'] supply
Vapour, and exhalation, dusk and moist, Sent up amain.
Milton, P. L., xi. 741.

Moist chamber, a chamber which enables objects under microscopic examination to remain moist, and be studied without intervention of thin glass. Micrographic Dict.—Moist color. See color.—Moist gangrene. See gangrene, 1.—Moist gum. Same as dezzine.—Syn. 2. Damp, Dank, Moist, Humid. Damp is generally applied where the slight wetness has come from without, and also where it is undesirable or unpleasant: as, a damp cellar, damp sheets, a damp evening. Dank strongly suggests a disagreeable, chilling, or unwholesome moistness. Moist may be a general word, but it is rarely used where the wetness is merely external or where it is unpleasant: as, a moist sponge, a moist hand, moist leather. "If we said the ground was moist, we should probably mean in a favorable condition for vegetation; if we said it was damp, we should probably mean that we ought to be careful about walking upon it." (C. J. Smith, Synonyms Discriminated, p. 293.) Humid is a literary or scientific term for moist, but would be applicable only to that which is so penetrated with moisture that the moisture seems a part of it: as, humid ground, but not a humid sponge or hand.

Combing out her long black hair
Damp from the river.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.
My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank.
Coleridge, Ancient Mariner.

Give me your hand; this hand is moist, my lady.
Shak., Othello, iii. 4. 26.

Growth of jasmine turn'd
Their humid arms festooning tree to tree.
Tennyson, Fair Women.

II. n. Wetness; wet; moisture.
So, too much Moist, which (vnoocoot within)
The luer spreads betwixt the flesh and skin,
Puffs up the Patient, stops the pipes and pores
Of Excrementa.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 2.

moist (moist), v. t. [< ME. moisten, moysten; < moist, a.] To make moist; moisten. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Philosophes som tyme wenten upon these Hilles, and helden to here Nose a Spounge moisted with Watre, for

O, that infected moisture of his eye!

Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 323.

Lignum Aloe are like Olive trees, but somewhat greater;
the innermost part of the wood is best, with blacke and browne veines, and yielding an Oyle moisture; it is sold in weight against Silver and Gold.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 507.

2. Liquid. [Rare.]

If some penurious source by chance appeared Scanty of waters when you scoop'd it dry,
And offer'd the full helmet up to Cato,
Did he not dash th' untasted moisture from him?
Addison, Cato, iii. 5.

Atmospheric moisture, the aqueous vapor of the atmosphere and the aqueous particles suspended in the form of fog and cloud, or precipitated as rain, hail, snow, etc. The proportion of aqueous vapor in the air is variable; it may amount to one twentieth part or more of the whole atmosphere. See hygrometer, hygrometry.

moisture (mois'tür), v. t. [< moisture, n.] To moisten; wet.

Who deuldeth the abundance of the waters into rivers, or who maketh a waye for y^e stormy wether, that it wa-tereth and moistureth the drye and barren ground?
Bible of 1561, Job xxxviii. 26.

moistureless (mois'tür-less), a. [< moisture + -less.] Without moisture.

moisty (mois'ti), a. [< ME. moisty; < moist + -y.] 1. New; fresh.

For were it win, or old or moisty ale
That he hath dranke, he speket in his nose.
Chaucer, Pro. to Manciple's Tale, l. 60.

2. Wet; moist.

The miste which the moystie hilles did cast forth took not away clerely the use of the prospect.
J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, fol. 87.

moke (mök), n. [Cf. Icel. mök, dozing, möka, doze.] 1. A donkey.

A girl in our society accepts the best parti which offers itself, just as Miss Chumney, when entreated by two young gentlemen of the order of costermongers, inclines to the one who rides from market on a moke, rather than to the gentleman who sells his greens from a hand-basket.
Thackeray, Newcomes, xxx.

Hence—2. A stupid fellow; a dolt.—3. Theat., a variety performer who plays on several instruments.—4. A negro. [Slang in all senses.] moke, a. A Middle English form of muck. Bailey, 1731.

mokelt, a. and n. A Middle English form of mickle.

mokerer, n. Same as muckerer.

mokihana (mö-ki-han'a), n. [Hawaiian.] A tree of the Sandwich Islands, Melicope (Pelea) anisata, all parts of which, especially the capsules, emit when bruised a strong, spicy, anisate odor. The wood is used in making ornaments.

molar (mö'lär), a. and n. [= F. molaire = Sp. Pg. molar = It. molare, < L. molaris, belonging to a mill; as a noun (sc. lapis) a millstone, also (sc. dens, tooth) a grinder-tooth; < mola, a millstone, in pl. mola, a mill, < molere, grind: see mill. Cf. mole, mole.] 1. a. 1. Grinding, triturating, or crushing, as distinguished from cutting, piercing, or tearing, as a tooth.—2. Of or pertaining to a molar or molars: as, molar glands.—3. In entom., of or pertaining to a mola: as, a molar space or area.—Molar glands. See gland.

II. n. 1. In anat., a grinding tooth or grinder; a back tooth; especially, a molar tooth which is not preceded by a milk-molar or milk-tooth: distinguished from premolar, canine, and incisor. In man there are three true molars on each side of each jaw. The two next to these are called premolars or false molars. The posterior molar is the wisdom-tooth. See dental formula (under dental) and tooth, and cut under mandible.

2. In ichth., a tooth which has a rounded or convex surface, as in sparoid fishes, or a flat surface, as in the Myliobatidae.—3. In entom., one of the thick internal processes with a grinding surface found on the mandibles of many insects, near the base.—False molar, a molar which has been preceded by a milk-molar; a premolar.

molar (mö'lär), a. [< L. moles, a great mass (see mole), + -ar.] Pertaining to a mass or to a body as a whole; acting on or by means of large masses of matter; acting in the aggregate and not in detail; massive: ordinarily used in contrast to molecular.—Molar force. See force.

molar (mö'lär), a. [< mole + -ar. Cf. molar, of same ult. formation.] Relating to or having the characters of a uterine mole: as, molar pregnancy. See mole.

molariform (mö-lar'i-förm), a. [< L. molaris, a molar, + forma, form.] Having the shape of a molar tooth; resembling a molar tooth.

Molariform teeth in a continuous series. Encyc. Brit., XV. 430.

molarimeter (mö-lä-rim'e-tér), n. [< L. molaris, a millstone, + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] A thermometer for determining the temperature of meal as it issues from the mill-spout. Its peculiarity is a sort of jacket or chute which conducts the outflowing meal to and around the bulb.

molar (mö'lä-ri), a. [< L. molaris: see molar.] Fitted for grinding or bruising food: specifically applied to projections on the inner side of the mandibles of certain insects.

Molasse (mö-läs'), n. [F., < molasse, flabby, < mol, soft, < L. mollis, soft.] In geol., a name given in Switzerland to an important geological formation belonging in part to the Miocene and in part to a position intermediate between the Eocene and the Miocene. The formation is in places over 6,000 feet thick, and chiefly of lacustrine origin. The fossil vegetation of the Molasse is of great interest, being subtropical in character, containing palms of an American type, and also the coniferous genus Sequoia, now limited to California. It is the upper member of the Molasse which contains these plant-remains, and this part of the series is made up of red sandstones, marls, and conglomerate (nagelfluh). The lower division of the Molasse is a sandstone containing marine and brackish-water shells.

molasses (mö-läs'ez), n. [Formerly also, and prop., melasses; = F. melasse = It. melazzo (also, after F., melassa), < Sp. melaza = Pg. melaço, molasses, < L. mellaceus, honey-like, < mel (mell-), honey: see mell.] The uncrystallized syrup produced in the manufacture of sugar. It properly differs from treacle in that it comes from sugar in the process of making, while treacle is obtained in the process of refining: but the two words are often used synonymously.—Maple molasses. See maple.

molaynet, n. See molan.

mold, mould (möld), n. [< ME. mold, molde, moolde, < AS. molde, dust, soil, ground, earth, the earth, = OFries. molde = OHG. molta, molt, MHG. molte, multe, G. dial. molt, dust, earth, = Icel. mold = Sw. mull = Dan. muld, mold, = Goth. mulda, dust; with formative -d (orig. -d²), from the verb represented by Goth. malan = AS. malan, etc., grind: see meal. Cf. mull, dust, malm, soft stone, sand, etc., from the same source. The proper spelling is mold, like gold (which is exactly parallel phonetically); but mould has long been in use, and is still commonly preferred in Great Britain.] 1. Fine

Sunfish (Mola rotunda).

soft earth, or earth easily pulverized, such as constitutes soil; crumbling or friable soil.

In that thi acions or thi planntes may Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. 8.), p. 67.

The black earth, everywhere obvious on the surface of the ground, we call mould.
Woodward.

2. The earth; the ground. [Obsolete or provincial; in Scotch usually in the plural, moulds, mools.]

Ther Horn were under molds,
Other elles wher he wolde.
King Horn (E. E. T. 8.), l. 817.

There is moo myshape peple amonge thise beggeres
Thane of alle maner men that on this molds walketh.
Pierre Plowman (B), vii. 98.

Affrighted then they did behold
His body turning into mould,
And though he had a month been dead,
This handkerchief was about his head.
The Suffolk Miracle (Child's Ballads, I. 222).

Their bones are mingled with the mould,
Their dust is on the wind.
Bryant, The Greek Boy.

3. The matter of which anything is formed; material.

No mates for you,
Unless you were of gentler, milder mould.
Shak., T. of the S., l. 1. 60.

Nature formed me of her softest mould,
And sunk me even below my own weak sex.
Addison, Cato, l. 6.

In or under the molds, in the earth; buried. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Late, late I the night the bairnies grat,
Their mither, she under the mools heard that.
Old ballad.

The truth . . . first came out by the minister's wife, after Sir John and her ain gudeman were bath in the mouls.
Scott, Redgauntlet, letter xi.

mold¹, mould¹ (môld), v. t. [< mold¹, n.] To cover with mold.

Guinea grass requires to be molded, when the stalks and roots throw out new stalks and grass shoots.

mold², mould² (môld), v. [First in early mod. E. mould, mowide; a later form, with excremental d, of ME. moulen, mowlen, mollen, earlier mulen, mulen, grow musty, mold, < leel. mygla (= Sw. mögla), grow muggy or musty, mold (cf. mygla = Sw. mögel, mold, moldiness), < mugga, soft drizzling mist, mugginess: see mug¹, muggy. The form mould instead of moul arose partly out of confusion with the pp. mouled, also spelled mowled, mowide, and used as an adj. (whence the later adj. mouldy, moldy), and partly out of confusion of the noun mould² (for moul*) with mould¹, mold¹, friable earth, dust, etc. (with which the word has generally been identified), and also with mould³, mold³, for mole¹, a spot, and, as to form, with mould⁴, mold⁴, a model (the d in mould³, mold³, and mould⁴, mold⁴ being also excremental).] I. intrans. To grow musty; become moldy; contract mold.

Other leten thinges moulen other [or] rusten.
Ancren Riwde, p. 344.

Let us not moulen [var. moulen] thus in idleness.
Chaucer, Prol. to Man of Law's Tale, l. 82.

There be some houses where . . . baked meats will mould more than in others.
Bacon.

II. trans. To cause to contract mold: as, damp molds cheese.

mold², mould², p. a. [< ME. mould, mouled, mowled, mowide, mowled, mowled, pp. of moulen, grow musty: see mold², v. This form, prop. mouled, is put here as involved in mold², v. and n.] Grown musty; molded; moldy.

This white top writeth min olde yeres; mold², mould² (môld), n. [See mold², v. and p. a.] A minute fungus or other vegetable growth of a low type, especially one of such vegetable organisms as appear on articles of food when left neglected, decaying matter, bodies which lie long in warm and damp air, animal and vegetable tissues, etc.; in a somewhat looser sense, mustiness or incipient decay. Most of the common molds belong to the ge-

Mold (Penicillium glaucum), magnified. m, the mycelium; c, the conidia.

nus Mucor. M. Mucedo forms small downy tufts of grayish-white color on bread, decaying fruit, etc. M. Syzygites occurs on decaying mushrooms. Phycomyces nitens, a related form, grows on oily or greasy substances. The common blue mold on decaying bread, cheese, etc., is Penicillium glaucum. See Mucor, Mucorin, Penicillium.

All molds are inceptions of putrefaction, as the molds of pies and flesh, which molds afterwards turn into worms.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 339.

Black mold, a general name for certain hyphomycetous fungi having dark-colored or carbonized mycelium, belonging chiefly to the family Dermateaceae.

mold³, mould³ (môld), n. [A later form, with excremental d, of mole¹. Prob. due in part to confusion with mold¹, mold². The form is extant chiefly in iron-mold.] A spot; a stain, as that caused by rust.

Upon the little breast, like christall bright,
She mote perceive a little purple mold,
That like a rose her alken leaves did faire unfold.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. xii. 7.

mold³, mould³ (môld), v. t. [< mold³, n.] To stain, as with rust.

mold⁴, mould⁴ (môld), n. [< ME. mold, moold, molde, with unorig. medial d, for mole*, < OF. melle, moule, mole, moile, modle, F. moule = Sp. Pg. moule, a mold, measure, < L. modulus, a measure, model: see modulus, model.] 1. A form or model pattern of a particular shape, used in determining the shape of something in a molten, plastic, or otherwise yielding state.

The mould of a man's fortune is in his own hands.
Bacon, Essays, Fortune.

New honours come upon him,
Like our strange garments, cleave not to their mould
But with the aid of use. Shak., Macbeth, l. 8. 146.

Made in his image! Sweet and gracious souls,
Dear to my heart by nature's fondest names,
Is not your memory still the precious mould
That lends its form to Him who hears my prayer?
O. W. Holmes, Love.

2. Form; shape; cast; character.

My sonne, if thou of such a mold
Art made, now tell me please thy shifft.
Gower, Conf. Amant., iv.

French churches, both under others abroad and at home in their own country, all cast according to that mould which Calvin had made. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pref., ii.

The expectancy and rose of the fair state,
The glass of fashion, and the mould of form.
Shak., Hamlet, III. 1. 161.

Men of mould
Well embodied, well enmoulded.
Emerson, Monadnec.

3. Specifically, in foundling, the form into which a fused metal is run to obtain a cast. Molds for metals and alloys having a low melting-point, as lead, type-metal, Britannia metal, etc., are made of iron or plaster of Paris, and may be used many times. Molds for the less fusible metals and alloys, as iron, brass, bell-metal, etc., are made in sand or loam and are divided into three classes: (a) Open molds, in which the pattern is impressed in the sand and withdrawn, and the molten metal is then poured in and finds its level. (b) Close molds, or molds in two parts called the drag and the cope (or cope), forming together a two-part flask, one part being placed over the other, and each being impressed with one half of the matrix or pattern. See flask, 2. (c) Loam-molds, or molds built up with a core of brickwork or other material, and covered with foundry loam. As in the case of open molds, with close molds a pattern, usually of wood, is used, being impressed one half at a time in the two parts of the flask or molding-box, which, when put together so as to correspond, form the mold. Loam-molds are used especially in making large hollow castings, and do not require a pattern. These molds are of every shape and size, from molds for kettles and water-pipes to those for engine-cylinders and great cannon. Fine molds for making castings of insects, flowers, and other delicate objects are formed by suspending the object in a box by means of wires and covering it with plaster of Paris. When set the mold is heated until the object is burned, and the ash is then blown out, leaving the original shape in the mold. Another method is to fashion the figure in wax, bed it in plaster or clay, and then melt out the wax (cire perdue). In making plaster casts of parts of the human body, or of sculptors' models, the original mold requires to be cut to remove it from the object, and the parts are afterward fitted together. Gelatin, papier maché, and sulphur are also used for making certain kinds of molds. The type-mold of type-founders is of steel in two pieces, making right and left halves, on the top of which, when conjoined, the matrix is attached.

Every body of type has its special mold, which can be used for that body only, but the mold is made adjustable for the varying widths of type.

Details of Type-mold.
a, the two halves of the mold united but without the matrix, showing the face of the type H as formed in the mold; b, one half of the mold; c, the other half of the mold, showing the body of the letter H in position; d, the matrix relatively enlarged, showing the face of the letter H.

4. In terra-cotta work, the plaster forms used in making terra-cotta architectural ornaments. They are usually in a number of parts, and when the clay is set sufficiently the mold is carefully taken apart. Similar molds are used also for glass, pottery, and waxwork.

5. In stucco-work, a templet or former for shaping cornices, centerpieces, etc.—6. In paper-manufacture, a frame with a bottom of wire netting which is filled with paper-pulp that in draining away leaves a film of pulp which is formed into a sheet of paper.—7. In ship-building, the pattern used in working out the frames of a vessel.—8. A former or matrix used in various household operations, as an incised stamp of wood for shaping and ornamenting pats of butter, or a form of metal, earthenware, etc., for giving shape to jellies, blanc-mange, ices, etc.—9. In cookery, a dish shaped in a mold: as, a mold of jelly.

We had preserved plums to the mould of rice. Dickens.

10. In anat., same as fontanelle, 2.—11. Among gold-beaters, a number of pieces of vellum or a like substance, laid over one another, between which the leaves of gold are laid for the final beating.—Elastic mold. See elastic.—Gold-beaters' mold. See gold-beater.

mold⁴, mould⁴ (môld), v. t. [< OF. moller, moler, F. mouler = Sp. Pg. moldar, < L. modulari, measure; from the noun: see mold⁴, n.] 1. To form into a particular shape; shape; model; fashion; cast in or as in a mold; specifically, to form articles of clay upon a whirling table or potter's wheel, or in molds which open and close like those employed in metal-casting.

Though he have been or seemed somewhat harsh heretofore, yet now you shall find he is new moulded.
Sherley, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 229.

If these two things be supposed, that a man set before him honest and good ends, and again, that he be resolute, constant, and true unto them, it will follow that he shall mould himself into all virtue at once.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 300.

Did I request thee, Maker, from my clay
To mould me man? Milton, P. L., x. 744.

2. In ship-building, to give the required depth and outline to, as ships' timbers.—Diamond-molded glass. See glass.—Molded breadth, the greatest breadth of a ship, measured to the outside of the frame-timbers.—Molded charcoal. See charcoal.—Molded glass, glass which is blown in a mold. The mold fits around the melted glass held on the end of the pontil, and is adapted for easy and rapid adjustment.—Molded wood, wood embossed in designs by having the pattern stamped deeply on the end grain of the wood, this end being then planed down to the bottom of the impression, and soaked in water, when the compressed parts swell up into high relief. Medallions and other decorative objects were produced in this way in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

mold⁵, n. An obsolete form of mole². Levin.
moldability, mouldability (môl-da-bil'i-ti), n. [< moldable: see bility.] Capability of being molded.

moldable, mouldable (môl'da-bl), a. [< mold⁴ + -able.] Capable of being molded or formed.

The differences of impressible and not impressible; figurable and not figurable; moldable and not moldable.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 840.

moldalet, n. [ME., also molde-ale, a funeral feast, < molde, earth (with ref. to burial), + ale, a drinking, a feast: see mold¹ and ale. Cf. moldmeat. Hence mulled ale: see mulled.] A funeral feast. Prompt. Parv., p. 341.

Moldavian (môl-dá-vi-an), a. and n. [< Moldavia (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or relating to Moldavia, a former principality of eastern Europe, now forming part of the kingdom of Rumania.—Moldavian balm, a blue-flowered labiate herb, Dracocephalum Moldavica, cultivated in flower-gardens, and of some culinary use.—Moldavian cloak, a long outer garment worn by women about 1850, having a cape in front covering the arms and serving on each side as a kind of sleeve.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Moldavia.
mold-board (môld'bôrd), n. 1. The curved board or metal-plate in a plow, which turns over the furrow.—2. In foundling, the board on which the pattern for a mold is laid; a follow-board.
mold-box (môld'boks), n. A box used in casting steel under pressure for the manufacture of guns, etc. As devised by Sir Joseph Whitworth, this is a cylindrical box in which melted crucible steel or Siemens-Martin process steel is subjected to a hydrostatic pressure of 6,000 pounds per square inch. Two closely fitting hoops of steel of ample strength are fitted on the interior with cast-iron lugs having vertical channels on the faces fitted to the hoops, and numerous channels leading from the vertical channels to the interior of the mold-box. The interior surfaces of the lugs are lined with refractory sand. A central core of cast-iron faced with refractory sand, and provided with horizontal and vertical channels like the lugs, is erected in the box, leaving an annular space into which the metal is run. By means of a hydraulic press an annular piston or plunger is driven down upon the upper surface of the molten metal. The gases which would otherwise be retained in the metal are thus forced out, escaping through the channels in the lags and the core.

mold-candle (mōld'kan'dl), n. A candle formed in a mold, as distinguished from a dipped candle or dip. See dip, n., 2.

mold-cistern (mōld'sis'tēr), n. In sugar-making: (a) The vat which receives the drippings from the sugar-loaves. (b) A tank in which the molds are washed after use. E. H. Knight.

molder¹, moulder¹ (mōl'dēr), v. [A freq. form of mold¹, mould¹.] I. intrans. 1. To turn to mold or dust by natural decay; waste away by a gradual separation of the component particles, especially without the presence of water; crumble.

The ninth [means to induce and accelerate putrefaction] is by the interchange of heat and cold, or wet and dry; as we see in the mouldering of earth in frosts and sunne. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 387.

To Dust must all that Heav'n of Beauty come!
And must Pastora moulder in the Tomb!

Congreve, Death of Queen Mary.

The brass and marble remain, yet the inscriptions are effaced by time, and the imagery moulders away.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. x. 5.

2. To be diminished; waste away gradually.

If he had sat still the enemy's army would have mouldered to nothing. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

II. trans. To turn to dust; crumble; waste.

These rocks [falling from mountain-tops] . . . when their foundations have been mouldered with age.

Addison, Remarks on Italy.

molder¹, moulder¹ (mōl'dēr), n. [< molder¹, r.] Mold; clay.

Not that we are privy to the eternal counsel of God, but for that by sense of our airy bodies we have a more refined faculty of foreseeing than men possibly can have that are chained to such heavy earthly moulders.

Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 85. (Hallivell.)

molder², moulder² (mōl'dēr), n. [*< ME. moldere, moldare, mouldare, a former (kneader); < mold⁴ + -er¹.] One who molds or forms into shape; specifically, one who is employed in making castings in a foundry.

Unthinking, overbearing people, who . . . set up for reformers, and new moulders of the constitution.

Bp. Berkeley, Discourse to Magistrates.

More distinct style than even blank-verse, and quite as plainly takes the stamp of its molder.

The Century, XXIX. 508.

Molders' clamp, flask, etc. See clamp, etc.

moldery (mōl'dēr-i), a. [< molder¹ + -y¹.] Of the nature of or like mold. Loudon.

mold-facing (mōld'fā'sing), n. In iron- and brass-founding: (a) A thin coating of finely pulverized material dusted upon the inside faces of molds, to insure smooth outside surfaces on the castings. For iron, powdered charcoal and mill-dust, and sometimes plumbago, are used. For brass, pease-meal, powdered soapstone, rottenstone, graphite, and chalk are variously employed. (b) A wash of plumbago and water laid on the faces of a mold by gentle manipulation with a soft brush, and allowed to dry before the cast is made.

moldiness, mouldiness (mōl'di-nes), n. [< moldy¹ + -ness. Cf. moldness.] The state of being moldy; moldy growth; minute fungi. See mold².

His few Greek books a rotten chest contain'd,
Whose covers much of mouldiness complain'd.

Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, iii.

molding¹, moulding¹ (mōl'ding), n. [Verbal n. of mold¹, mould¹, v.] The act of covering with mold; mold used to cover the roots of plants.

When the sprouts [of sugar-cane] are six or eight inches high, it will be necessary to put a gang in to give them a plentiful molding, in order to cover their roots and feed their stems.

T. Roughley, Jamaica Planter's Guide (1823), p. 335.

molding², moulding² (mōl'ding), n. [Verbal n. of mold², mould², v.] 1. The process of shaping any plastic substance into a given form, as wax into artistic figures, or clay into bricks.

For there was never man without our molding,
Without our stamp upon him, and our justice,
Left any thing three ages after him
Good, and his own. Fletcher, Tamer Tamed, III. 3.

2. Anything cast in a mold, or anything formed as if by a mold.—3. In arch., a member of construction or decoration so treated as to introduce varieties of outline or contour in edges or surfaces, whether on projections or in cavities, such as on cornices, string-courses, bases, door- or window-jambes, lintels, etc. In classical architecture moldings are divided into three classes: the right-lined, as the fillet, torus, listel, regula; the curved, as the astragal or bead, the torus, the cavetto, the quarter-round, ovolo, and echinus; and the composite, as the ogee, talon, or cyma reversa, the cyma recta or doucine, and the scotia or trochilus, all of which are known by many synonymous names. In Roman architecture all curved moldings are formed of portions of circles, while in Greek architecture they are for the most part formed of some conic section, of which the curve, in good work, is always of extreme refinement. All these moldings are frequently enriched by carving. In the architecture of the middle ages there is very great diversity in the form and arrangement of the moldings. In the Norman style they consist almost entirely of rounds and hollows, variously combined with splays and fillets, a striking peculiarity of this style being the recurrence of moldings broken into zigzag lines. In the succeeding English style, the early Pointed, the moldings are much lighter and more boldly cut. In the Decorated style of the fourteenth century there is still greater diversity, and this period is further characterized by the introduction of the roll-molding, and another termed the wave-molding. In the Perpendicular style large and often shallow hollows prevail, and the moldings are in general of flatter profile and less effective than those of earlier periods. The moldings of medieval architecture are very commonly sculptured with surface-ornament beautiful in design and elaborate in workmanship. See cuts under dog-tooth, double-cone, egg, indented, keel-molding, lozenge, fret, 3.—Belt-molding, a molding passing entirely around the interior of a passenger-car, directly above the windows. Car-builder's Dict.—Dovetail-molding. See dovetail.—Embossed molding. See embossed.—Nail-headed molding. See nail-headed.—Nebuly molding, in arch., a molding in Romanesque architecture the edge of which forms an undulating or waved line: introduced in corbel-tables and archivolts.—Raking molding, a molding inclined from the horizontal or vertical, as that which often follows the line of a staircase, the rail of an ascending balustrade, etc.

Sections of Medieval Moldings.

molding-bed (mōl'ding-bed), n. A machine for working rectilinear moldings in marble. A traveling frame carries revolving grinders, and is adjustable vertically by a screw to the height required by the thickness of the marble. The grinders are solid cylinders of cast-iron, and are counterparts of the required moldings.

molding-board (mōl'ding-bōrd), n. Same as mold-board.

molding-box (mōl'ding-boks), n. In foundry-work, a molding-flask.

molding-crane (mōl'ding-krān), n. A crane adapted for use in a foundry in handling molds and flasks; a foundry-crane.

molding-cutter (mōl'ding-kut'er), n. A tool working on the principle of the plane-iron or cutter of a hand-plane, the edge of which is formed by a bevel on one side of the tool. The edges of molding-cutters are formed to correspond with the outline of the cross-sections of the moldings to be cut, each cutter being adapted to only one pattern of molding. Thus, to cut a molding of semicircular cross-section, the edge of the cutter must be a semicircle of the exact size of the molding. Such moldings were formerly cut by hand-planing, but this is now almost entirely superseded by power-planing machines with rotary cutters.

molding-file (mōl'ding-fil), n. A file with a concave face used for finishing molded surfaces.

molding-flask (mōl'ding-flāsk), n. 1. Same as flask, 2.—2. In dentistry, a jointed receptacle in three parts, in which the vulcanite model and plaster mold are secured in making dentures ready for the muffle. E. H. Knight.

molding-frame (mōl'ding-frām), n. In foundrying, the templet by which an object is shaped in loam-molding. E. H. Knight.

molding-hole (mōl'ding-hōl), n. In foundrying, an excavation in the foundry-floor in which castings of large size are made.

molding-loam (mōl'ding-lōm), n. A mixture of clay and sand employed by foundrymen in constructing molds for loam-molding.

molding-machine (mōl'ding-mā-shēn'), n. 1. In wood-working, one of a class of high-speed power-machines for planing, recessing, shaping, molding, profiling, and paneling wood. Such machines occupy in wood-working much the same position as the milling-machine in metal-work, as both operate by means of revolving cutters. In molding-machines all the work is performed by revolving cutter-heads having variously shaped knives. These cutters are used singly, as in some panel-machines, and project through the table on which the work is laid, or they are arranged in gangs and series so that the wood in passing through the machine is exposed successively to all the cutters. By this gang-system of cutters it is possible to cut moldings and edgings of the most complicated pattern. One form of the machine has the cutters between the cutter-arbor bearings, and is known as a matching-machine or wood-planing machine, or an inside-molding machine. In another form the cutters project up through the table and are arranged to work upon the inside edges of moldings. This type is known as the edge-molding machine. Sometimes called carving-machine, variety-planer, or relief-paneling machine.

2. A machine for making molding from an artificial composition. The material is forced from a hopper by a compressor, is carried by an apron beneath a die-wheel, and after being shaped by this it is delivered on a table.

3. In sheet-metal working, a rolling-machine with shaped rollers of which one is the counterpart of the other, for molding sheet-metal into shape for cornices, balusters, etc.—4. In foundrying: (a) A machine for making loam-molds in flasks from small patterns carried by the machine. (b) A gear-molding machine.—Gear-molding machine, an apparatus for molding large gear-wheels from a pattern of a small section of the gear, as of two teeth and the interdental space.—Stone-molding machine, a machine for working stone moldings. It resembles one form of stone-saw, but differs from it in having the frame which carries the revolving grinder adjustable, by means of a screw beneath, to the thickness of the slab. The grinder is kept constantly supplied with moist sand.—Surface-molding machine, a form of molding-machine with double-edged cutters and a rapid reverse motion. It is used to cut scrolls and plain or molded designs on the surface of solid wood, to rout such as ends of pews and stairs, to form grooves for in-laid work, to make tracings for carving, etc.

molding-mill (mōl'ding-mil), n. A sawmill or shaping-mill for timber.

molding-plane (mōl'ding-plān), n. In joinery, a plane used in forming moldings; a match-plane. Such planes have various patterns or convex and concave soles for making the different parts of moldings, as hollows and rounds.

molding-plow (mōl'ding-plou), n. A plow with two mold-boards to throw the soil to both sides at once; a ridging-plow. It is used in forming ridges, in hilling potatoes, etc.

molding-sand (mōl'ding-sānd), n. A mixture of sand and loam of which molds for use in a foundry are made.

molding-saw (mōl'ding-sā), n. A circular saw or combination of circular saws for cutting out blocks approximating to the shapes of ornamental moldings. The molding is finished by cutters formed to the exact curve.

molding-table (mōl'ding-tā'bl), n. A table on which a potter molds his ware. It has a trug or trough in which the workman moistens his hands, and a block-and-stock board on which he places the tile-mold. There are also four pegs driven into the table at the corners of the block-and-stock board, to sustain the mold and regulate the thickness of the tile.

mold-loft (mōld'lōft), n. A large room in a ship-building yard in which the several parts of a ship are drawn out in their proper dimensions from the construction drawings. Also called modeling-loft.

[The] various problems [of laying-off] are solved upon the floor of a building known as the Mould Loft, where the drawings furnished by the designer are transferred in chalk lines in full size, and then by the aid of geometry, and in the manner discussed in the following pages, the draughtsman determines and draws in the shapes of the various components of the frame. Moulds are made to the lines, and with these moulds and other data furnished by the draughtsman the workmen are enabled to trim the timbers, or bend the angle-irons, and place such marks upon them as shall leave nothing but the putting together and fastening them in their places in order to construct the frame of the ship.

mole² (môl), n. [Early mod. E. also mool, moule, mowle, môl, < ME. mol, molde, molle (= D. mol = MLG. mol, mul), appar. an abbr. of orig. molewarp, prop. moldwarp. Such abbreviation so early as in the ME. period is not satisfactorily explained.] 1. An insectivorous mammal of the family Talpidae (which see for technical characters). There are at least 7 genera of moles, of which Talpa, Mogera, Parascaptor, and Scaptochirus are confined to the Old World, and Condylura, Scalops, and Scapanus to America. The several species are much alike in general appearance and habits, all living under ground, where they burrow with wonderful facility, and construct galleries often of great extent and complexity. They are stout thick-set animals, usually 6 or 8 inches long, with very small or rudimentary eyes and ears, sharp snout, no visible neck, strong and highly fossorial fore feet, and short tail. They feed chiefly upon earthworms. The best-known is the common mole of Europe, Talpa europæa. The Japanese mole is Mogera wogera. All the American moles differ decidedly from those of Europe and Asia; they are called shrew-moles, and the commonest is Scalops aquaticus, of wide distribution in the United States. The American moles of the genus Scapanus are nearest those of the Old World. There are two of these, the hairy-tailed or Brewer's (S. americanus or brevet) and S. townsendi; the latter is confined to western portions of the continent. The star-nosed mole of North America is Condylura cristata. See cuts under Talpa, Scalops, and Condylura.

mole³ (môl), n. [< F. môle (> Russ. mola) = Sp. mole, muelle = Pg. molhe = It. mole, molo (> G. molo), < L. *mole*s, a great mass, a massive structure, esp. of stone, a pier, dam, mole, pile, hence a burden, difficulty, effort, labor. Hence ult. amolish, demolish, emolument, moleculum, molest, etc.] 1. A mound or massive work, formed largely of stone, inclosing a harbor or anchorage, to protect it from the violence of the waves.

The foundations of Nero's port are still to be seen. It was altogether artificial, and composed of huge moles running round it, in a kind of circular figure, except where the ships were to enter.

Pope, Moral Essays, iv. 200.

2. A form of ancient Roman mausoleum, consisting of a round tower on a square base, insulated, encompassed with columns, and covered with a dome. [Rare.]

mole⁴ (môl), n. [< F. môle = Sp. Pg. It. mola, < L. mola (= Gr. μίλη), a false uterine formation, a particular use of mola, a millstone: see *mill*¹.] A somewhat shapeless, compact fleshy mass occurring in the uterus, either due to the retention and continued life of the whole or a part of the fetal envelopes after the death of the fetus (a maternal or true mole), or being some other body liable to be mistaken for this, as the membrane in membranous dysmenorrhea, or perhaps a polypus (a false mole).—Cystic, hydatid, or vesicular mole, a true mole composed largely of myxomatous growths originating in the chorionic villi.

mole⁵ (môl), n. [< L. mola (= Gr. μίλη), spelt coarsely ground and mixed with salt (mola salsa); cf. mola, a millstone: see *mill*¹.] Coarse meal mixed with salt, in ancient times used in sacrifices.

She with the mole all in her handes devout Stode neare the altar.

Surrey, Anecd. iv.

Crumble the sacred mole of salt and corn,
Next in the fire the bags with brimstone burn.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Pastorals, viii.

mole⁶, c. i. [A ME. var. of *mole*³.] To speak.

This valyant bierne

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 3067.

mole-bat (môl'bat), n. See mole-bat.

mole-bouti, n. Same as mole-but.

Bota, a fish that grunteth, called a Mole-bout.

Florio (1598).

mole-but (môl'but), n. The short sunfish, a typical species of Molidae, technically called Mola mola, M. rotunda, or Orthogoriscus mola. Also mole-bat. See cut at Mola.

mole-cast (môl'kâst), n. A mole-hill.

mole-catcher (môl'kach'er), n. One whose business is to catch moles.

mole-cricket (môl'krik'et), n. A fossorial orthopterous insect of the genus Grylotalpa: so called from its habit of burrowing in the ground like a mole by means of its large and peculiarly shaped fore legs. There are upward of 20 species, found in various parts of the world; that common in Europe is G. vulgaris, about 1½ inches long, and of a brown color. It constructs extensive subterranean galleries, cutting through the roots of the plants encountered, and thus a, adult, somewhat enlarged; b, anterior tarsus or fore foot, greatly enlarged.

Mole-cricket (Grylotalpa borealis).

doing much damage in gardens. Also called fen-cricket, fan-cricket, and sometimes earth-crab.

molecular (mô-lek'ü-lär), a. [= F. moléculaire = Sp. Pg. molecular, < NL. molecularis*, < molecula, a molecule: see molecule.] 1. Relating to molecules; consisting of molecules: as, molecular structure.

The general principle of molecular science . . . finds numerous examples both in inorganic chemistry and in biology.

G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 549.

2. Acting in or by means of the molecules or ultimate physical elements of a substance. Compare *molar*².

Our thoughts are the expression of molecular changes in that matter of life which is the source of our other vital phenomena.

Huxley, Physical Basis of Life.

The molecular movements within animals of the simplest class are the digestion of food and the elaboration of the materials of reproduction.

E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 231.

Atomic or molecular heats of bodies. See atomic.—Molecular attraction, that species of attraction which operates upon the molecules or particles of a body, as distinguished from the attraction of gravitation. Cohesion and chemical affinity are instances of molecular attraction.—Molecular force. See *force*¹.—Molecular weights. See weight.

molecularity (mô-lek'ü-lär'ü-ti), n. [< molecul + -ity.] The condition or character of being molecular.

molecularium (mô-lek'ü-lä'ri-um), n. [NL.: see molecular.] An apparatus invented by Berliner for illustrating a number of electrical phenomena on the theory of molecular vibration.

molecularly (mô-lek'ü-lär-li), adv. As regards molecules.

The expansion and contraction of the protoplasm give motion to the prearranged and molecularly unyielding levers of the animal engine.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 567.

molecule (mol'e-kül), n. [< F. molécule = Sp. molecula = Pg. molecula = It. molecula, molecola, < NL. molecula, a molecule, dim. of L. *mole*s, a mass: see *mole*³.] 1. The smallest mass of any substance which is capable of existing in a separate form—that is, the smallest part into which the substance can be divided without destroying its chemical character (identity). All the physical changes of a body, as the dissolving of sugar in water, the melting of lead, the change of water into steam, the magnetization of steel, and so on, are phenomena which take place without the loss of identity of the substance itself, and which concern the relations of the molecules among themselves. Hence the molecule is taken as the physical unit. A homogeneous body is regarded as made up of similar molecules, whose relations determine its physical qualities, and particularly its physical state as a gas, liquid, or solid. A gas, according to the kinetic theory of gases, is composed of molecules darting about in paths which are very nearly rectilinear through the greater part of their lengths. Liquids are supposed to be composed of molecules which wander about, but have not nearly rectilinear paths; while solids are believed to be composed of molecules bound together by cohesion and moving in quasi-orbital paths. A molecule of any substance is conceived as made up of one or more atoms, whose relations to each other are considered in chemistry. (See atom.) The exact nature of the molecules is still largely a matter of hypothesis, but as regards their size Sir William Thomson has reached a quasi-definite conclusion as follows: "If a drop of water were magnified to the size of the earth, the molecules or granules would each occupy spaces greater than those filled by small shot and smaller than those occupied by cricket-balls."

A molecule may consist of several distinct portions of matter held together by chemical bonds. . . . So long as the different portions do not part company, but travel together in the excursions made by the molecule, our theory calls the whole connected mass a single molecule.

Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 226.

The molecule of any substance is, by some chemists, defined as being the smallest portion of that substance to which can be attributed all the chemical properties of the substance; by others, as the smallest portion which, so long as the substance is chemically unchanged, keeps together without complete separation of its parts.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 611.

We have, I believe, what we may almost call a new chemistry, some day to be revealed to us by means of photographic records of the behaviour of molecules.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 108.

Hence—2. A very small particle or bit of something; a particle; an atom. [Colloq.]—3. In ornith., the tread or cicatrícula of a fecundated ovum. [Rare.]—Constituent molecule, a molecule which is united with others unlike itself, as some of the ingredients of a heterogeneous body.—Integral molecule. See integral.—Organic molecules, bodies capable of neither generation nor corruption, which were supposed by Buffon to account for the properties of living matter.—Syn. 1. Atom, etc. See particle.

mole-eyed (mōl'id), a. 1. Having very small eyes, like a mole's; having imperfect sight; purblind.

But this mole-eyed, dragon-tailed abomination [a crocodile] . . . was utterly loathsome.

G. W. Curtis, Nile Notes of a Howadji, p. 75.

Hence—2. Figuratively, short-sighted; taking a narrow view of things: as, mole-eyed parsimony.

mole-heapt, n. Same as mole-hill. Minsheu.

mole-hill (mōl'hil), n. A little hill, hillock, mound, or ridge of earth thrown up by moles in burrowing underground. When moles are working near the surface in search of food, the hills become tortuous ridges which may be traced sometimes for many yards with little or no interruption.

A devil of pride
Ranges in airy thoughts to catch a star,
Whiles ye grasp mole-hills. Ford, Fancies, l. 3.

The glass through which an envious eye doth gaze
Can easily make a mole-hill mountain seem.

P. Fletcher, Upon his Brother's Book, Christ's Victory.

To make a mountain of (or out of) a mole-hill, to magnify an insignificant matter.

mole-hole (mōl'hōl), n. The burrow of a mole.

molendinaceous (mō-len-di-nā'shius), a. [LL. molendinum, a mill-house (< L. molendus, gerundive of molere, grind: see mill), + -aceous.] Like a windmill; resembling the sails of a windmill: applied to fruits or seeds which have many wings. [Rare.]

molendinarius (mō-len-di-nā'ri-us), a. [LL. molendinarius: see molendinarius.] Same as molendinaceous.

molendinary (mō-len-di-nā-ri), a. [LL. molendinarius, < molendinum, a mill-house: see molendinaceous.] Relating to a mill; acting as a miller. [In the quotation the word is intentionally pedantic.]

Dismount, then, O lovely Molinara, unless thou wouldst rather that I should transport thee on horseback to the house of thy molendinary father. Scott, Monastery, xxix.

mole-plant (mōl'plant), n. Same as mole-tree.
mole-plow (mōl'plou), n. A plow having a pointed iron shoe secured to the end of a standard, used in making a deep drain for water.

mole-rat (mōl'rat), n. 1. A myomorphic rodent quadruped of the family Spalacidae (which see for technical characters): so called from its resemblance to a mole in appearance and habits. The mole-rats are stout-bodied rodents, with short, strong limbs (of which the fore ones are fossorial), short or rudimentary tail, and minute or rudimentary eyes and ears. They live under ground and burrow very extensively. All belong to the Old World. The best-known species is Spalax typhlus of Europe and Asia. Others are Indian and African, of the genera Heterocephalus and Rhizomys. The bathyergues are mole-rats of the subfamily Bathyergina, inhabiting Africa, as the strand mole-rat, Bathyergus maritimus, and species of the genera Heliophobus and Georychus.

Mole-rat (Spalax typhlus).

2. A fossorial murine rodent of the family Muridae and subfamily Siphneinae. It resembles the preceding superficially and in habits to some extent. These mole-rats are confined to the palearctic region, where they are represented by the genera Sipheus and Ellobius. The soker, S. apalax, is the best-known.

3. The Australian duck-mole or duck-billed platypus, Ornithorhynchus paradoxus.
mole-shrew (mōl'shrō), n. 1. An American short-tailed shrew, of the family Soricidae and genus Blarina, somewhat resembling a small mole. B. brevicauda is the largest and best-known species, common in the United States and Canada. See cut under Blarina.

2. Any American mole; a shrew-mole. All the American Talpidae (genera Scalops, Scapanus, and Condylura) differ from the Old World moles, and somewhat approach shrews in character. The name is also applied to Neurotrichus gibbei, which is of a different family (Soricidae).

mole-skin (mōl'skin), n. and a. 1. The skin of a mole.—2. A kind of fustian, double-twilled and extra strong, and cropped before dyeing. Compare beaver-teen, 2.

II. a. Made of or resembling mole-skin: as, a mole-skin vest; a mole-skin purse.

mole-spade (mōl'spād), n. A spade or spud used in prodding for moles, or in setting traps for them.

Poore Menaphon neither asked his swaines for his sheep, nor took his mole-spade on his neck to see his pastures. Greene, Menaphon, p. 33.

molest (mō-lest'), v. t. [ME. molesten, < OF. molester, F. molester = Sp. Pg. molestar = It. molestare, < L. molestare, trouble, annoy, molest, < molestus, troublesome, < mōles, a burden, difficulty, labor, trouble: see mole.] 1. To trouble; disturb; harass; vex; meddle with injuriously.

But how this cas doth Troilus molest,

That may none earthly mannes tonge seya.

Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 880.

My Father was afterwards most unjustly and spitefully molested by y^e jeering judge Richardson, for repressing the execution of a woman. Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 3, 1633.

The moping Owl does to the Moon complain

Of such as, wand'ring near her secret bower,

Molest her ancient, solitary reign. Gray, Elegy.

=Syn. Annoy, Plague, etc. (see tease), incommode, discommode, inconvenience.

molest (mō-lest'), n. [molest, v. Cf. molestie.] Trouble.

Thus clogg'd with love, with passions, and with grief,
I saw the country life had least molest.

Greene, Song of a Country Swain, in The Mourning

[Garment.

molestation (mō-les- or mō-les-tā'shon), n. [= F. molestation, < ML. molestatio(n), < L. molestare, trouble: see molest, v.] 1. The act of molesting.—2. The state of being molested; annoyance; vexatious interference.

The knight and his companion, having reached the castle, now passed the bridge, and entered the gate without molestation.

Holke, tr. of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, xiv., note 8.

3. In Scots law, the troubling or harassing of one in the possession of his lands. An action of molestation arises chiefly in questions of common or of controverted marches or land-boundaries. = Syn. 1. See tease.

molester (mō-les'tēr), n. One who molests, disturbs, or annoys.

Surely to every good and peaceable man it must in nature needs be a hateful thing to be the displeaser and molester of thousands. Milton, Church-Government, II., Pref.

molestful (mō-lest'fūl), a. [molest + -ful.] Troublesome; annoying; harassing.

But that [pride] which breaketh out to the disturbance and vexation of others is hated as molestful and mischievous. Barrow, Works, I. xxii.

molestiet, n. [ME., < OF. molestie = Sp. Pg. It. molestia, < L. molestia, troublesomeness, trouble, < molestus, troublesome: see molest, n.] Trouble; distress.

In this manere he ne geteth hym nat suffaunce that power forieteth and that molestie (var. molestie) prikketh.

Chaucer, Boethius, III. prose 9.

molestious (mō-les'chus), a. [molestie + -ous.] Troublesome; annoying.

molet, n. A Middle English form of *mullet*¹.

mole-track (mōl'trak), n. The track or course of a mole under ground.

mole-tree (mōl'trē), n. A biennial plant, caperspurge (Euphorbia Lathyris), considered efficacious in clearing land of moles. Its seeds have been used as a cathartic. Also mole-plant.

molette (mō-let'), n. [OF.: see *mullet*².] In her., same as *mullet*².

molewarp, n. See moldwarp.

moley, a. See *moly*¹.

moleynet, n. A Middle English form of mullen.

moli (mō'li), n. [Native name.] A small tree, Dracena Schizantha, growing in elevated regions in the Somali country, Africa. It yields a sort of dragon's-blood, said not to be exported, yet resembling, if not identical with, that known as drop dragon's blood, attributed to Dracena Ombet of the island of Socotra.

A resin of acidulous flavor obtained from the moli tree (Dracena Schizantha). Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 844.

Molidae (mōl'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mola + -idae.] A family of gymnodont plectognath fishes, of the superfamily Molidae; the sunfishes, head-fishes, mole-buts, or moloids. They have a compressed-oblong body, longer than high, and a posterior marginal or caudal fin between the dorsal and anal, supported by corresponding interspinal bones (in the adult at least 4 or 5 above and 8 or 9 below) and connected with the posterior surfaces of the neural and hemal spines of the last complete (typically 16th) vertebra. The family contains several fishes of remarkable appearance, whose body ends behind so abruptly that it seems as if cut off. The best-known, Mola rotunda, attains great size, sometimes weighing 700 or 800 pounds; it is best known by the name of sunfish. Other species, belonging to two different genera, are smaller. The family is also named Orthogoriscidae, and is synonymous with the subfamily Cephalinae. See cut under Mola, 2.

Molièresque (mō-lyär-esk'), a. [Molière (see def.) + -esque.] Pertaining to or resembling Molière (Jean Baptiste Poquelin, called Molière, 1622-73), the greatest comic writer of France, or his plays.

Crispin and Turcaret are unquestionably Molièresque, though they are perhaps more original in their following of Molière than any other plays that can be named.

Encyc. Brit., XIV. 473.

molimen (mō-lī'men), n. [L. molimen, great effort, < moliri, toil, < mōles, a burden, difficulty: see mole.] Great effort or endeavor; specifically, in physiol., extraordinary effort made in the performance of any function: as, the menstrual molimen.

moliminous (mō-lim'i-nus), a. [L. molimen (-min-), great effort, + -ous.] 1. Made with great effort or endeavor.—2. Of grave import; momentous.

Prophesies of so vast and moliminous concernment to the world. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 281.

moliminously (mō-lim'i-nus-li), adv. In a moliminous or laborious and unwieldy manner. See the quotation under cumbersomely. [Rare.]

Molina (mō-lī'nā), n. pl. [NL., < Mola + *-ina*².] Günther's third group of Gymnodontes: same as the family Molidae.

moline (mō'lin), n. and a. [LL. molinus, pertaining to a mill, molina, a mill, < L. mola, millstone, mill: see mill.] 1. n. The crossed iron sunk in the center of the upper millstone, for receiving the spindle fixed in the lower stone; a mill-rynd.

II. a. In her., resembling a moline.—Cross moline. See cross.

Molinia (mō-lī'nī-ā), n. [NL. (Schrank, 1789), named after J. Molina, a writer upon Chilean plants and animals.] A genus of grasses of the tribe Festuceae and the subtribe Eragrostae, characterized by an elongated narrow panicle, small spikelets with from two to four flowers, and awnless glumes, the empty ones being slightly smaller than the flowering ones. There is but a single species, M. caerulea, found throughout Europe, and variously named blue or purple meadow-grass, purple moor-grass, and Indian grass. It is a rather coarse stiff perennial, often three feet high, having narrow flat leaves, which are chiefly radical and form large tufts. It is common in woods, on moors, and in wet heathy places, but is of little agricultural value.

Molinism (mō-lī-nizm), n. [Molina (see def.) + -ism.] The doctrine, propounded in 1588 by Luis Molina, a celebrated Spanish Jesuit, that the efficacy of divine grace depends simply on the will which accepts it—that grace is a free gift to all, but that the consent of the will is requisite in order that grace may be efficacious.

Molinist¹ (mō-lī-nist), n. [Molina (see Molinism) + -ist.] One who holds the opinions of Molina in respect to grace, free will, and predestination. See Molinism.

Molinist² (mō-lī-nist), n. [Molinos (see def.) + -ist.] A quietist, or follower of Miguel de Molinos (1627-96), who taught the direct relationship between the soul and God.

moliture (mōl'i-tūr), n. [ML. molitura, a grinding, < L. molere, grind: see mill. Cf. multure.] A fee paid in kind for the use of a mill; multure. Darvies.

This (the Bishop of Rome's) claim of universal power and authority doth bring more moliture to their mill.

Abp. Bramhall, Works, II. 159.

Moll¹ (mol), n. [Also Mall, Mal (also dim. Molly, Mollie); a reduced form of Mary. It occurs with dim. -kin in malkin, maekin.] 1. A familiar form of the feminine name Mary.—2. [I. c.] A female companion not bound by ties of marriage, but often a life-mate: a word in common use among navvies, costermongers, and the like. [Eng.]—Moll Thompson's brand, M. T. (& c. empty): applied to an empty jug, decanter, bottle, or other vessel for liquor. [Colloq. and jocular.]

moll² (mol), a. [L. mollis, neut. molle, soft.] In music, minor: as, C moll, or C minor.

molla, mollah (mōl'ā), n. [Also moolah, moolah, mulla, mullah; < Turk. Pers. molla, mevla = Hind. mauli, maulavi, < Ar. maulā, a dignitary, judge, etc., master, lit. patron.] 1. A Mohammedan title of honor or compliment given to various religious dignitaries, as heads of orders, and others exercising functions relating to the sacred law, as well as to students of that law. It is not conferred by formal authority, but is an expression of public respect, like master.—2. A superior judge of the Moslem sacred law.

Cross Moline.

The nomination of the mufti of Constantinople must fall on one of the mollas, who form the upper stratum of the hierarchy of ulema. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 661.

mollat, n. A Middle English form of mufti.

mollmoke, n. Same as malleumuck.

Molles (mol'ez), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. mollis, soft. Cf. mollusk.] In Lamarck's classification (1801-12), an order of Vermes, containing the tapeworms and flukes.

molloton (mol'e-ton), n. [F., < mollot, dim. of mou, mol, soft, < L. mollis, soft.] Swanskin; a kind of woolen blanketing used by printers as an elastic impression-surface. Simmonds.

mollweller, n. [ME.; origin obscure. Cf. milwell.] The sea-calf. Nominal MS. (Halliwell).

moll-hern (mol'hern), n. The common European heron, Ardea cinerea. [Local, Eng.]

Mollia (mol'i-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. mollis, soft: see mollis.] In Lamarck's classification (1801-12), an order of his class Radiaria, containing the aculephs.

mollidity (mol-iis'i-ti), n. [Irreg. < L. mollities, softness (see mollities), + -ity.] Softness; mollities.

mollie (mol'i), n. [Abbr. of mallemaroking. Cf. molly.] A meeting of ship-captains held on board one of several whaling-ships when ice-bound in company. See the quotation. [Naut. slang.]

Whenever the whaling fleet is stopped for a number of days in the ice, it is the practice for the captains to assemble on board one or the other of the ships to discuss the prospects of the season's catch. These interviews are called mollies, and are announced by a bucket hoisted as a signal at the fore-royal masthead. . . . Generally speaking, a Mollie means making a night of it. Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 188.

mollient (mol'i-ent), a. [= Sp. moliente, < L. mollien(-is), ppr. of mollire, soften, < mollis, soft: see mollis.] Softening; emollient; soothing. Bailey, 1727.

molliently (mol'i-ent-li), adv. With softening or soothing effect.

mollifiable (mol'i-fi-a-bl), a. [= Sp. mollificable = Pg. mollificavel; as mollify + -able.] Capable of being mollified, softened, or soothed. Ash.

mollification (mol'i-fi-kä'shon), n. [F. mollification = Pr. mollificacio = Sp. mollificacion = Pg. mollificacão = It. mollificazione, < ML. mollificatio(-n), < LL. mollificare, soften: see mollify.] 1. The act of mollifying or softening.

For induration, or mollification, it is to be enquired what will make metals harder and harder, and what will make them softer and softer.

Bacon, Physiological Remains.

2. Pacification; an appeasing; something that will soothe.

Some mollification for your giant, sweet lady.

Shak., T. N., I. 5. 218.

mollifier (mol'i-fi-er), n. One who or that which mollifies. Bacon.

mollify (mol'i-fi), v.; pret. and pp. mollified, ppr. mollifying. [Cf. F. mollifier = Pr. mollificar = Sp. mollificar = Pg. mollificar = It. mollificare, < LL. mollificare, soften, < mollificus, making soft, < L. mollis, soft, + facere, make: see -fy.] 1. trans. 1. To soften; make soft or tender.

When they have killed a great beast, they cut out all the veins and sinews . . . and likewise all the Suet: which done, they diew them in water to mollify them.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 213.

They have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment. Isa. I. 6.

2. To soothe; mitigate; appease; pacify; calm or quiet.

All things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, he [a king religious and zealous in God's cause] procureth.

Raleigh, Hist. World, V. ii. 8.

Chiron mollify'd his cruel mind
With art, and taught his warlike hands to wind
The silver strings of his melodious lyre.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, I.

3. To make less harsh; qualify; tone down; moderate; abate.

Mince the sin and mollify damnation with a phrase.

Dryden.

They would . . . sooner prevail with the houses to mollify their demands.

Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

4. To induce or incline by making tender.

If it wrought no further good in him, it was that he, in despite of himself, withdrew himself from harkening to that which might mollify his hardened heart.

Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

I shall deliver words will mollify

The hearts of beasts to spare thy Innocence.

Beau. and Fl., Philaster, v. 2.

=Syn. 2 and 3. To mitigate, ease, moderate.—2. To soothe, quiet.

II. intrans. To become soft or tender. [Rare.]

Philanax, feeling his heart more and more mollifying unto her, renewed the image of his dead master in his fancy.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, IV.

molligut (mol'i-gut), n. The angler or goosefish, Lophius piscatorius. [Connecticut, U. S.]

molline (mol'in), n. [Cf. L. mollis, soft, + -ine.] A base for ointments used in the treatment of skin-diseases. It is essentially a soft soap mixed with excess of fat and glycerin. It is made of caustic potash lye having a specific gravity 1.145, glycerin, and coconut-oil, in the proportions 100 parts of oil, 40 parts of lye, and 80 parts of glycerin. The saponification of the oil is carefully performed without heat. The glycerin is afterward thoroughly incorporated by carefully heating and mixing, and the result is a yellowish-white substance of soft consistency containing 17 per cent. of uncombined oil, which is easily removed from the skin by either warm or cold water.

It is necessary to say that no lard is ever used, a substitute being found in a saponaceous preparation which is known under the name of molline.

Lancet, No. 3423, p. 698.

Mollinedia (mol-i-nē'di-ä), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1794), named after F. Mollinedo, a Spanish chemist and naturalist.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants of the natural order Monimiaceæ and the tribe Monimieæ, characterized by sessile or stalked drupes on a disk-shaped receptacle, from which the perianth falls off like a lid, by subsessile anthers with the cells united into one at the apex, and by an indefinite number of stamens. They are trees or shrubs, with opposite leaves and insignificant green flowers, which are usually dioecious and grow in axillary or subterminal clusters. There are 80 species, natives of Australia and the warmer parts of America. Several species are highly aromatic, like the nutmeg. See inkberry, 3.

mollinet (mol'i-net), n. [Cf. OF. molinet, F. moulinet (= Sp. molinito), a small mill, dim. of moulin = Sp. molino = Pg. molino = It. molino, a mill: see mill. Cf. moulinet.] A mill of small size. Bailey, 1731.

molliplose (mol-i-pi-lōs), a. [Cf. L. mollis, soft, + pilus, a hair: see pilose.] Having soft or fine pelage or plumage, as a quadruped or bird; being fleecy, fluffy, or downy, as hair or feathers.

molliplosity (mol'i-pi-lōs'i-ti), n. [Cf. molliplose + -ity.] Fleeciness or fluffiness of the pelage or plumage of quadrupeds or birds.

mollities (mol-i-sh'i-ēz), n. [L., softness, < mollis, soft.] In med., softness; softening.—Mollities cerebri, softening of the brain.—Mollities ossium, softening of the bones; osteomalacia.

mollitious (mol-i-sh'us), a. [Cf. L. mollities, softness: see mollities.] Luxurious.

Here, mollitious alcoves gilt

Superb as Byzant domes that devils built!

Browning, Sordello, III.

mollitude (mol'i-tūd), n. [Cf. L. mollitudo, softness, < mollis, soft.] Softness; effeminacy. Campbell.

Mollugineæ (mol-jū-jin'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fenzl, 1840), < Mollugo (Mollugin) + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Ficoideæ, characterized by a deeply five-parted calyx, and by having from three to five petals, or sometimes none, and hypogynous or partly perigynous stamens. It includes 14 genera, Mollugo being the type, and about 73 species, the majority of which grow in Africa; but a few genera, as Mollugo and Glinus, are very widely distributed.

Mollugo (mo-lū'gō), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), < L. mollugo, a plant also called lappago, < mollis, soft.] A genus of plants of the natural order Ficoideæ and the tribe Mollugineæ, characterized by a capsular fruit, a three- to five-celled ovary containing many ovules, and stipulate leaves which often appear to be whorled. They are erect or diffuse herbs, usually having forked branches, linear-obovate or spatulate leaves, and inconspicuous greenish flowers in axillary umbel-like cymes. About 13 species have been enumerated, which are common in the warmer parts of the globe. M. verticillata is common throughout the United States. See carpet-weed, and Indian chickweed (under chickweed).

mollusc, n. See mollusk.

Mollusca (mo-lus'kä), n. pl. [NL., pl. of molluscum, a soft-bodied animal, a mollusk: see mollusk.] One of the leading divisions of invertebrate animals; an extensive series of invertebrates whose bodies are soft, without any jointed legs, and commonly covered with a hard shell in one, two, or more pieces, and whose principal parts are neither segmented into a series of longitudinal rings, as in insects, crustaceans, and worms, nor radiately arranged, as in echinoderms; the mollusks, as the univalve or bivalve shell-fish of ordinary language. Mollusks have no trace of a notochord or orochord, which distinguishes them from certain organisms, as ascidians, formerly classed with them. They are primitively bilaterally symmetrical, or have a right and left 'side' along a main axis; this form is best expressed in the chitons, and is evident in bivalves, slugs, etc., but its expression is often obscured by a twisting to which the body is subjected in various univalves, as those whose shells are spiral. (See Lamellibranchiata, Antisiphonaria.) There is always a well-defined alimentary canal, with definite walls. A nervous system is well developed as a set of ganglia with connecting commissures, one characteristic feature of which is the formation of a nervous ring or collar around the gullet, and another is the torsion of the visceral commissures in those forms whose bodies are twisted as above said. (See Erythraea, Streptoneura.) Most mollusks have a distinct head, which, however, is not apparent in bivalves, leading to a division of headless mollusks (Accephala or Lipoccephala). A characteristic organ of Glossophora or mollusks with heads is the odontophore, buccal mass, or lingual ribbon, whose radula serves as a rasping-organ in a mouth otherwise soft and toothless. Various modifications of the radular teeth give rise to several descriptive terms. (See plumose, rasping, radula, radial, radial.) There is always a heart, with a ventricle and at least one auricle, and dorsal in position. Its relative situation with respect to the gills differs in certain groups of mollusks. (See opisthobranchiata, prosobranchiata.) The circulation is double. The respiratory system is branchial, and in some cases, as of snails and slugs, modified for breathing air into a kind of lung. (See Pulmonata, Gastropoda.) The primitive typical gills are paired organs called clitellidia; but these undergo many modifications, and their function of respiration may be assumed vicariously by other parts of the body not homologous with them. These modifications give rise to the names of many subordinate groups of mollusks, especially of gastropods, besides that of the great series Lamellibranchiata. The renal organs of mollusks are technically called nephridia, or organs of Bojanus. (See cut under Lamellibranchiata.) The sexual organs are developed, either in the same individuals, or in different individuals of opposite sexes. The characteristic organ of locomotion is the foot or podium, a development of the under surface of the body, which may be a broad flat sole (see cut under Gastropoda), upon which the mollusk creeps, or otherwise shaped. It is often wanting, as in the oyster, or may give rise to a thready byssus by which the animal is rooted, as in the mussel. Forms of the podium give names to most of the leading groups of mollusks, as cephalopoda, pteropoda, scaphopoda, heteropoda, gastropoda, and piscapoda. A large part of the soft integument of mollusks forms what is called the mantle or pallium, from which the shell, when present, is developed (see integropalliate, anapalliate), and the impression of the edge of the mantle on the inside of the shell is the pallial line. Some mollusks are entirely naked, or have only a rudimentary and concealed shell, as land-slugs and sea-slugs, and also most of the living cephalopods. The body of cephalopods is strengthened by an internal skeleton, the calamus or cuttlebone, though no mollusk has an articulated internal skeleton. But the great majority of mollusks have a hard shell (whence the old names Testacea, Ostracodermata), of a horny or chitinous or more decidedly calcareous substance. Those whose shell is single are called univalves; those in which it forms a hinged pair of shells are bivalves; but the former may have an additional shelly piece, closing the aperture, the operculum; and the two main valves of the latter may be supplemented by accessory valves (see cut under accessory). Bivalves are the natural group of headless or lamellibranch mollusks; but univalves include several orders, though the word is chiefly used of the numerous and conspicuous gastropods. A few mollusks are technically multivalve; such are the chitons, hence called Polyplocophora, having several segments of the shell in lengthwise series. (See cut under chiton.) Cirripeds used to be considered multivalve mollusks. The shell is usually covered outside with a rough skin or epidermis; inside it may be beautifully lustrous, as with mother-of-pearl. Most mollusks live either in salt, brackish, or fresh water; land-mollusks are mostly found in damp places. Most are locomotory, either by creeping or by swimming; some swim by flapping their shells, others by moving various appendages; many adhere to or even burrow deeply in rocks; a few are parasitic. Some are carnivorous, others herbivorous; most are oviparous, a few ovoviviparous. Many are important as food, and the shells of many are put to useful or ornamental purposes. Certain bivalves furnish pearls. The Mollusca have been variously rated, limited, and classified; at one time the bodies of the animals were differently named from their shells. (See Linnæus.) (1) The name was originally proposed by Jonston in 1650 for naked cephalopods and for Aplysia, and adopted by Linnaeus in 1758 as his second order of Vermes, including similar naked forms and some heterogeneous elements. Linnaeus made the Testacea or shelled mollusks his third order of Vermes; and these two groups were combined as a class by Pöhl in 1791. (2) About 1800 Cuvier made Mollusca the second of his four branches of the animal kingdom, with seven classes, Cephalopoda, Gastropoda, Pteropoda, Accephala, Brachiopoda, Nuda, and Cirrhopoda (the Nuda being ascidians, and the Cirrhopoda being crustaceans). (3) In Lamarck's system, 1819, Mollusca, as a class, were exclusive of the bivalves (called by him Conchifera), and were divided into five orders, Pteropoda, Gastropoda, Trachelipoda, Cephalopoda, and Heteropoda. (4) In 1839 Swainson extended Mollusca to all invertebrates except the articulate. (5) The cirripeds having been recognized as crustaceans by Thompson in 1830, and the same naturalist having at the same time investigated the polyzoans, the relation of the latter to the brachiopods led H. Milne-Edwards in 1844 to associate the two Cuvierian groups Brachiopoda and Nuda with the Polyzoa in a division called Molluscoidea (the vertebrate affinities of the Nuda or ascidians not being recognized till much later, in 1866). (6) These dissociations from Mollusca in a former sense have left the group now generally recognized and as above defined. It is regarded as a phylum whose main divisions are classes. These main groups are, in one series of headless mollusks, Acephala or Liposephala, the single class variously called Conchifera, Lamelibranchiata, Elatobranchia, Pelecypoda, Cornopoda, and by other names of bivalves; and, in another series, Cephalopoda, Odonopoda, or Glossopoda, the four classes Gastropoda, Scaphopoda, Pteropoda, and Cephalopoda. But from among the gastropods are to be taken the chitons (together with Neomenia and Chetoderma), unless Gastropoda is used in a very broad sense; and some authors also dissociate the heteropods as a class. See further under the above technical names.

molluscan (mo-lus'kan), a. and n. [L. molluscus, soft (NL. molluscum, a mollusk), + -an.] I. a. Soft-bodied; pertaining to the Mollusca in any sense, or having their characters; molluscoid; malacozoic: as, a molluscan type.

II. n. A mollusk; a shell-fish; any member of the Mollusca, Molluscoidea, or Malacozoa.

molluscoid (mo-lus'koid), a. and n. [NL. molluscum, mollusk, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] I. a. 1. Like a mollusk; molluscan or molluscous. — 2. Specifically, as much like a mollusk as a brachiopod or a moss-animal is; pertaining to the Molluscoidea, or having their characters.

II. n. An animal of the group Molluscoidea in any sense.

Molluscoida (mol-us-koi'dē), n. pl. [NL.: see molluscoid.] Same as Molluscoidea.

molluscoidal (mol-us-koi'dal), a. [< molluscoid + -al.] Same as molluscoid.

molluscoidan (mol-us-koi'dan), a. and n. Same as molluscoid.

Molluscoidea (mol-us-koi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL.: < Mollusca + -oidea.] A subkingdom or branch of the animal kingdom related to the Mollusca proper, constituted by Henri Milne-Edwards in 1844 for certain animals which had before been included in Mollusca. (a) At first embracing the classes of brachiopods, polyzoans or bryozoans, and tunicates or ascidians. (b) Restricted to the tunicates and polyzoans. (c) Restricted to the brachiopods and polyzoans. (d) Further restricted to the brachiopods alone.

molluscoidean (mol-us-koi'dē-an), a. and n. I. a. Same as molluscoid, 2.

II. n. Same as molluscoid.

Molluscoides (mol-us-koi'dēz), n. pl. [NL.: < Mollusca + -oides.] The original form of the word Molluscoidea or Molluscoidea. H. Milne-Edwards, 1844.

molluscous (mo-lus'kus), a. [< mollusk + -ous.] Same as molluscan: as, molluscous softness or flabbiness.

A molluscous man, too suddenly ejected from his long-accustomed groove, where, like a toad imbedded in the rock, he had made his niche exactly fitting to his own shape, presents a wretched picture of helplessness and shiftiness. Saturday Rev.

molluscum (mo-lus'kum), n. [NL., neut. of L. molluscus, soft: see mollusk.] In pathol., a term applied to certain soft cutaneous tumors of slow growth without constitutional symptoms. — Molluscum adenosum. Same as molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum albinosum. Same as molluscum fibrosum. — Molluscum bodies, peculiar round or oval bodies, sharply defined and of a fatty appearance, seen under the microscope among the contents of the tubercles of molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum contagiosum. Same as molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum epitheliale, an epidermic growth in the form of papules and tubercles from the size of a pinhead to that of a pea, or rarely larger, palish and waxy in appearance, and containing molluscous matter. It has been said on questionable evidence to be contagious. — Molluscum fibrosum, an affection of the skin consisting of sessile, painless, soft or sometimes firm fibromata, from the size of a pea to that of an egg or larger. — Molluscum non-contagiosum or pendulum. Same as molluscum fibrosum. — Molluscum sebaceum or seale. Same as molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum simplex. Same as molluscum fibrosum.

mollusk, mollusc (mol'usk), n. [< F. mollusque = Sp. molusco = Pg. It. mollusco, < NL. molluscum, a mollusk (cf. L. molluscum, a fungus which grows on the maple-tree; mollusca, a nut with a thin shell), neut. of L. molluscus, soft, < mollis, soft: see moll.] A soft-bodied animal, usually with an external shell; a member of the Mollusca in any sense. See Mollusca. — Articulated mollusks, a former name of De Blainville's Malentozaria, comprising the cirripeds and the chitons, unnaturally associated. See Nematopoda, Polyplaxipoda. — Hemal mollusks, those mollusks (and supposed molluscoids) whose intestine has a hemal flexure, as the heteropods, many gastropods, etc. — Neural mollusks, those mollusks and molluscoids whose intestine has a neural flexure. They are the cephalopods, pteropods, pulmonates, and lamellibranchs, together with brachiopods and polyzoans.

molluskigerous (mol-us-ki'g-rus), a. [*Prop. molluscigerous; < NL. molluscum, a mollusk, + L. gerere, carry: see -ger, -gerous.] Having or bearing mollusks: specifically applied by Huxley to the elongated tubular sacs occasionally found attached by one end to an intestinal vessel of an echinoderm, Synapta digitata, and containing the ova or embryos of the molluscan parasite Entoconcha mirabilis.

moll-washer (mol'wash'er), n. The washer or wagtail, a bird. Also called molly wash-dish, etc. [Local, Eng.] moll-wire (mol'wir), n. A pickpocket who robs women only. [Thieves' slang.]

Molly¹ (mol'i), n. [Dim. of Moll, or var. of the orig. Mary: see Moll.] 1. A familiar form of the feminine name Mary. — 2. [I. c.; pl. mollies (-iz).] The wagtail, a bird: as, the yellow molly (the yellow wagtail); the molly wash-dish (the pied wagtail). [Local, Eng.] molly² (mol'i), n.; pl. mollies (-iz). [Abbr. of mollymawk, malle-muck.] The malle-muck or fulmar, Fulmarus glacialis. See *fulmar*².

molly³ (mol'i), n.; pl. mollies (-iz). [Hind. mali.] In India, a gardener or one of the caste of gardeners. Also mallee.

Our garden is nearly washed away, and our molly, or gardener, does not present us with our morning bouquet. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II, 121.

mollycoddle (mol'i-kod-l), n. [Also mallecoddle; *< Molly*¹, *Moll*¹, + *coddle*².] One who lacks resolution, energy, or hardihood; an effeminate man: used in derision or contempt.

He [Fielding] couldn't do otherwise than laugh at the puny cockney bookseller, pouring out endless volumes of sentimental twaddle, and hold him up to scorn as a mollycoddle and a malle-muck. Thackeray, English Humorists, Hogarth, Smollett, and [Fielding].

molly cottontail. See cottontail.

Molly Maguire (mol'i mag-wir'). [A name assumed (from Molly, a familiar form of the feminine name Mary, and Maguire, a common Irish surname) by the members of the organization (def. 1), in allusion to the woman's dress they wore as a disguise. There is no evidence that the name referred orig. to a particular person named Molly Maguire.] 1. A member of a lawless secret association in Ireland, organized with the object of defeating and terrorizing agents and process-servers, and others engaged in the business of evicting tenants.

These Molly Maguires were generally stout active young men, dressed up in women's clothes, with faces blackened or otherwise disguised. . . . In this state they used suddenly to surprise the unfortunate grippers, keepers, or process-servers, and either duck them in bog-holes or beat them in the most unmerciful manner, so that the Molly Maguires became the terror of all our officials. W. S. Trench, Realities of Irish Life, vi.

Hence — 2. A member of a secret organization in the mining regions of Pennsylvania, notorious for the commission of various crimes, including murderous attacks upon the owners, officers, or agents of mines, until their suppression by the execution of several of their leaders, about 1877.

mollymawk (mol'i-māk), n. A variant of malle-muck.

molly-puff (mol'i-puf), n. A gambling decoy.

Thou molly-puff! were it not justice to kick thy guts out? Shirley, The Wedding, iv, 3.

Moloch (mō'lok), n. [Also sometimes Molech; < LL. Moloch, < Gr. Μολύχ, Μολύχ, < Heb. mōlēkh (usually with the article) (also Milkōm, Malkām, > Gr. Μελχόμ, E. Milcom); cf. melekh (= Ar. melik, king, < mālakh, reign, part. mōlēkh, reigning).] 1. The chief god of the Phœnicians, frequently mentioned in Scripture as the god of the Ammonites, whose worship consisted chiefly of human sacrifices, ordeals by fire, mutilation, etc.: also identified with the god of the Carthaginians called by classical writers Kronos or Saturn. Hence the word has now become a designation of any baneful influence to which everything is sacrificed.

And they built the high places of Baal, . . . to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not. Jer. xxxii. 35.

First Moloch, horrid king, besmeared with blood
Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears. Milton, P. L., I, 392.

It was a very Moloch of a baby, on whose insatiable altar the whole existence of this particular young brother was offered up a daily sacrifice. Dickens, The Hated Man, II.

2. [NL.] The typical genus of Molochinae. There is but one species, M. horridus of Australia, one of the most repulsive, though in reality one of the most harmless, of reptiles, the horns on the head and the numerous spines on the body giving it a formidable aspect.

3. [I. c.] A lizard of this genus: as, the spiny moloch.

Molochinae (mol-ō-ki'nē), n. pl. [NL.: < Moloch + -inae.] A subfamily of agamoid lizards having a depressed body, a very small mouth, and the upper teeth directed horizontally inward. The body is beset with large spines, especially on the head, giving an ugly and formidable appearance to an entirely harmless creature.

molochine (mol'ō-kin), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Molochinae.

II. n. A moloch.

Molochize (mō'lok-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Molochized, ppr. Molochizing. [< Moloch + -ize.] To sacrifice or immolate as to Moloch. [Rare.]

I think that they would Molochize them [their babies] too, To have the heavens clear. Tennyson, Harold, I, 1.

moloid (mol'oid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Moloidae.

II. n. A member of the family Molidae.

Moloidae (mō-loi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL.: < Mola + -oidea.] In Gill's ichthyological system, a superfamily of gymnodont plectognath fishes, founded upon the single family Molidae. The moloids are without pelvis or ribs; they have the body truncated behind, the caudal region aborted, and the jaws without median sutures. See Molidae.

Molokan (mol-ō-kān'), n.; pl. Molokani (-ē). [Russ. molokanū, < moloko, milk: see milk.] A member of a Russian sect living chiefly in southeastern Russia. They condemn image-worship, fasting, and episcopacy, and accept the Bible as the only rule of faith and conduct. They hold their religious services in private houses, and have a simple church organization. Their name is derived from their reputed practice of drinking milk on fast-days—a departure from the custom of the Orthodox Church. Also written Malakan.

The Molokani are Russian sectarians—closely resembling Scotch Presbyterians. D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 157.

molompi (mō-lom'pi), n. [Native name.] The African rosewood. See rosewood.

molopes (mō-lō'pēz), n. pl. [NL.: < Gr. μολωπ (μολωπ), the mark of a stripe, a weal.] In pathol., same as ribices.

molosse (mō-lōs'), n. [< F. molosse = Sp. moloso, < L. molossus, a foot so called: see molossus.] Same as molossus, 1.

molossi, n. Plural of molossus, 1.

Molossian (mō-lōs'i-an), a. and n. [< L. Molossia, < Gr. Μολοσσία, the country of the Molossi, < Μολοσσός, Molossian, pl. Μολοσσοί, L. Molossi, the Molossians.] I. a. Relating or belonging to the Molossians, or Molossi, a tribe of ancient Epirus, in northern Greece.

II. n. 1. One of the Molossian tribe. — 2. [I. c.] One of the Molossidae.

molossic (mō-lōs'ik), a. [< Molossus + -ic.] In pros., being or pertaining to a molossus.

Molossidae (mō-lōs'i-dē), n. pl. [NL.: < Molossus + -idae.] The Molossinae regarded as a family composed of the genera Molossus, Nyctinomus, and Chiromes; the bulldog bats, or mastiff bats.

Molossinae (mol-ō-si'nē), n. pl. [NL.: < Molossus + -inae.] A subfamily of bats of the family Emballonuridae; the molossoid or bulldog bats: so called from the physiognomy, a peculiar expression being conferred by the thick pendulous chops, like a bulldog's. They have large feet, with the first toe, or first and also the fifth, much larger than the rest, the feet free from the wing-membrane, which fold under the forearm, a retractile intermembrane sheathing and aliding along the tail, and a single pair of large upper incisors. In all the genera, excepting Myotis, the long tail is produced far beyond the intermembrane. Leading genera are Molossus, Chiromes, and Myotis.

molossine (mō-lōs'in), a. and n. [< Molossus + -ine.] I. a. Pertaining to the Molossinae, or having their characters; molossoid.

II. n. A bulldog bat; a molossoid.

molossoid (mō-lōs'oid), a. and n. [< Molossus + -oid.] I. a. Molossine, in a wide sense; pertaining to or resembling the Molossinae.

II. n. A member of the Molossinae; a molossoid bat.

Molossus (mō-lōs'us), n. [In def. 1, L. molossus, a metrical foot, < Gr. μολοσσός, a metrical foot of three long syllables, < Μολοσσός, Molossian. In def. 2, NL., < L. Molossus, a Molossian hound, < Gr. Μολοσσός, Molossian: see Molossian.] 1. [I. c.; pl. molossi (-i).] In classical pros., a foot of three long syllables. — 2. In mammal., the typical and leading genus of Molossinae. There are numerous species, inhabiting tropical and subtropical America, as M. glaucinus, M. obscurus, etc. These bulldog bats have the tail long and exerted, thick pendulous lips, prominent nostrils, large rounded ears, the incisors one above and one or two below on each side, and the premolars two below and one or two above on each side.

3. In conch., a genus of mollusks. Montfort, 1808.

Molothrus (mol'ō-thrus), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1831), said by the namer to come from Gr. "μόλοθρος, qui non vocatus alienas oves intrat," an unbidden guest, appar. an error for Molobrus (as given by J. Cabanis), < Gr. μολοβρός, a greedy fellow.] A genus of American oscine passerine birds of the family Icteridae and subfamily Agelaiinae, parasitic in habit; the cow-birds, cowpen-birds, or cow-buntings. There are several species, of North and South America, all of which lay their eggs in other birds' nests, so far as is known, like the Old World cuckoos. M. ater or pecoris abounds in most parts of the United States. M. aeneus, a large handsome species, inhabiting Texas and Mexico, is the bronzed or red-eyed cow-bird. The genus is also called Hypobletia. See cut under cow-bird.

molrooken (mōl'ruk-en), n. [Origin obscure.] The great crested grebe, Podiceps cristatus. C. Swainson. [Lough Neagh, Ireland.]

molsh, a. See mulsh.

molt, v. An obsolete preterit of mel. Chaucer. molt², moult¹ (mōlt), v. [With unorig. l, < ME. mouten, mowten = D. muisen = MLG. L.G. muisen = OHG. mūzōn, MHG. mūzen, change, G. mausen, change the feathers or skin, molt, < L. mutare, change: see mute² and mew², doublets of molt².] I. trans. To shed or cast, as feathers, hair, or skin; slough off: often used figuratively.

So shall my anticipation prevent your discovery, and your secrecy to the king and queen moult no feather. Shak., Hamlet, II. 2. 306.

Mute the skylark and forlorn,
When she moult the firstling plumes. Coleridge.

We all moult our names in the natural course of life. Southey, The Doctor, lxxx. (Davies.)

II. intrans. 1. To cast or shed feathers, hair, skin, or the like; undergo or accomplish a molt; exuviate; mew. See the noun.

Long as the bird may live, and often as it may moult, the original style of markings never gives way to any other. A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., IX. 3.

2. To be about to be cast off or shed, as plumage.

Our hero gave him such a sudden flat in the mouth as dashed in two of his teeth that then happened to be moulting. Brooke, Fool of Quality, I. 104. (Davies.)

molt², moult¹ (mōlt), n. [< molt², moult¹, v.] 1. The act or process of shedding or casting any tegumentary, cuticular, or exoskeletal structures or appendages, as feathers, hair, skin, nails, horns, hoofs, claws, or shell; ecdysis; exuviation. The surface of the body of most animals, outside of the parts which are vascular or supplied with blood, is worn away by friction, attrition, or other mechanical means. This process may be slight and gradual or continuous, as in the case of man, where it results in scarf-skin and dandruff; or it may be periodical and very extensive, affecting the whole cuticle or its appendages. Mammals shed their hair usually once a year. Birds molt their feathers usually at least once, often twice, sometimes thrice a year, the last two cases constituting the double and the triple molt. Both these classes of animals, in some cases, molt cuticular substances in mass. Thus, the American antelope sheds the sheath of the horn; lemmings and ptarmigans drop their claws; some birds of the auk family shed the horny parts of the beak; snakes cast their cuticle whole, even to the layer over the eyeball; crustaceans slough the whole shell; and numberless other invertebrates have a proper molt of similar or analogous character.

2. The period or time of molting.

moltable (mōl'ta-bl), a. [Irreg. for meltable.]

That can be melted; fusible.

molte. An obsolete past participle of mel. Chaucer.

molten¹ (mōl'tn), p. a. [Pp. of melt¹.] 1. Melted; in a state of fusion or solution: as, molten gold.

Love's mystick form the artisans of Greece
In wounded stone or molten gold express. Prior.

Solid iron floats upon molten iron exactly as ice floats upon water. Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 124.

A prince whose manhood was all gone,
And molten down in mere uxoriousness. Tennyson, Geraint.

2. Made or produced by means of melting.

And he received them at their hand, and fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it a molten calf. Ex. xxxii. 4.

3. Liquid.

Sum hem kepe
Three nyght in molten dounge. Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 54.

molten², moulten (mōl'tn), p. a. [Irreg. for molten, pp. of molt², v.] Having molted; being in the state of molting.

A clip-wing'd Griffin, and a moulten Raven. Shak., 1 Hen. IV. (fol. 1623), III. 1. 152.

moltenly (mōl'tn-li), adv. Like what is in a melted state; liquidly.

A living language . . . moltenly ductile to new shapes of sharp and clear relief in the moulds of new thought. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 155.

molting, moulting (mōl'ting), n. [With unorig. l, as in molt², moult¹, v., < ME. mouting, mowtynge; verbal n. of molt², moult¹, v.] 1. The act or process of molting; molt.

O bath my leaden soul the art t' improve
Her wasted talent, and, unrais'd, aspire
In this sad moulting time of her desire? Quarles, Emblems, v. 4.

2. The molting season.

Also in sothe the season was paste for hertis y-headed so hy and so noble
To make any myrthe for mowtynge that nyghed. Richard the Redeless, II. 12.

molto (mōl'tō), adv. [It., very much, < L. multus, much: see multitude.] In music, very; much: as, allegro molto, very fast.

Molucca balm. See Moluccella.

Molucca bean, deer, etc. See bean, etc.

Moluccella (mōl'uk-sel'ā), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named from the Molucca Islands, of which the plant was supposed to be a native.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Stachydeæ and the subtribe Lamieæ. It is characterized by the posterior lip of the corolla being usually concave and covered with long soft hairs, by the calyx being larger at the apex, with an oblique limb having from five to thirteen unequal spiny teeth, and by having the anther-cells extremely divergent. They are very smooth annual herbs with petiolate leaves and axillary whorls of small flowers. There are but 2 species, both native in the eastern Mediterranean region. M. laeta, an old garden-flower from Asia, once supposed to come from the Moluccas, is called Molucca balm, and also shell-flower, from its large cup-shaped calyx, which has the small corolla at the bottom.

Molva (mōl'vā), n. [NL. (Nilsson, 1832), a name of this fish.] A genus of gadoid fishes, related to the burbot and cusk, having the mouth terminal, anal fin entire, and canine teeth on the vomer and mandible. M. molva or vulgaris is the common ling of North Atlantic waters. See cut under ling.

molwart, n. See molldwarp.

moly¹ (mō'li), a. [Also molep; < mole² + -y¹.] Like a mole or its habits. [Rare.]

He . . . did . . . infinite service in discouraging . . . the mole, creeping style, which at that time infected all the ranks both of the laity and clergy.

Goldsmith, Encouragers and Discouragers of English Literature, II.

moly² (mō'li), n. [< L. moly, < Gr. μᾶλν, a fabulous herb.] 1. A fabulous herb of magic power, represented as having a black root and the flower milk-white, said by Homer to have been given by Hermes to Odysseus (Ulysses) to counteract the spells of Circe.

And yet more medicinal is it than that moly
That Hermes once to wise Ulysses gave. Milton, Comus, I. 636.

But as ye hearb moly hath a floure as white as snow, and a roote as blacke as Incke, so age hath a white head, showing pletie, but a black hart, swelling with mischiefe. Lily, Euphuus and his England (Arber's Reprints, IV. 281).

Homer is of opinion that the principall and soveraigne hearb of all others is moly; so called (as he thinketh) by the Gods themselves. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxv. 4.

2. Wild garlic, Allium Moly. The moly of Dioscorides is said to have been Allium subhirsutum; the dwarf moly is A. Chamæmoly.

molybdate (mō-lib'dāt), n. [< molybd(ic) + -ate¹.] A compound of molybdic acid with a base.

Molybdate of lead, yellow lead ore; the mineral wulfenite. See wulfenite.

molybdæna (mō-lib-dē'nā), n. [= F. molybdène = Sp. It. molibdena = Pg. molybdæne, molybdæna, < L. molybdæna, < Gr. μολύβδανα, galena or litharge, < μολύβδος, lead, = L. plumbum, lead: see plumb.] Same as molybdenum.

molybdeniferous (mō-lib-dē-nif'e-rus), a. [< L. molybdæna (see molybdæna) + ferre = E. bear¹.] Containing molybdenum.

molybdenite (mō-lib-dē'nīt), n. [< molybdæna + -ite².] Sulphid of molybdenum, occurring in foliated masses or in scales, less often in hexagonal crystals, of a lead-gray color and metallic luster. It is very soft, and, like graphite, which it closely resembles, leaves a trace on paper.

molybdenous (mō-lib-dē'nus), a. [< molybdænum + -ous.] Pertaining to or obtained from molybdenum.

molybdenum (mō-lib-dē'nūm), n. [< NL. molybdænium, a later form for L. molybdæna: see molybdæna.] Chemical symbol, Mo; atomic weight, 95.8. A metal of a silver-white color, but harder than silver, which fuses with difficulty, if at all, at the highest temperature of a wind-furnace. Its specific gravity is 8.6. It is chemically related to chromium, tungsten, and uranium, and, like those metals, forms trioxides which are acid-forming and yield very characteristic salts. It is remarkable for the number of oxides and corresponding chlorides which it forms; but it is the least important economically of the group to which it belongs. The most abundant ore of molybdenum is the sulphuret (molybdenite), and the strong external resemblance of this mineral to graphite (Latin plumbago) led to the confusion of molybdæna with that substance; moreover, external resemblance and certain chemical peculiarities caused still further difficulties of nomenclature, in which manganese, antimony, and even magnesia were involved. Thus, the peroxid of manganese was called by Linnaeus molybdenum magnesi. These perplexities were not cleared up until toward the end of the last century; but finally, as the result of the labors of Scheele, Bergman, and Hjelm (1778-90), the metal molybdæna, or molybdenum, as it is now more generally called, was isolated from its combinations. The ores of molybdenum are somewhat widely diffused, but rarely occur in any considerable quantity. The principal molybdeniferous minerals are molybdenite and wulfenite. There is also a molybdic ocher (the trioxid) and a carbonate (paterite); various ores of iron also contain traces of this metal.

molybdic (mō-lib'dik), a. [= F. molybdique; as molybd(enum) + -ic.] Pertaining to or obtained from molybdenum.—Molybdic acid, H_2MoO_4 , an acid of molybdenum, which may be obtained in yellow crystalline crusts. Its salts are called molybdates.—Molybdic ocher, native molybdic oxid.

molybdin (mō-lib'din), n. [< molybd(enum) + -in².] Molybdic ocher.

molybdite (mō-lib'dīt), n. [< molybd(enum) + -ite².] Molybdic ocher.

molybdocolic (mō-lib-dō-kol'ik), n. [< Gr. μολύβδος, lead, + κολική, colic: see colic.] Lead-colic.

molybdomenite (mō-lib-dō-mē'nīt), n. [< Gr. μολύβδος, lead, + μηνή, moon, + -ite² (cf. selenite).] A rare lead selenite, occurring in thin transparent scales of a white or greenish color, found with other selenium minerals at Cachet in the Argentine Republic.

molybdoparesis (mō-lib-dō-par'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μολύβδος, lead, + πάρεσις, palsy.] Lead-palsy.

molybdosis (mō-lib-dō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μολύβδος, lead.] Lead-poisoning.

molyné (mō-li-nā'), a. [See moline.] In her., same as moline when applied to a cross.

molyssite (mōl'i-sīt), n. [Said to be < Gr. μολυσσις, var. of μολυνσις, a staining, defilement, < μολύνειν, stain, also half-cook, + -ite².] A chlorid of iron occurring as a thin yellow or red incrustation on lava at Vesuvius.

momt, a., n., and v. See mum¹.

momblement, n. See mumblement.

momblishness (mom'blish-ness), n. Muttering talk. Bailey, 1731.

mome¹ (mōm), n. [< OF. mome, a mask: see mum².] A buffoon; a fool; a blockhead; a ninny; a dull person; a stupid fellow.

I dare be bold awhile to play the mome,
Out of my sacke some other faults to lease. Mir. for Magas., 406. (Nares.)

Mome, malt-horse, capon, coxcomb, idiot, patch! Shak., C. of E., III. 1. 82.

Words are but wind, but blowes come home,
A stout tongue'd lawyer's but a mome. Browne's Songs (1661), p. 106. (Halliwell.)

Parnassus is not cloime
By every such mome. Drayton, Skeltoniad, p. 1873. (Nares.)

Away with this foolish mome!
Flodden Field (Child's Ballads, VII. 73).

mome² (mōm), a. [< Cf. mum¹.] Soft; smooth. Halliwell. [North. Eng.]

mome³, n. [ME. mome = MD. moeme, D. moet = MLG. mōme = OHG. muomā, MHG. muome, G. muhme, aunt, cousin; cf. Icel. mōna, mother; prob. orig. 'mother's sister,' and related to AS. mōdor, E. mother: see mother¹.] An aunt. Nominate MS. (Halliwell.)

momelet, v. An obsolete form of mumble.

moment (mō'ment), n. [< F. moment = Sp. Pg. It. momento, a moment, < L. momentum, a balance, balancing, alteration, a particle sufficient to turn the scales, hence a particle, point, point of time, short time, moment, a cause, circumstance, matter, weight, influence; contr. of mor(i)mentum*, < morere, move: see move, r. Cf. movement.] 1. A space of time incalculably or indefinitely small. (a) Time too brief for reckoning; an instant: as, I have but a moment to spare; wait a moment.

We shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. 1 Cor. xv. 52.

Do not delay; the golden moments fly!
Longfellow, Masque of Pandora, vii.

(b) Precise point of time; exact or very instant, as of a motion, action, or occurrence: as, at that moment he expired.

A prince, the moment he is crown'd,
Inherits every virtue sound. Swift, On Poetry, I. 90.

Every moment dies a man,
Every moment one is born. Tennyson, Vision of Sin, iv.

(c) A brief interval; the passing time: in the phrase for a moment: as, for a moment he was at a loss.

The lip of truth shall be established for ever; but a lying tongue is but for a moment. Prov. xii. 19.

The "Daily News" expresses the general sense . . . in recognizing defeat as decisive for the moment. New York Tribune, July 15, 1896.

2. The present time; especially, with the definite article, the precise instant of opportunity.

The moment should be improved; if suffered to pass away, it may never return. Washington, in Bancroft's Hist. Const., I. 81.

3. Momentum; impetus; moving cause; impelling force or occasion.

Each on himself relied,
As only in his arm the moment lay
Of victory. Milton, P. L., vi. 239.

4. Notable purport; weight or value; importance; consequence: as, his opinions are of little moment to us.

Being for many respects of greater moment, to have them [princes] good and virtuous then any inferior sort of men. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 23.

Capitall criminals, or matters of moment, before the Chan himself, or Priule Counsellors, of whom they are alwayes heard, and speedily discharged.

Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 36.

5t. A forcible or convincing plea.

He . . . pressed the former arguments, refuted the cavils . . . and added . . . many moments and weights to his discourse. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 77.

6. An essential or constituent element; an important factor.

It is a complete mistake historically to assume that the moment of Cartesianism is consciousness.

Veitch, Intro. to Descartes's Method, p. lxxix.

7. In math., an increment or decrement; an infinitesimal change in a varying quantity.—8. In mech., in general, effect; avail. The phrases in which it appears have exact meanings, though the precise sense in which the word itself is taken in these phrases is not always clear.—Bending-moment. Same as moment of flexure.—Equation of moments. See equation.—Logical moments. See logical.—Moment-axis of a couple, the line which represents in direction the direction of a couple, and by its length the moment.—Moment of a couple, the product of the force by the length of the arm.—Moment of a force. (a) With regard to a point, the product of a force by its distance from the point. (b) With reference to a line or axis, the product of the component of the force in the plane perpendicular to the line by the distance of that component from that line.—Moment of a magnet, or magnetic moment, the product of the numerical strength of either pole of the magnet by the distance between the poles.

The total moment of a magnet is the moment when it is at right angles to the lines of force.

J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I. 151.

Moment of deviation or distortion. Same as product of inertia (which see, under inertia).—Moment of flexure. See flexure.—Moment of inertia. See inertia.—Moment of rupture, the moment of flexure of a beam calculated for a predetermined or assumed breaking load and leverage. Its formula is $M = \frac{1}{2}bh^2$, in which b = breadth, h = depth, n a factor varying with shape of cross-section, and f a factor depending on the nature of the material. Both factors n and f are determined and tabulated for different materials from experimental data.—Moment of stability of a body or structure supported at a given plane joint, the moment of the couple of forces which must be applied in a given vertical plane to that body or structure in addition to its own weight, in order to transfer the center of resistance of the joint to the limiting position consistent with stability. Rankine.—Virtual moment of a force, the product of the force by the virtual velocity of the point of application. = Syn. 1. Moment, Minute, Instant, twinkling, second, trice, flash. A moment has duration, an instant has not: as, wait a moment; come this instant. Practically, however, the two are often the same. A minute is just sixty seconds; a moment is a short but less definite period.

Moments make the year. Young, Love of Fame, vi. 205.

There are minutes that fix the fate
Of battles and of nations.

H. H. Brownell, The Ray-Fight.

And he requires your haste-post-haste appearance,
Even on the instant. Shak., Othello, I. 2. 38.

moment (mō'mēnt), v. t. [< Momēt, n.] To order or arrange to a moment.

All accidents are minuted and momented by Divine Providence. Fuller, Worthies, Suffolk, II. 334. (Davies.)

moments, n. Plural of momentum.

momental (mō'mēn-tal or mō'mēn'tal), a. [*< OF. momental, < LL. momentalis (in adv. momentaliter), of a moment, < momentum, moment: see moment.] 1t. Pertaining to a moment.—2t. Lasting but a moment; very brief.

Not one momental minute doth she swerve.

Bretton, Sir P. Sidney's Ourania (1606).

3t. Momentous.—4. Of or pertaining to momentum.—Momentally ellipsoid. See ellipsoid.

momentally (mō'mēn-tal-i), adv. 1. For a moment.

Air but momentally remaining in our bodies hath no proportionable space for its conversion, only of length enough to refrigerate the heart. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

2. From moment to moment.

Momentally the corporall spirits are dissolved and consumed, as also, in like manner, the humours, and solide parts. Benvenuto, Passengers' Dialogues (1612). (Nares.)

momentane, a. [< OF. momentaine, < LL. momentaneus, of a moment: see momentaneous.] Momentaneous; momentary.

You will remember how transitorie this present life is, and how short and momentane the pleasure of this filthie flesh is.

Stow, Chronicles, The Mercians, an. 749.

momentaneous (mō'mēn-tā-nē-us), a. [= F. momentané, OF. momentaine (see momentane) = Sp. momentáneo = Pg. It. momentaneo, < LL. momentaneus, < L. momentum, a moment: see moment.] 1. Lasting for a moment; momentary. Johnson.—2. Pertaining to instants of time; instantaneous.

momentanines (mō'mēn-tā-ni-nes), n. [< momentary + -ness.] Momentariness. Bp. Hall, Character of Man.

momentary (mō'mēn-tā-ni), a. [< LL. momentaneus: see momentaneous.] Lasting for a moment; momentary.

Making it momentary as a sound,
Swift as a shadow, short as any dream.

Shak., M. N. D., I. 1. 143.

Other momentary delights only supple the forehead, not unburthen and solace the heart. Ford, Line of Life.

momentarily (mō'mēn-tā-ri-li), adv. 1. So as to be momentary; for a moment.

I repeatedly watched the flowers, and only once saw a humble-bee momentarily alight on one, and then fly away.

Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 84.

2. From moment to moment: as, he is momentarily expected.

Why endow the vegetable bird with wings, which nature has made momentarily dependent upon the soil?

Shenstone. (Latham.)

momentariness (mō'mēn-tā-ri-nes), n. The state of being momentary.

momentary (mō'mēn-tā-ri), a. [< LL. momentarius, of a moment, brief, < L. momentum, a moment: see moment.] 1. Lasting but a moment or for a very short time; of short duration: as, a momentary pang.

Jove's lightning, the precursors
Of the dreadful thunder-claps, more momentary
And sight-outrunning were not.

Shak., Tempest, I. 2. 202.

With wings more momentary-swift than thought.

Shak., T. and C., iv. 2. 14.

Upon serious consideration of the frailty and uncertainty of this momentary life, . . . I . . . do make and declare . . . my last will and testament.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 436.

His griefs are momentary and his joys immortal.

Steele, Spectator, No. 75.

2. Short-lived; likely to die soon or at any moment. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Men are the subjects of fortune, and therefore momentary.

Greene, Penelope's Web (1587).

Only give it [this paper] leave to tell you that that lord whom perchance the king may be pleased to hear in it is an old and momentary man.

Donne, Letters, cxxix.

That hour perhaps
Is not so far when momentary man
Shall seem no more a something to himself.

Tennyson, Lucretius.

3. Occurring every moment: as, momentary interruptions.

The due clock swinging slow with sweepy away,
Measuring time's flight with momentary sound.

Warton, Inscriptions.

momently (mō'mēnt-li), adv. From moment to moment; every moment.

Of tuneful Caves and playful Waterfalls—
Of Mountains varying momently their crests—Proud be this Land!

Wordsworth, Glen of Loch Etive.

Momently the mortar's iron throat
Roared from the trenches.

Whittier, Dream of Pio Nono.

momentous (mō'mēn'tus), a. [< LL. momentosus, of a moment, < L. momentum, a moment: see moment.] Of moment or consequence; of surpassing importance; critical.

We ought constantly to bear in our mind this momentous truth, that in the hands of the Delty time is nothing, that he has eternity to act in.

Paley, Sermons, xxii.

The emigration of the fathers of these twelve common-wealths . . . was the most momentous event of the seventeenth century.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., II. 450.

—Syn. Grave, serious.

momentously (mō'mēn'tus-li), adv. To a momentous degree; with important effect or influence: as, this engagement bore momentously on the course of the war.

momentousness (mō'mēn'tus-nes), n. The state or quality of being momentous or of grave importance.

These and many other difficulties beset Dr. M— in the course of his study; nor is he unaware of their variety or momentousness.

Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 225.

momentum (mō'mēn'tum), n.; pl. momenta (-tā). [< L. momentum, balance, alteration, cause, etc., orig. 'a movement': see moment.] 1. In mech., the product of the mass and velocity of a body; the quantity of motion of a body. In all relations between bodies, such as impacts, the algebraic sum of the momenta is preserved constant. See energy.

When the velocity is the same, . . . the momentum, or moving force, of bodies is directly proportional to their mass or quantity of matter. . . . When the momenta of two bodies are equal, their velocities will be in the inverse proportion of their quantities of matter.

Lardner, Handbook of Nat. Philoa., §§ 195, 199.

The rate of mass displacement is momentum, just as the rate of displacement is velocity.

Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, art. lxvii.

2. An impulse; an impelling force; impetus.

This preponderating weight . . . completed that momentum of ignorance, rashness, presumption, and lust of plunder which nothing has been able to resist.

Burke, Rev. in France.

He never asks whether the political momentum set up by his measure, in some cases decreasing but in other cases greatly increasing, will or will not have the same general direction with other like momenta.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 26.

3. Constituent or essential element. Compare moment, 6.

I shall state the several momenta of the distinction in separate propositions.

Sir W. Hamilton.

4. In musical notation, an eighth-rest.

momie, n. A variant of *mummy*¹.

momie-cloth, n. See mummy-cloth.

Momier (mō'mi-ēr), n. [F., lit. a mummer: see mummer.] A term of reproach applied to those Swiss Calvinists who, about 1818, separated from the state church and maintained a strict Calvinistic theology and Methodist discipline.

momish (mō'mish), a. [< mome¹ + -ish¹.] Foolish; dull. Levins.

Thy pleasant framed style Discovered lies to momish mouths.

Verres prefixed to Googe's Eploga. (Davies.)

momism (mō'mizm), n. [< Momus, 1, + -ism.] Carping; faultfinding. Minsheu.

momist (mō'mist), n. [< Momus, 1, + -ist.] A faultfinder.

As for the crabbed & critically interpretation of many, . . . I weigh it little, and less the detracting speeches of barking Momists. Times Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 111.

mommy, n. An obsolete form of mummy.

momnick, n. [Var. of mamnock, n.] A scarecrow. [Prov. Eng.] momnick (mō'mik), v. t. [Var. of mamnock, v.] To cut awkwardly; mess or make a mess of: as, he momnicks his food. [Obsolete or prov.]

mommy (mō'mi), n.; pl. mommys (-iz). [A var. of mammy; cf. old-wife, old-squaw, old-granny, etc.] A duck, Harleida glacialis, the old-wife or south-southerly. [Cape May, New Jersey.]

Momordica (mō-mōr'di-kā), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), so called in allusion to the seeds, which have the appearance of being bitten; < L. mordere (perf. mordidi), bite: see mordant.]

A genus of plants of the natural order Cucurbitaceæ and the tribe Cucurbitineæ, characterized by the stamens being inserted below the mouth of the calyx, by the calyx being provided with two or three scales, and by having a campanulate corolla and simple tendrils. They are climbing herbs, either annual or perennial, having entire lobed or compound leaves and rather small white or yellowish flowers, which are monocious or dioecious. The fruit is oblong or cylindrical, berry-like or opening into three valves, having few or many seeds. Twenty-five species are known, natives chiefly of Africa, but also of tropical Asia and Australia. They are plain plants except for their fruit, which in some species is red or orange-yellow, and which bursts when fully ripe, disclosing the red-ariled seeds. Such are the species M. balsamina, the balsam-apple, and M. Charantia, sometimes called balsam-pear, the best-known cultivated species. The squiring cucumber, which grows in the south of Europe, was formerly placed in this genus, under the name M. Elaterium, but is now regarded as the type of a distinct genus, Ebalium.

momot (mō'mot), n. Same as motmot.

Momot (mō-mō't), n. [NL.] Same as Momotus. Shaw, 1809.

Momotidae (mō-mōt'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Momotus + -idae.] An American family of serratorostrat picarian birds, typified by the genus Momotus; the motmots or sawbills. They are related to the kingfishers. The tail is long and graduated, of 10 or 12 rectrices, of which the middle pair are usually long-exserted and spatulated, forming a pair of rackets; the plumage is attershafted, the bill serrated, and the sternum doubly fenestrated; there are no caeca nor spinal apertures; and there are two carotids. The Momotidae are confined to the warmer parts of America. There are only about 15 species, of the genera Momotus, Crydellus, Earyphthengus, Eumomota, Prionorhynchus, and Hylomanes. The family is also called Prionitidae. See motmot.

Momotinae (mō-mō-ti-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Momotus + -inae.] 1. The only subfamily of Momotidae. Also called Prionitinae.—2. The Momotidae as a subfamily of some other family.

Momotus (mō-mō'tus), n. [NL.: see motmot, motmot.] The typical genus of Momotidae, established by Brisson in 1760. It was formerly coextensive with the family, but is now restricted to such species as M. brasiliensis, M. ceruleiceps, the blue-headed sawbill, is the only member of its genus or family found Blue-headed Sawbill (Motacilla alba).

so far north as the Mexican border of the United States. Also Motacilla, Baryphonus, and Prionites. See motmot. Momus (mō'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. Mōpos, a personification of μῦθος, blame, ridicule.] 1. In classical myth., a son of Night, the god of railery and censure. He is said to have complained that the man made by Vulcan had not a window in his breast to let his thoughts be seen. 2. In ornith., a genus of humming-birds, of the family Trochilidae, the type of which is M. idalis of Brazil. Mulsant and Verreaux, 1866.—A disciple or a son (or daughter) of Momus, a facetious or funny person; a wag; a clown in a circus.

"I do not think that Wickam is a person of very cheerful spirits, or what one would call a ——" "A daughter of Momus," Miss Tox softly suggested. Dickens, Dombey and Son, viii.

mon¹, n. An obsolete form of moan¹. mon² (mon), n. A dialectal (especially Scotch) form of man. See man, and compare mun⁴. mon³, v. i. Same as moun. mon⁴ (mon), n. [Jap.] A personal crest, badge, or cognizance used in Japan and introduced into decoration of all sorts. For examples, see kikumon and kirimon.

mon-. See mono-. mona (mō'nā), n. [NL., < Sp. mona, a female monkey; that is, the mon of the see monkey.] An African monkey, Cercopithecus mona, of highly variegated coloration and docile disposition, often kept in captivity. See cut under Cercopithecus.

monacal¹, a. An obsolete spelling of monachal. monacanthid (mon-a-kan'thid), a. [Gr. μονακανθος, with one spine (see monacanthous) + -id².] Having uniserial adambulacral spines, as a starfish: distinguished from diplacanthid and polyacanthid.

Monacanthinae (mon'a-kan-thi'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Monacanthus + -inae.] A subfamily of balistoid fishes, typified by the genus Monacanthus. They have the anterior dorsal fin reduced to a single spine upon the head (whence the name), and have from 18 to 21 vertebrae (7 abdominal and 11 to 14 caudal). The subfamily includes a number of tropical and subtropical marine fishes, some of which are known as leather-jackets, on account of their villous coriaceous integuments.

monacanthine (mon-a-kan'thin), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Monacanthinae. II. n. A fish of the subfamily Monacanthinae.

monacanthous (mon-a-kan'thus), a. [Gr. μονακανθος, with one spine or prickly, < μῦθος, single, + ἀκανθα, a spine or prickly: see acantha.] Having but one spine; monacanthine.

Monacanthus (mon-a-kan'thus), n. [NL.: see monacanthous.] The typical genus of Monacanthinae, having a spine for a first dorsal fin. Cuvier, 1817. They are numerous in warm seas; M. occidentalis is West Indian, and is occasionally found on the southern coast of the United States.

Monacha (mon'a-kā), n. [NL., < Gr. μοναχός, single, solitary, < μῦθος, single: see monk.] 1. A genus of mollusks.—2. In ornith., same as Monasa. P. L. Sclater, 1882.

Monasa of Vieillot I have ventured to correct into Monacha. Sclater, Monog. Puffbirds, p. xi.

monachal (mon'a-kal), a. [Formerly also monacal; < OF. monachal, monacal, F. monacal = Sp. monacal = It. monacale, < ML. monachalis, of a monk, < LL. monachus, a monk: see monk.]

Of or pertaining to monks or nuns; belonging to or characteristic of monastic life, especially with reference to external relations or personal conduct; monastic; monkish: as, monachal morals; monachal austerity.

Robert de Brunne, to illustrate monachal morals, interspersed domestic stories; and . . . that rhyming monk affords the most ancient specimens of English tales in verse. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 208.

monachism (mon'a-kizm), n. [= F. monachisme = Sp. monaquismo = Pg. It. monachismo, < ML. monachismus, < LGr. μοναχισμός, monkery, < μοναχός, a monk: see monk.] 1. The principle of living in the manner of monks; the system or course of life pursued by monks and nuns; primarily, the practice of living alone in religious retirement from the world; religious seclusion; secondarily, the corporate life of religious communities under vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior. See monk.

The root-idea of monachism is . . . retirement from society in search of some ideal of life which society cannot supply, but which is thought attainable by abnegation of self and withdrawal from the world. This definition applies to all forms of monachism, . . . whether amongst Brahmins, Buddhists, Jews, Christians, Moslems, or the communistic societies of the present day, even when theoretically anti-theological. This broad general conception of monachism is differentiated in the following ways:—It may take the form of absolute separation, so far as practicable, from all human intercourse, so as to give the whole life to solitary contemplation—the anachoretic type; or it may seek fellowship with kindred spirits in a new association for the same common end—the cenobitic type; it may abandon society as incurably corrupt, as a City of Destruction out of which the fugitive must flee absolutely—the Oriental view, for the most part; or it may consider itself as having a mission to influence and regenerate society—which has been, on the whole, and with minor exceptions, the Western theory of the monastic life. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 608.

2. A monastic characteristic or peculiarity; also, such characteristics collectively.

Florence of Worcester, Huntingdon, Simeon of Durham, Hoveden, Mathew of Westminster, and many others of obscurer note, with all their monachisms. Milton, Hist. Eng., iv.

Monachus (mon'a-kus), n. [NL., < Gr. μοναχός, single, solitary, LGr. a monk: see monk.] 1. In mammal., a genus of Phocidae, having four incisors above and below; the monk-seals. There are 2 species. M. albiventer is the seal of the Mediterranean and Black Sea. M. tropicalis is the West Indian seal. Also called Pelagius and Heliophoca. 2. In ornith., a genus of warblers containing such as the common blackcap, Sylvia atricapilla. J. J. Kaup, 1829.—3. In entom., a large and important genus of leaf-beetles, erected by Suffrian in 1852. It is composed of small bluish beetles with or without red spots, and with the body very convex. There are about 100 species, all American, of which 6 belong to North America and the rest to more tropical regions.

monacid (mon-as'id), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, + E. acid.] Capable of saturating a single molecule of a monobasic acid: applied to hydroxids and basic oxids. monact (mon-akt'), a. and n. [Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀκρίς, a ray.] I. a. Having only one ray; monactinal. II. n. A monactinal sponge-spicule.

monactinal (mo-nak'ti-nal), a. [Gr. monactine + -al.] Single-rayed; uniradiate, as a sponge-spicule.

monactine (mo-nak'tin), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀκρίς (aktiv-), a ray.] Same as monactinal. Sollas.

Monactinellinae (mo-nak'ti-ne-li'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀκρίς (aktiv-), a ray, + dim. -ella + -inae.] A group, subordinal or other, of fibrosilicious or ceratosilicoid sponges, having comparatively little ceratode, the skeleton being mostly composed of single straight silicious spicules, whence the name. The bread-crumb sponge, Halichondria panicea, is a characteristic example. See Monaxonida.

monactinelline (mo-nak'ti-nel'in), a. Of or pertaining to the Monactinellinae.

monad (mon'ad), n. and a. [= F. monade = Sp. monada = Pg. monada = It. monade, < LL. monas (monad-), < Gr. μῦθος (monad-), a unit, unity, as adj. solitary, single, < μῦθος (Ionic μῦθος, Doric μῦθος, orig. μῦθός*), alone, solitary, single, sole, only; opp. akin to μία, fem. of εἷς (ēv-), one.] I. n. 1. In metaph., an individual and indivisible substance. The word was introduced into philosophy by Giordano Bruno to denote the minimum parts of substances supposed by him to be at once psychical and material. In the philosophy of Leibnitz the conception of the monad is that of an absolutely unextended substance existing in space, its existence consisting in its activities, which are ideas; and the universe was conceived by him as made up of such existences. The history of each monad follows an internal law, and all interaction between the monads is excluded; but there is a preestablished harmony between these laws for the different monads. (See Leibnitzian.) The Leibnitzian theory of the monad was, in many particulars, revived by Hermann Lotze.

Pythagoras his monads, so much talked of, were nothing else but corporeal atoms.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 18.

The soul is a monad (according to Bruno). It is never entirely without a body. God is the monad of monads; he is the minimum, because all things are external to him, and at the same time the maximum, since all things are in him. . . . The atoms of the ancients differed from one another in magnitude, figure, and position, but not qualitatively or in internal character. The monads of Leibnitz, on the contrary, are qualitatively differentiated by their ideas. All monads have ideas, but the ideas of the different monads are of different degrees of clearness. . . . God is the primitive monad; all other monads are its fulgurations. Ueberweg, Hist. Philos. (tr. by Morris), II. 27.

2. In biol.: (a) Any simple single-celled organism. The name covers a great many similar but not necessarily related unicellular organisms, some of which are monads in sense (b), others being plants; others again are free flagellate cells representing an embryonic condition of some other organism or of wholly indeterminate character. We are warranted in considering the body as a commonwealth of monads, each of which has independent powers of life, growth, and reproduction. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 493.

(b) In zool., specifically, a flagellate infusorian: one of the Infusoria flagellata, characterized by the possession of one or two long whip-like flagella, and generally exhibiting an endoplast and a contractile vacuole. The word in this sense is derived from the name of the genus Monas.—3. In chem., an element whose atoms have the lowest valence or atomicity, which valence is therefore taken as unity. II. a. In chem. and biol., of or pertaining to monads; of the nature of a monad; monadiform. Many monad metals give us their line spectra at a low degree of heat. J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 124.

There is reason to think that certain organisms which pass through a monad stage of existence, such as the Myxomycetes, are, at one time of their lives, dependent upon external sources for their protein matter, or are animals; and, at another period, manufacture it, or are plants. Huxley, Animal and Vegetable Kingdoms. monad-deme (mon'ad-dēm), n. [Gr. monad + deme².] A colony or aggregate of undifferentiated monads. Starting from the unit of the first order, the plastid or monad, and terming any undifferentiated aggregate a deme, we have a monad-deme. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 843.

monadelph¹ (mon'a-delf), n. [Gr. monadelph¹.] In bot., a plant whose stamens are united in one body or set by the filaments. monadelph² (mon'a-delf), n. [Gr. monadelph².] In zool., a member of that division of mammals in which the uterus is single.

Monadelphial¹ (mon-a-del'fi-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῦθος, alone, + -adelph¹, < ἀδελφός, brother: see adelph¹.] The name given by Linnaeus to his sixteenth class of plants, comprising those that have their stamens united into one set by their filaments.

Monadelphial² (mon-a-del'fi-ā), n. pl. An erroneous form for Monodelphia.

monadelphian (mon-a-del'fi-an), a. [Gr. monadelph¹ + -an.] Same as monadelphous. monadelphic (mon-a-del'fik), a. [Gr. monadelph¹ + -ic.] Pertaining to a family consisting of a single individual.—Monadelphic form, in math., a form belonging to a monadelphic type.—Monadelphic type, in math., a type containing a single numerical parameter.

monadelphon (mon-a-del'fon), n. [NL.: see Monadelphial¹.] In bot., an androecium of which the filaments are combined into a single column.

monadelphous (mon-a-del'fus), a. [Gr. monadelph¹ + -ous.] In bot., having the stamens united into one set by their filaments; belonging or relating to the class Monadelphia.

monadial (mō-nad'i-ā-ri), n.; pl. monadialries (-riz). [Gr. monadial¹, < LL. monas (monad-), a monad: see monad.] The common envelop of a colony of monads or monadiform infusorians.

monadic (mō-nad'ik), a. [Gr. μοναδικός, single, < μῦθος (monad-), a unit: see monad.] 1. Pertaining to monads; having the nature or character of a monad.—2. Single; not occurring in pairs. [Rare.] So, too, we have the seven openings of the head, the three twin pairs of eyes, ears, and nostrils, with the monadic mouth to make the seventh. J. Hadley, Essays, p. 342.

Monadelphous Flower.

monadical (mō-nad'ī-kāl), a. [< monadic + -al.] Same as monadic. Dr. H. More, Def. of Philosophic Cabbala, App., ix.

monadically (mō-nad'ī-kāl-i), adv. As a monad or unit; by oneness.

Every number subalists monadically in unity.

T. Taylor, Trans. of Plotinus (1794), Int., p. xxxix.

Monadidae (mō-nad'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < LL. monas (monad-) + -idae.] The monads proper, a family of flagellate infusorians. These animalcules are naked or illoricate, and entirely free-swimming, with the flagellum single and terminal, no distinct oral aperture, an endoplast or nucleus, and usually one or more contractile vacuoles. Also Monadella.

monadiform (mō-nad'ī-fōrm), a. [< LL. monas (monad-), a unit, + L. forma, form.] In biol., having the form or character of a monad; resembling a monad. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 96.

monadigerous (mon-a-dij'ē-rus), a. [< LL. monas (monad-) + L. gerere, carry: see -ger-, -gerous.] In zool., bearing or composed of monads or monadiform cells: as, the monadigerous layer of a sponge, which is the layer of cells lining the walls of the flagellated chambers of sponges. H. James Clark.

Monadina (mon-a-dī'nā), n. pl. [NL., < LL. monas (monad-) + -ina.] Ehrenberg's name of the monads or flagellate infusorians now called Monadidae.

monadine (mon'a-din), a. Of or pertaining to the Monadina or Monadidae; having the character of a monad. Carpenter, Micros., § 418.

Monadines (mon-a-din'ē-s), n. pl. [NL. (Cienkowski), < Gr. μῶνις (mōn-), a unit, + in- + -es.] An order of fungi of the class Myxomycetes. They are slimy plants growing in moist places, frequently parasitic, and produce zoospores, sporocysts, plasmodia, zoospores, and induring spores, the zoospores emitting at maturity one to many zoospores or amoeba-like bodies.

monadism (mon'a-dizm), n. [= F. monadisme = Sp. monadismo; as monad + -ism.] 1. A philosophical system which accepts, in some form, the theory of monads; also, a theory of monads.

Not unfrequently he [Leibnitz] introduces his theory of monadism by the argument that there must be simple substances since there are composite things, for the composite is only an aggregate of simple units.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 86.

2. The application of the conception of the monad to the solution of the problems of chemistry and physics; atomism.

Of the different forms of the atomic theory, that of Boecovich may be taken as an example of the purest monadism. Encyc. Brit., III, 37.

monadology (mon-a-dol'ō-jī), n. [= F. monadologie, < Gr. μῶνις (mōn-), a unit (see monad), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] In the philosophy of Leibnitz, the doctrine of monads; also, any similar metaphysical theory, as that of Lotze. See monad, 1.

Leibnitz's monadology may be a true system; but also it may not; and our faculties do not enable us to say whether it is or is not. Little Stephen, Eng. Thought, I, § 35.

Lotze, however, saves himself from a materialistic dualism through his monadology. Mind, XII, 589.

monal (mō-nāl'), n. Same as monaul.

monamine (mon'am-in), n. [< Gr. μῶνις, single, + E. amine.] One of a class of chemical compounds formed by substituting one or more alcohol radicals for the hydrogen in a single ammonia molecule. Monamines are primary, secondary, or tertiary, according as one, two, or three atoms of hydrogen are replaced.

monanapestic (mon-an-a-pes'tik), a. [< Gr. μῶνις, single, + ἀναπαιστος, anapest: see anapestic.] In anc. pros., containing but one anapest: not having certain logædic meters. See monodactylic.

monander (mō-nan'dēr), n. [< Gr. μῶνις, single, + ἀνδρ-, man, male (in mod. bot. stamen).] Cf. monandrous.] In bot., a plant having one stamen only.

Monandria (mō-nan'dri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῶνις, single, + ἀνδρ- (andōr-), man, male (in mod. bot. stamen).] The first class in Linnaeus's system of plants, comprehending all genera with perfect flowers having only one stamen.

monandrian (mō-nan'dri-an), a. [< Monandria + -an.] Same as monandrous.

monandrous (mō-nan'drus), a. [< Gr. μῶνις, single, + ἀνδρ- (andōr-), man, male.] In def. 2, cf. Monandria.] 1. In zool. and anthrop.: (a) Having one male or husband; living in monandry; monogamous, as a female. (b) Relating to monandry: as, a monandrous system or custom.—2. In bot., having a single stamen; belonging to or having the characters of the class Monandria.

monandry (mō-nan'dri), n. [< Gr. μῶνις, single, + ἀνδρ-, man, male.] The monandrous state; the practice of having only one husband.

Once introduced, monandry must necessarily spread in proportion as life becomes easier; for a man to have a wife to himself must be the respectable thing, and with this there will go a corresponding progress towards civilised ideas of conjugal fidelity. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p. 141.

monanthous (mō-nan'thus), a. [< Gr. μῶνις, single, + ἄνθος, flower.] In bot., producing but one flower: said of a plant or peduncle.

monarch (mon'ärk), n. [Early mod. E. monarke; < OF. (and F.) monarque = Sp. monarca = Pg. monarca = It. monarca, < LL. monarcha, < Gr. μονάρχης, monarchēs, ruling alone, a monarch, dictator, a sovereign (cf. μοναρχεῖν, rule alone), < μῶνις, alone, + ἀρχεῖν, rule.] 1. The chief of a monarchy; a supreme governor for life, entitled variously emperor (or empress), king (or queen), czar (or czarina), sultan, shah, etc.; primarily, a sole or autocratic ruler of a state, but in modern times generally a hereditary sovereign with more or less limited powers. See monarchy.

It [mercy] becomes

The throned monarch better than his crown.

Shak., M. of V., iv, 1, 189.

The Sovereign, if a single person, is or should be called a Monarch. Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 350.

2. Any possessor of absolute power or superiority; one who or that which holds a dominating or preëminent position, literally or figuratively: as, the oak is the monarch of the forest.

Come, thou monarch of the vine,

Plumply Bacchus with pink eye!

Shak., A. and C., II, 7 (song).

I am monarch of all I survey

My right there is none to dispute.

Cowper, Alexander Selkirk.

= Syn. 1. King, etc. (see prince), potentate, autocrat, despot.

Monarcha (mō-när'kä), n. [NL., < LL. monarcha, a monarch: see monarch.] An extensive genus of true flycatchers, of the family Muscicapidae, founded by Vigors and Horsfield in 1826. It contains about 25 species, especially characteristic of Australia, New Guinea, the Moluccas, and Polynesia. They are birds of brilliant and variegated coloration.

monarchal (mō-när'kal), a. [= It. monarca; as monarch + -al.] Of or pertaining to a monarch; befitting a monarch; sovereign.

The prince's persons being in all monarchal governments the very knot of the people's welfare.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, v.

Satan, whom now transcendent glory raised

Above his fellows, with monarchal pride,

Conscious of highest worth, unmoved thus spake.

Milton, P. L., II, 428.

monarchess (mon'är-kes), n. [< Monarch + -ess.] A female monarch; a queen or empress.

The monarchess of the four-corner'd earth.

Middleton, Solomon Paraphrased, viii.

Rome, what made her such a Monarchess, but only the adventures of her youth, not in riots at home, but in dangers abroad?

Capt. John Smith, Works, II, 197.

monarchia (mō-när'ki-ä), n. [LL.: see monarchy.] In theol., same as monarchy, 5.

monarchial (mō-när'ki-äl), a. [< LL. monarchia, monarchy (see monarchy), + -al.] Same as monarchical.

If all the evils which can arise among us from the republican form of our government, from this day to the day of judgment, could be put into a scale against what this country suffers from its monarchial form in a week, . . . the latter would be preponderate.

Jefferson, Correspondence, II, 205.

Monarchian (mō-när'ki-an), n. [= F. monarchien = Pg. monarchiano; < Gr. μοναρχίαν, monarchia, monarchy: see monarchy and -an.] One of a body of Antitrinitarian Christians in the latter part of the second and the third century. They were divided into two groups—the dynamic (dynamistic) or rationalistic Monarchians, who regarded Christ as filled with a divine power and denied his divinity, and the Patristic Monarchians, who regarded the Father and the Son as the same; the latter were called modalistic Monarchians, from their advocacy of a threefold mode or manifestation of the deity.

By monarchians of the former [dynamistic] class Christ was held to be a mere man, miraculously conceived indeed, but constituted the Son of God simply by the infinitely high degree in which he had been filled with Divine wisdom and power. Encyc. Brit., XVI, 719.

Monarchianism (mō-när'ki-an-izm), n. [< Monarchian + -ism.] The theological doctrine respecting the Godhead maintained by the Monarchians.

Modalistic monarchianism, conceiving that the whole fulness of the Godhead dwelt in Christ, took exception to the "subordinationism" of some church writers, and maintained that the names Father and Son were only two different designations of the same subject, the one God, who "with reference to the relations in which He had previously stood to the world is called the Father, but in reference to His appearance in humanity is called the Son." Encyc. Brit., XVI, 719.

monarchianistic (mō-när'ki-a-nis'tik), a. [< Monarchian + -istic.] Relating to or resembling the theory of the Monarchians.

Monarchianistic comparisons of Augustine.

Ueberweg, Hist. Philos. (trans.), I.

monarchic (mō-när'kik), a. [< F. monarchique = Sp. monárquico = Pg. monarchico = It. monarchico, < Gr. μοναρχικός, of a monarch or monarchical, < μῶνις, alone, + ἀρχικός, rule.] Relating or pertaining to a monarch or to monarchy; monarchical.

The monarchick and aristocratical and popular partisans have been jointly laying their axes to the root of all government.

Burke, Vind. of Nat. Society.

Without justice all forms, democratic or monarchic, are tyrannical alike. Froude, Cesar, p. 190.

monarchical (mō-när'ki-kāl), a. [< monarchic + -al.] 1. Pertaining to a monarch or to monarchy; characteristic of or subject to a monarch; of the nature of monarchy: as, monarchical rule or methods; a monarchical country or government.

Monarchical their State,

But prudently confined, and mingled wise

Of each harmonious power. Thomson, Liberty, iv.

In a monarchical state in which the constitution is strongest, the laws may be relaxed without danger.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, I.

It is not impossible that the political movements of our time, which seem on the surface to have a tendency to democracy, may have in reality a monarchical bias.

DIsraeli.

2. Of or pertaining to government by a monarch.

It was not the Monarchical way of Government that was so displeasing to God or Samuel; for their Government was of that Form already. Stillingfleet, Sermons, II, iv.

3. Regarding monarchy as the best form of government; adhering to the principles of monarchy. The name Monarchical party was often applied to the Federalists of the United States by their opponents.

Also monarchial.

= Syn. See prince and royal.

monarchically (mō-när'ki-kāl-i), adv. In the form of a monarchy, or in accordance with the principles or methods of monarchical government.

monarchise, monarchiser. See monarchize, monarchizer.

monarchism (mon'är-kizm), n. [< F. monarchisme = Sp. monarquismo; as monarch + -ism.] The principles of monarchy; love of or preference for monarchy.

monarchist (mon'är-kist), n. [< F. monarchiste = Sp. monarquista = Pg. It. monarchista; as monarch + -ist.] An advocate of or believer in monarchy; one who holds or maintains monarchical principles.

I proceed to examine the next supposition of the church monarchists, which is, That Saint Peter's primacy with its rights and prerogatives was not personal but derivable to his successors.

Burton, On the Pope's Supremacy.

There is no Frenchman, be he Republican or Monarchist, who does not feel this insult. Loze, Bismarck, II, 141.

monarchize (mon'är-kiz), v.; pret. and pp. monarchized, ppr. monarchizing. [= F. monarchiser; as monarch + -ize.] I. intrans. To play the king; act as a monarch.

Allowing him a breath, a little scene

To monarchize, be fear'd, and kill with looks.

Shak., Rich. II, III, 2, 165.

II. trans. 1. To rule over as a monarch.

By whom three sever'd Realms in one shall firmly stand,
As Britain-founding Brute first monarchized the Land.

Drayton, Polyolbion, v, 68.

2. To convert into a monarchy.

So far we shall be from mending our condition by monarchizing our Government, whatever new Concept now possesses us.

Milton, Free Commonwealth.

[In all senses obsolete or unusual.]

Also spelled monarchise.

monarchizer (mon'är-kī-zēr), n. One who plays the monarch, or upholds monarchy; a monarchist. Also spelled monarchiser. [Rare.]

Let the pride

Of these our irreligious monarchizers

Be crown'd in blood.

Heywood, Rape of Locrine, III.

Monandrous flower of Mare's - tall (Hippuris vulgaris) in the axil of the leaf.

1. monadiform endodermal cell of a sponge; 2. the amoebiform state of an endodermal cell of the same.

monarchy (mon'är-ki), n.; pl. monarchies (-kiz). [ME. monarchie = F. monarchie = Sp. monarquía = Pg. It. monarchia, < LL. monarchia, < Gr. μοναρχία, absolute rule, sole power, monarchy, < μόναρχος, a sovereign, monarch: see monarch.] 1. Supreme power wielded by a single person; absolute personal authority.

They imagined that he [Jesus] . . . should subdue the rest of the world, and make Jerusalem the seat of an universal monarchy. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 16.

But let us not deceive our selves, the pretensions are as high and as great at Rome to this Monarchy as ever they were. Stillington, Sermons, II. ii.

2. The principle of government by a monarch; the monarchical system.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approved, was the government of one ruling by just laws, called monarchy. Raleigh, Hist. World, I. ix. 2.

I hear there are people among you who think the experience of our governments has already proved that republican governments will not answer. Send those gentlemen here, to count the blessings of monarchy. Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 221.

3. A government in which the supreme power is either actually or nominally lodged in the hands of a monarch or sole ruler, who holds his position for life, generally with hereditary succession. There have been elective monarchies, in which the successor to a deceased sovereign was chosen without obligatory regard to the hereditary principle; but this principle has finally prevailed, to the exclusion of choice, in all existing civilized monarchies. The former kingdom of Poland was a purely elective monarchy. The German-Roman empire was originally, and always nominally, elective; but for many centuries the chosen successor was almost invariably the heir of the former emperor. An absolute or despotic monarchy is one in which the will of the monarch or sovereign is supreme over all other authority or powers of government; a limited or constitutional monarchy, one in which the sovereign is limited to the exercise of particular powers or functions by the laws or constitution of the realm. More or less limited monarchies have nearly always existed. About the fifteenth century a noteworthy increase of the power of the sovereign took place (as in England under Edward IV., in France under Louis XI., in Spain under Ferdinand and the Catholic and Charles V.). Till the close of the eighteenth century the prevalent theory and practice on the continent constituted nearly unrestricted absolutism; this has now almost disappeared from Europe, while still maintaining a foothold in Asia. But whether absolute or limited, the monarch is theoretically regarded as the source of all power, and all acts of government are done in his name.

The obvious definition of a monarchy seems to be that of a state in which a single person, by whatever name he may be distinguished, is intrusted with the execution of the laws, the management of the revenue, and the command of the army. But, unless public liberty is protected by intrepid and vigilant guardians, the authority of so formidable a magistrate will soon degenerate into despotism. Gibbon.

It has often indeed been noticed that a Feudal Monarchy was an exact counterpart of a Feudal Manor, but the reason of the correspondence is only now beginning to dawn upon us. Maupe, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 77.

4. The territory ruled over by a monarch; a kingdom; an empire.

What scourge for perjury
Can this dark monarchy afford false Clarence?
Shak., Rich. III., i. 4. 51.

5. In theol., the doctrine that there is in the Godhead only one principle (ἀρχή), cause (αἰτία), source or fountain (πηγή) of deity, namely God the Father, from whom the Son and the Holy Ghost derive their divinity. Also monarchia.—Fifth Monarchy Men. See 5th.

Monarda (mō-när'dä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named after N. Monardés, a Spanish physician and botanist of the 16th century.] A genus of labiate plants, type of the tribe Monardææ, characterized by the anthers having fifteen nerves, which is almost equally five-toothed. They are odoriferous erect herbs with entire or toothed leaves, and quite large flowers arranged in a few terminal or whorled heads, surrounded by many bracts, and varying in color, being bright-red, purple, white, and in one species pale-yellow. About 7 species are known, all natives of North America. M. punctata, the American horsemint, is stimulant and carminative. M. didyma, the Oswego tea, or bee-balm, has bright-scarlet flowers and is handsome in gardens.

Monardes (mō-när'dē-s), n. pl. [NL. (Benth, 1833), < Monarda + -es.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Labiata, characterized by having two perfect ascending stamens, in which one cell of each anther is either wanting or separated from the other. It embraces 11 genera, Monarda being the type, and about 490 species, the majority of which are widely scattered throughout the temperate and warmer regions of the earth.

monardin (mō-när'din), n. [< Monarda + -in.] A crystalline solid which separates from the oil of horsemint, Monarda punctata. It is isomeric with thymol.

monarsonous (mon'är'se-nus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀσπρ, male.] In zool., having but one male for several females.

monarticular (mon'är-tik'ü-lär), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. articulus, a joint: see articular.] In pathol., affecting a single joint.

monas (mon'äs), n. [NL., < LL. monas, a unit: see monad.] 1. A monad; a monadiform infusorian.—2. [cap.] The typical genus of Monadidae. M. lens is an example.—Monas prodigiosa, Bacillus prodigiosus. This microscopic organism forms short rods; it is not pathogenic, but is found on starchy substances, such as bread, rice, and potatoes, also on milk. It produces a red pigment, and it or the substances which it discolors are sometimes called blood-ruin, bleeding bread, bleeding host, and red milk.

Monasa (mon'a-sä), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), an error for Monacha: see Monacha.] A genus of South American barbets or puff-birds, of the family Bucconidae; the nun-birds or monases. There are seven species, of comparatively large size, with somber blackish plumage usually relieved with white on the face or wings, and coral-red bills, as M. nigra, M. morphna, and M. nigripennis. Also Monasta, Monaster, Monacha, Lypornis, and Scotocharia. See cut at nun-bird.

Monascidae (mon-a-sid'i-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, alone, + NL. Ascidae.] A superfamily group of tunicates, the Ascidae simplices; the sea-squirts; simple and either solitary or social ascidians.

monascidian (mon-a-sid'i-an), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. ascidian.] 1. a. Simple, as an ascidian; not composite or compound, as many ascidians are; of or pertaining to the Monascidae.

2. n. A member of the Monascidae; an ordinary sea-s squirt.

monase (mon'äs), n. [< F. monase, NL. Monasa: see Monasa.] A fissirostral barbet of the genus Monasa; a nun-bird.

monaster (mon-as'tër), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀστήρ, star.] In embryol., the original aster or single-star figure which occurs in the process of caryocinesis; the mother-star of the nucleolus distinguished from diaster or dyaster.

monasterial (mon-as-të'ri-äl), a. [= Sp. monasterial = It. monasteriale, < LL. monasterialis, of a monastery, < monasterium, a monastery: see monastery.] Of or pertaining to a monastery.

One of the bishops had been in solitary confinement in this monasterial prison 17 years.

The Century, XXXV. 56, note.

monasterially (mon-as-të'ri-äl-i), adv. Monasterially.

It is not the habit that makes the monk, many being monasterially accoutred who inwardly are nothing less than monachal.

Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, I., Author's Prol. (Davies.)

monastery (mon'as-te-ri), n.; pl. monasteries (-riz). [In early form minster, q. v.; = F. monastère = Sp. monasterio = Pg. mosteiro = It. monasterio = ÖBulg. monastyr, monostyr = Serv. manastir = Pol. monasterz = Hung. monostor (< Slav.), < LL. monasterium, < Gr. μοναστήριον, a solitary dwelling, in LGr. a monastery, cf. LGr. μοναστήριος, adj., Gr. μοναχός, a solitary, LGr. a monk, < μόνός, be alone, dwell alone, < μόνος, alone: see monad. Cf. monk, from the same ult. source.] A house or other place of residence occupied in common by persons seeking religious seclusion from the world: commonly applied to such a house exclusively used by monks. The term, however, strictly includes the abbey, the priory, the nunnery, and the friary, and in this broad use is synonymous with convent. Monasteries in the Christian church were probably first established in the fourth century. St. Benedict of Nursia in the sixth century established a monastic rule which has been the foundation of nearly all the rules which govern monastic vows. Vows under different rules were made from the beginning of Christianity. The number of monasteries in Europe was much diminished at the Reformation, when their rich estates were in part appropriated by sovereigns to their own use, and in part transferred to universities and other educational institutions, etc. We owe to the monasteries the first definite beginnings or revival of civilization in many countries, especially Germany and France, almost all the missionary work of the early middle ages, and the preservation of nearly all ancient classical and early medieval literature. The monastic life has been practised from pre-Christian times among the Buddhists. See rule.

The hypocrites hath loste their more than princely habitacions, theyr monasteries, conventes, hospitalles, prebendaries and chaunteries, with theyr fatte fedyng and warme couches, foryl gotten good wyl home agayne.

Bp. Bale, Image of the Two Churches, i.

Abbeville is a goodly faire Citie, . . . wherein . . . are many Monasteries of men and women.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 18.

The ancient Monastery's halls,
A solemn, huge, and dark red pile
Placed on the margin of the lake.

Scott, Marmion, II. 8.

The eastern monasteries, with the important exception of a vow of obedience, differed little from a collection of hermitages. They were in the deserts; the monks commonly lived in separate cells; they kept silence at their repasts; they rivalled one another in the extravagance of their penances. Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 121.

Mitered monastery. See miter.—Monasteries' Dissolution Acts, English statutes of 1536 and 1539, vesting in the king certain monasteries and other religious houses, and the rights and property belonging to them.

monastic (mō-nas'tik), a. and n. [< F. monastique = Sp. monástico = Pg. It. monastico, < LGr. μοναστικός, living in solitude, pertaining to a monk, < μοναστής, a monk: see monastery.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to or characteristic of monks or nuns; ascetic: as, monastic life, vows, or practices.

The clergy, and the monastic orders especially, had been good farmers. Stubbs Const. Hist., § 464.

2. Adapted to or suitable for monks or nuns; of ascetic character or use: as, monastic buildings or architecture; monastic seclusion.

To forswear the full stream of the world, and to live in a nook merely monastic. Shak., As you Like it, III. 2. 442.

The grounds of the villa, raised on the ancient walls of the monastic precinct, look down at once on the waves of Hadria. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 298.

3. An epithet noting a style of book-decoration in which medieval forms of compact ornament are strongly stamped on the sides or back of the book without any use of gold-leaf.—Monastic bishop, in the ancient Celtic churches of Ireland and Scotland, and sometimes in other countries in the earlier middle ages—(a) an abbot who was also a bishop; or (b) a monk consecrated bishop, resident in a monastery, and exercising his office in confirmations, ordinations, etc., but without jurisdiction.—Monastic vows, the vows imposed under monastic rule. They are three in number, poverty, chastity, and obedience.

II. n. A monk; a religious recluse.

An art . . . preserved amongst the monastics.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 143.

It seems plain that the treble value was intended specially to protect the new monastics in their tithes by heightening the peril of disputing them.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

monastical (mō-nas'ti-kal), a. [< monastic + -al.] Same as monastic.

monastically (mō-nas'ti-kal-i), adv. In a monastic manner; in a retired manner; after the manner of monks. Swift.

monasticism (mō-nas'ti-sizm), n. [< monastic + -ism.] 1. The corporate life of religious communities under the vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior; the monastic system or condition.

It may be questioned whether anything but monasticism could have kept the church and clergy free from the political combinations and dangers of the early time.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 84.

2. The condition or state of living like a monk, in religious retirement from the world.

In older Anglo-Saxon Britain monasticism itself had but seldom aspired either to the dreamy quietude of the East or the passionate and excessive austerity of the West: it was a religious profession, no more.

Mūman, Latin Christianity, vii. 1.

monasticon (mō-nas'ti-kon), n. [< LGr. μοναστήριον, neut. of μοναστήριος, monastic: see monastic.] A book relating to or describing monasteries.

monatomic (mon-a-tom'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἄτομος, atom: see atomic.] Having the same valence or atomicity as hydrogen, represented by unity.

monaul (mō-nāl'), n. [Also monal, manaul, minaul; E. Ind.] A pheasant; specifically, an impeyan, or pheasant of the genus Lophophorus, and especially L. impeyanus. See cut under Impeyan pheasant.

The magnificent Monauls, Lophophorus.

monaulos (mō-nā'los), n.; pl. monauli (-i). [L., also monaulus, < Gr. μόναυλος, a single flute, < μόνος, single, + αὐλός, pipe, flute.] A Greek flute or flageolet consisting of a single pipe or reed, as opposed to the dioulos, or double flute.

Monaulus (mō-nā'lus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < monaul.] A genus of Phasianidae; the monauls: same as Lophophorus.

monaural (mon-ā'ral), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. auris = E. ear: see aural.] 1. Having only one ear.—2. Referring to or involving the use of a single ear.

Direction cannot be appreciated by monaural observation. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 87.

monaxial (mon-ak'si-al), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. axis, axis: see axial.] Having but one axis; uniaxial.

monaxon (mon-ak'son), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἄξων, axis: see axon.] 1. a. Having one axis, as a sponge-spicule; monaxial. Also monaxonal.

II. n. A sponge-spicule of the group Monaxonida.

Monaxonida (mon-ak-sō'ni-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ἄξων, axis.] Monaxon or uniaxial sponge-spicules, having one straight or curved axis.

monaxonal (mon-ak-sō'ni-al), a. [< monaxon + -al.] Same as monaxon.

monaxonic (mon-ak-sō'ni-k), a. [< monaxon + -ic.] Having but one axis; uniaxial.

A spherical (monaxononic) or cone-shaped (monaxononic) perforated shell of membranous consistence known as the central capsule. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 849.

Monaxonida (mon-ak-sō'ni-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Monaxonida + -ida.] A suborder of sponges, of the order Chondrospongia, having monaxon spicules or being without supporting skeleton, the spicules stylolite and usually situated radially. It includes such families as Tethyidae, Sollasellidae, Spirastrellidae, Suberamatidae, and Suberitidae. Lendenfeld.

monaxite (mon-ā'zit), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μονάξις, be solitary: see monastery.] A phosphate of the cerium metals, usually containing some thorium silicate. It is a rare mineral, occurring in small brownish-red or yellowish-brown monoclinic crystals, also massive with resinous luster, and is found at Norwich in Connecticut, in North Carolina, among the Urala, and elsewhere. It is a prominent accessory constituent of granitic rocks in some localities, and when these rocks have been disintegrated by natural causes it has been (as in North Carolina and Brazil) obtained, by washing the gravels, in very large quantities.

monchet, v. An obsolete form of munch.

monck, n. An obsolete spelling of monk.

Moncrieff gun-carriage. See gun-carriage.

Monday (mun-dē), n. [< ME. Monday, Monendæg, < AS. mōnandæg, rarely contr. mōndæg (= OFries. mōnendei, mōnadei = D. maandag = MLG. māndach, manendach = OHG. mānetac, MHG. māntac, G. montag = Icel. mānadr = Sw. māndag = Dan. mandag), Monday, lit. monet, n. A Middle English form of money.

monet, v. i. Same as monet. 2.

monetian, monetious, etc. See monetian, etc.

monet, n. A Middle English form of monk.

monetaker, n. A Middle English form of money-maker. York Plays, Int., p. xxi.

monembryary (mon-em'brī-ā-ri), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἐμβρυον, an embryo: see embryo and -ary.] Having a single embryo.

monet-plust, n. pl. An obsolete variant of munpins.

moner (mō'nēr), n. [< NL. moneron, q. v.] An organism having the form of a non-nucleated protoplasmic body, in which no definite structure can be discerned. The moners consist of indifferent protoplasm containing no nucleus or endoplast, and thus are conveniently, if not naturally, distinguished from the higher series of protozoans known as Endoplastica.

Monera (mō-nē'rā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of moneron.] 1. Haeckel's name of a class of protozoans of the simplest possible characters. The Monera are apparently structureless particles of protoplasm, agreeing with other rhizopods in protruding pseudopods, but differing from the normal amoeboids in lacking any recognizable nucleus. Unlike foraminifers, they form no shell. The group is provisional, and perhaps hypothetical. The name is that of a legitimate biological conception; but since it is by no means certain that every moner is not a stage or state of a somewhat more definitely organized rhizopod, the group so named has no assured zoological standing. The Monera are sometimes nominally divided into Gymnomonera and Lepomonera, the former of which are always naked, while the latter may acquire a cell-wall. Also Monerozoa.

2. [l. c.] Plural of moneron.

moneral (mō-nē'ral), a. [< Monera + -al.] Same as moneran.

moneran (mō-nē'ran), a. and n. [< Monera + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to a moner, or to the Monera. Also moneric, moneral.

II. n. A moner or moneron.

monergism (mon-ēr-jizm), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἐργον, = E. work (see erg), + -ism.] In theol., the doctrine that the Holy Spirit is the only efficient agent in regeneration—that the human will possesses no inclination to holiness until regenerated, and therefore cannot cooperate in regeneration.

moneric (mō-nē'rik), a. [< Monera + -ic.] Same as moneran. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 394.

moneron (mō-nē'ron), n.; pl. monera (-rā). [NL., irreg. < Gr. μόνηρος, single, solitary, < μόνος, single (see monad), + ἀπαρίσκειν (√ ap), join, fit (cf. διήρη, doubly fitted).] A moner.

Each individual living particle of this structureless mass (protoplasm) is called a Moneron.

Haeckel, Evolution of Man (trans.), II. 81.

To put his [Haeckel's] views into a few words, he conceives that all forms of life originally commenced as monera, or simple particles of protoplasm, and that these monera originated from not-living matter. Huxley.

Monerozoa (mō-nē-rō-zō'zā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνηρος, single, solitary (see moneron), + ζῶον, an animal.] Same as Monera. Haeckel.

monerozoan (mō-nē-rō-zō'an), a. and n. [< Monerozoa + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Monera or Monerozoa.

II. n. A moner or moneron.

monerozoic (mō-nē-rō-zō'ik), a. [< Monerozoa + -ic.] Same as monerozoan. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 473.

monerula (mō-ner'ū-lā), n.; pl. monerulae (-lā). [NL., dim., < Gr. μόνηρος, single, solitary: see moneron.] In embryol., a name given by Haeckel to a supposed non-nucleated stage of an impregnated ovum, when it has the form-value of a simple cytode, or moner. It is supposed that the nucleated ovum, immediately upon fecundation by spermatozoa, undergoes retrogressive metamorphosis, loses its nucleus, and becomes a mere mass of protoplasm; that then a new nucleus is formed, in the formation of which the spermatic protoplasm takes part; and that thereupon the ovum resumes its form-value of a nucleated cell as a cytula, having been a monerula in the interval between the loss of the original nucleus and the acquisition of the new one. The word is one of a series, other members of which are cytula, morula, blastula, and gastrula.

Moneses (mō-nē'sēz), n. [NL. (Salisbury, 1821), prob. so named on account of the pretty and solitary flower; < Gr. μόνος, alone, + ἡσος, delight.] A genus of plants of the natural order Ericaceae and the tribe Pyroleae, characterized by spreading petals, by the capsule opening upward from the base, and by solitary flowers. There is but a single species, M. uniflora, the one-flowered pyrola, which is a small perennial with rounded and veiny serrate leaves and a scape bearing a white or rose-colored flower. It is a native of middle and northern Europe, the colder parts of America, and Japan.

monesia (mō-nē'siā), n. [Origin uncertain.] A vegetable extract thought to be derived from the bark of Chrysophyllum glycyphloeum, exported from Brazil in hard thick cakes. It seems to have some stomachic, alterative, and astringent properties.—Monesia bark. See Chrysophyllum.

monesin (mō-nē'sin), n. [< monesia + -in.] An acid principle obtained from monesia, and considered identical with saponin.

monet, v. t. A Middle English form of monish.

monetarium (mon-e-tā'ri-um), n. [ML.] Same as moneyage, 2.

monetarily (mon'-or mun'-e-tā-ri-li), adv. As regards monetary affairs; from a monetary point of view; financially.

monetary (mon'-or mun'-e-tā-ri), a. [= F. monétaire = Sp. monetario = Pg. monetario, moedeiro = It. monetario, pertaining to money, < L. monetarius, pertaining to the mint; as a noun, a mint-master, a minter; < moneta, mint, money: see money. Cf. minter, ult. < L. monetarius.] 1. Pertaining to money; consisting of money.—2. Financial.—Monetary chain, a chain of precious metal each link of which is of definite weight or value: such links were formerly used as money.—Monetary unit, the unit of currency. In the United States this is the gold dollar, having a standard weight of 25.8 grains. The unit is the pound in the British empire, the franc in France, the mark in Germany.

moneth, monethly. Obsolete forms of month, monthly.

monetization (mon'-or mun'-e-ti-zā'shon), n. [= F. monétisation; as monetize + -ation.] The act of monetizing; the act or process of giving something the character of money or of coining it into money: as, the monetization of silver.

monetize (mon'-or mun'-e-tiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. monetized, ppr. monetizing. [< L. moneta, money (see money), + -ize.] To give the character of money to; legalize as money; coin into money.

money (mun'i), n. [Formerly also mony, monie; < ME. moneye, monye, monye, < OF. monete, monnoie, monnoye, F. monnaie = Pr. Sp. moneda = Pg. moeda = It. moneta, < L. moneta, a mint, money: see mint, which is also ult. from L. moneta, and thus a doublet of money.] 1. Coin, or, more strictly, current coin; stamped metal that may be given in exchange for commodities; gold, silver, or other metal, stamped by public authority and used as the medium of exchange: in this sense used only collectively.

Forthe thei went alle three

To pay the scheperde his mond.

MS. Cantab. Fl. v. 48, l. 53. (Halliwel.)

Every man also gave him a piece of money. Job lxii. 11.

2. In a wider sense, any article of value which is generally accepted as a medium of exchange; also, by extension, something which, though possessing little or no intrinsic value, is recognized and accepted as a substitute for money as above defined, such as paper money; any circulating medium of exchange. Money is adopted for the sake of convenience to facilitate the exchange of one kind of wealth for another and as a standard of value. Its common form is that of a stamped metallic currency; but in primitive times, among uncivilized peoples, and under special conditions by civilized people, many other articles have been used as money. Bank-notes, greenbacks, gold and silver certificates of the United States government, etc., all representing coin, are called paper money, and are used for convenience instead of the coin.

itself. Money in this sense is not often used in the plural, unless to indicate sums of money or different systems of money or coinage. See def. 4.

Importune him for my moneys. Shak., T. of A., II. 1. 16.

Every lady should meet her lord,
When he is newly come frae sea;
Some wif' hawks, and some wif' hounds,
And other some wif' gay monies.

The Knight's Ghost (Child's Ballads, I. 210).

What moneys I have is at your disposing; and upon twelve I will meet you at the palace with it.

Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, II. 2.

There are several different sorts of paper money; but the circulating notes of banks and bankers are the species which is best known, which seems best adapted for this purpose.

Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, II. II.

Money is bought and sold like other things, whenever other things are bought and sold for money. Whoever sells corn, or tallow, or cotton, buys money.

J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III. viii. § 2.

Our ancestors in Maryland and Virginia, before the revolutionary war, and for some time after, in default of gold and silver, used tobacco as money, made it money by law, reckoned the fees and salaries of government officers in tobacco, and collected the public taxes in that article.

Cyc. of Pol. Sci., II. 879.

Money is the medium of exchange. Whatever performs this function, does this work, is money, no matter what it is made of, and no matter how it came to be a medium at first, or why it continues to be such.

Walker, Pol. Econ., III. III. 144.

With the aid of money all the difficulties of barter disappear; for money consists of some commodity which all people in the country are willing to receive in exchange, and which can be divided into quantities of any amount. Almost any commodity might be used as money in the absence of a better material. In agricultural countries corn was so used in former times.

Jevons, Pol. Econ., p. 104.

3. Property, in whatever form, which is readily convertible into or serves the same purposes as money as above defined; available assets; wealth: as, a man of money.

The moneys on this molde that men so faste holden,
Tel me to whom that treasour appendeth?

Piers Plowman (A), I. 43.

Money can neither open new avenues to pleasure, nor block up the passages of anguish.

Johnson.

Money, taken in the largest sense, as the representative of all kinds of property, is one of the greatest means of human education.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 266.

4. The currency of any country or nation; a denomination or designation of value, whether represented in the coinage or not: in this sense also used in the plural: as, English money; the weights and moneys of different nations; a money of account.

For right als that boght thesre tre
For thirty penis of thaire moné,
So war that sold to thaire enemy
Euer thirty lewis for a peny.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 89.

Words are the tokens current and accepted for conceits, as moneys are for values.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 235.

5. A way or line of investing money. [Colloq. or vulgar.]

I sell dry fruit, sir, in February and March, because I must be doing something, and green fruit's not my money then.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 66.

Acknowledgment money. See acknowledgment.—Added money. See add.—Bent money, bowed money, a coin purposely bent and given as a love-token, or in certain cases used as a votive offering. Such coins seem to have been bent to prevent their use as money.

I beseeche him my rope of bowed nobles that I hang my great whistle containing CCC angels.

Will of Sir Edward Howard, 1512, in Archaeologia, [XXXVIII. 870.

Cargo money or Guinea money, a peculiar species of porcelain shell used as money in Guinea.—China money the name given (in the provincial form chany or "chaine" money) to tokens of porcelain issued by the Pinxton China Works in East Derbyshire. They were oval, plano-convex in section, and bore on the convex side their value in large figures, as 5s., 7s. See china-token.—Coat-and-conduit money. See coat.—Conscience money. See conscience.—Covered money, a technical phrase used in United States legislation and administration for money which has been deposited in the Treasury in the usual manner, and which can be drawn out only to pay an appropriation made by Congress.—Creation money, effective money, fairy money. See the qualifying words.—Flat money, paper currency issued by a government as money, but not based on coin or bullion; paper currency containing no promise to pay coin, and therefore not convertible into coin. [Colloq.]

This overflowing deluge of flat money alarmed and dissipated the old-fashioned gold and silver coins of our progenitors.

The Century, XXXVI. 768.

Fiddler's money. See fiddler.—For love or money. See love.—For money, for cash: on the stock exchange, in the case of a contract for money, the securities sold are transferred immediately to a designated name, and the broker for the buyer pays for them: distinguished from for the account (which see, under account).—For my money, to my mind; what I prefer.

A horn for my money. Shak., Much Ado, II. 3. 63.

Guinea money. See cargo money.—Hammered money. See hammer.—Hard money, metallic money; coin. [U. S.]

I du believe hard coin the stuff
Fer' lectioners to spout on;
The people's ollers soft enough
To make hard money out on.

Lowell, Biglow Papers, 1st ser., vi.

Imprest money. See imprest.—Kimmeridge-ool money, small circular pieces of shale two or three inches in diameter and a quarter of an inch thick, bearing the marks of having been turned in a lathe, found near Smedmore in the parish of Great Kimmeridge, in Dorset, England, in the soil, two or three feet from the surface.

It is considered probable that the Kimmeridge coal-money may be simply the refuse from which rings or armlets have been turned in a lathe, or they may be the bases of vases or bowls.

H. B. Woodward, Geol. of Eng. and Wales, 2d ed., p. 336.

Lawful, lucky, maundy, milled money. See the qualifying words.—Money makes the mare go. See mare.—Money of account. See account.—Money of necessity. See necessity.—Money on call. See call.—Paper money. See def. 2.—Pot of money, a large amount of money; a heavy sum. [Colloq.]—Present money. Same as ready money.

I am not furnish'd with the present money.

Shak., C. of E., iv. 1. 34.

Ready money, money paid or ready to be paid at the time a transaction is completed; cash: also used adjectively: as, a ready-money purchase.

Hee is your slave while you pay him ready Money, but if hee once befriended you, your Tyrant, and you had better deserve his hate then his trust.

Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Shop-keeper.

Let's e'en compound, and for the Present Live,
Tis all the Ready Money Fate can give.

Conley, Fingering Ode, viii. 6.

Right money, money paid as the condition or consideration of acquiring a right to the purchase of lands.

As no right money is to be paid for these lands, and quit-rent of two shillings sterling a hundred, demandable some years hence only, it is highly presumable that they will always be held upon a more desirable footing than where both these are laid on with a very heavy hand.

Washington, quoted in H. B. Adams, Washington's Interest in Western Lands.

Soft money, paper money. [Slang, U. S.]—To coin money. See coin.—Token money. See token.—To make money, to gain or procure money; become rich.—To take eggs for money. See egg.—Value of money. See the quotation.

It will be well to deal with a use of the phrase value of money which has led to much confusion. In mercantile phraseology the value of money means the interest charged for the use of loanable capital. Thus, when the market rate of interest is high, money is said to be dear, when it is low, money is regarded as cheap. Whatever may be the force of the reasons in favour of this use, it is only mentioned here for the purpose of excluding it. For our present subject, the value of a thing is what it will exchange for; the value of money is what money will exchange for, or its purchasing power. If prices are low, money will buy much of other things, and is of high value. The value of money is inversely as general prices, falling as they rise and rising as they fall.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 721.

White money, silver coin; also, coin of base metal imitating silver.

Here's a seal'd bag of a hundred; which indeed
Are counters all, only some sixteen groats
Of white money I' the mouth on't.

Beau. and Fl., Wit at Several Weapons, II. 1.

(See also earnest-money, head-money, light-money, pin-money, ship-money.)—Syn. 1 and 2. Money, Cash. Money was primarily minted metal, as copper, brass, silver, gold, but later any circulating medium that took the place of such coins: as, wampum was used as money in trade with the Indians; paper money. Cash is ready money, primarily coin, but now also anything that is accepted as money: it is opposed to credit.

Mongol (mong'gol), n. and a. [= F. Mongol = Ar. Pers. Hind. Mughal (> E. Mogul), < Mongolian Mongol. Said to be ult. < mong, brave.]

I. n. One of an Asiatic race now chiefly resident in Mongolia, a vast region north of China proper and south of Siberia, forming a possession of China. Mongols are also found elsewhere in the Chinese empire and in Siberia, etc. The Mongols in the thirteenth century conquered a large part of Asia and overran eastern Europe. See Mogul.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Mongolia or the Mongols.

Mongolian (mong-gō'li-an), a. and n. [< Mongol + -ian.] I. a. Same as Mongol.—Mongolian race, the second in Blumenbach's classification of the races of mankind. The chief characteristics are—an oblong skull flattened at the sides, broad cheek-bones, low retreating forehead, short and broad nose, and yellowish complexion. It included the Chinese, Turks, Tartars, Indo-Chinese, Lapps, Eskimos, etc.—Mongolian subregion, in zoogeog., a subdivision of the great Palearctic region, stretching eastward from the Caspian Sea to include most if not all of Japan, and lying south of the Siberian subregion; but its boundaries are not well defined. In ornithology this subregion has more peculiar genera than any other one of the Palearctic subdivisions.

II. n. 1. Same as Mongol.—2. By extension, a Chinese, or member of the Mongolian race (according to Blumenbach's classification).—3. The language of the Mongols, a branch of the Ural-Altaic family. It has three principal dialects—Kalmuck, East Mongolian, and Buriatic.

Mongolic (mong-gol'ik), a. [= It. Mongolico; as Mongol + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Mongols; Mongolian.

Mongolidae (mong-gol'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mongol + -idae.] The Mongols and races regarded as akin to them, according to the classification of certain authorities.

Mongoloid (mong-gō'li-oid), a. and n. [< Mongol (Mongolian) + -oid.] I. a. Resembling the Mongols; having Mongolian characteristics.

II. n. One having physical characters like those of the typical Mongols (including Chinese, Japanese, etc.). Huxley.

Mongoloid (mong'gō-loid), a. and n. [< Mongol + -oid.] Same as Mongoloid.

mongoo, mongoo (mong'-, mung'gō), n. [Also written mongoose, mongooz, mongouz, mongoz, monguz, moongus, mungoose, etc.; F. mongouz, NL. specific name mongooz; < Telugu mangieu, Marathi mangus, a mongooz.] 1. A common ichneumon of India, Herpestes griecus. Being easily domesticated, it is kept in many houses in Hindustan to rid them of reptiles and other vermin, as rats, mice, etc. It has been said that it neutralizes the poison of snakes, which it fearlessly attacks, by eating during its contests with them, the Ophiophiza Mungoo, but its immunity is really due to the extreme celerity of its movements. It is of a gray color, specked with black, and about the size of a cat. The name is commonly extended to all the related ichneumons of the subfamily Herpestinae, of which there are several genera and many species; and also to some of the Vesertinae. All these belong to one family, Vesertidae. See Herpestes, and cut at ichneumon.

2. A species of lemur or maki, Lemur mongoz, having a white color and the tail not ringed: also called mongoos lemur. See maki.

mongrel (mung'grel), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also mongrel, mongril, mongrill, moungrel; < late ME. mengrell for mengerel, mongerel, < mang, mong, a mixture (see *mong¹), + -erel, a double dim. (-er⁴, -el²), as in cockerel, pickerel, etc.] I. n. 1. An individual or a breed of animals resulting from repeated crossing or mixture of several different varieties; the progeny of varieties, and especially of artificial varieties, as distinguished from the hybrid, or cross between two different species (but the distinction is not always observed).*

This greater variability in mongrels than in hybrids does not seem at all surprising. For the parents of mongrels are varieties, and mostly domestic varieties, . . . and this implies that there has been recent variability, which would often continue and be added to that arising from the act of crossing. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 261.

2. Specifically, a dog of mixed breed.

Hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs, Shoughs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves are clept All by the name of dogs. Shak, Macbeth, III. 1. 38.

The Ounce or wild Cat is as big as a Mongrel. S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 33.

3. Anything of mixed breed; anything that is a mixture of incongruous elements.

They say they are gentlemen,
But they shew mongrels. Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, IV. 1.

Dioclesian the Emperor bestowed Elephantina and the parties adjoining on the Beni and Nobata, whose Religion was a mongrell of the Greekish, Egyptian, and their own. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 589.

His two faculties of serving-man and solicitor should compound into one mongrel. Milton, Colasterion.

II. a. Of a mixed or impure breed; begotten or made up of different kinds: usually in a disreputable sense.

There is a mongrel dialect, composed of Italian and French, and some Spanish words are also in it; which they call Franco. Howell, Forreine Travell, p. 53.

Monimia (mō-nim-i-ē), n. [NL. (Du Petit-Thouars, 1804), suggested by its affinity to a genus previously named Mithridatea, < L. Monima, < Gr. Moviva, wife of Mithridates.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, type of the natural order Monimiaceae and of the tribe Monimieae. It is characterized by globose dioecious flowers, the staminate becoming split into four to six lobes, by numerous stamens, each bearing two glands at its base, and by the fruit, which consists of several very small one-seeded drupes inclosed within the enlarged perianth. Three species are known, natives of the Mascarene Islands. They are shrubs with rigid opposite leaves, and very small flowers, closely clustered in the axils. Fossil plants of this genus occur in the Tertiary formations of Europe and of Australia, and closely allied forms, called Monimiopeis, at the very base of that formation in France and in the Fort Union group on the Yellowstone river in Montana.

Monimiaceae (mō-nim-i-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Monimia + -aceae.] A natural order of dicotyledonous plants of the apetalous series Micrembryae, typified by the genus Monimia. It is characterized by a globose or cup-shaped perianth, toothed or deeply divided at the border, by numerous stamens covering the perianth, and by having several or many distinct ovaries, each with a single ovule, a minute embryo, and copious fleshy albumen. The order includes about 22 genera and 150 species, natives of the warmer parts of South America, Asia, and the South Pacific Islands. They are trees, shrubs, or rarely climbers, generally aromatic, with rigid opposite leaves and small flowers, in axillary or sometimes terminal clusters, which are shorter than the leaves. Several furnish wood for building and cabinet-work, or leaves used as a tonic or an aromatic seasoning.

Monimieae (mon-i-mī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1809), < Monimia + -eae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Monimiaceae, of which Monimia is the type. It is characterized by having pendulous ovules, and anthers opening by a longitudinal fissure (instead of uplifting valves as in the other tribe of the order, Atherospermae). It includes 8 genera, natives of tropical America, Australia, and adjacent islands, with one genus in Africa.

monimostylic (mon'i-mō-stī'lik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, lasting, stable, + στήλος, pillar.] Having the quadrate bone fixed, as a skull: correlated with autostylic and hyostylic.

moniam (mon'izm), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, +

-ism.] 1. Any system of thought which seeks to deduce all the varied phenomena of both the physical and spiritual worlds from a single principle; specifically, the metaphysical doctrine that there is but one substance, either mind

(idealism) or matter (materialism), or a substance that is neither mind nor matter, but is the substantial ground of both: opposed to dualism. The term was applied by Wolf, its inventor, to the forms of the doctrine which were then known, namely, to the denial of the substantiality either of mind or of matter; but it is now extended to the doctrine that the distinction between physical and mental facts is only phenomenal, and that in themselves they are not distinguished.

Many special modifications of monistic speculation, especially on its materialistic side, have accompanied the recent developments of physical science, particularly the doctrine of evolution. (See quotation from Haeckel under monistic.) Such doctrines as that energy, electricity, etc., are categories of substance different from matter are not taken account of by those who use the term, so that it is not easy to say whether they would be considered as denials of monism or not. Also called unitism and unitarianism.

Monism led a miserable existence in philosophical dictionaries, until, as a denotation of the Hegelian philosophy, it obtained a very wide use. It had again in some measure fallen out of use when it was taken up by modern natural philosophy, and made the watchword of a doctrine which considers mind and matter neither as separated nor as derived from each other, but as standing in an essential and inseparable connection.

M. S. Phelps, tr. of Eucken's Fundamental Concepts, p. 114.

If the essence of the materialist hypothesis be to start with matter on its lowest terms, and work it thence up into its highest, I did it no wrong in taking "homogeneous extended solids" as its specified datum and its only one; so that it constituted a system of monism.

J. Martineau, Materialism (1874), p. 108.

2. Any theory or system which attempts to explain many heterogeneous phenomena by a single principle.

The solution offered by Psychophysical Monism, that functional brain-motion and feeling are two aspects of one and the same fact in nature—this solution, when closely examined, turns out to be an altogether dualistic and unthinkable assertion. E. Montgomery, Mind, ix. 366.

3. In biol., same as monogenesis (c).—Hylozoistic monism. Same as hylæozism.—Idealistic monism, the monism which regards the single principle of the universe as mind or spirit, of which matter is the product.—Materialistic monism, the monism which regards the single principle as matter, of which mind or spirit is the product.

monist (mon'ist), n. and a. [< mon(ism) + -ist.] 1. n. An adherent of the metaphysical doctrine of monism in some one of its forms.

The philosophical unitarians or monists reject the testimony of consciousness to the ultimate duality of the subject and object in perception, but they arrive at the unity of these in different ways. Some admit the testimony of consciousness to the equipoise of the mental and material phenomena, and do not attempt to reduce either mind to matter, or matter to mind. They reject, however, the evidence of consciousness to their antithesis in existence, and maintain that mind and matter are only phenomenal modifications of the same common substance. This is the doctrine of absolute identity—a doctrine of which the most illustrious representatives among recent philosophers are Schelling, Hegel, and Cousin. Others again deny the evidence of consciousness to the equipoise of subject and object as coördinate and original elements; and, as the balance is inclined in favor of the one relative or the other, two opposite schemes of psychology are determined. If the subject be taken as the original and genetic, and the object be evolved from it as its product, the theory of idealism is established. On the other hand, if the object be assumed as the original and genetic, and the subject be evolved from it as its product, the theory of materialism is established. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., xvi.

II. a. Same as monistic.

monistic (mō-nis'tik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + -istic.] Of or pertaining to monism; of the nature of monism. See monism and monist.

Idealism is monistic in its whole conception of the universe. It claims to be a "one-substance" theory, although it should in consistency call itself a "no-substance" theory instead. Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV. 103.

The opponents of the doctrine of evolution are very fond of branding the monistic philosophy grounded upon it as "materialism," by confusing philosophical materialism with the wholly different and censurable moral materialism. Strictly, however, our monism might, as accurately or as inaccurately, be called spiritualism as materialism. The real materialistic philosophy asserts that the vital phenomena of motion, like all other phenomena of motion, are effects or products of matter. The other, opposite extreme, spiritualistic philosophy, asserts, on the contrary, that matter is the product of motive force, and that all material forms are produced by free forces entirely independent of the matter itself. Thus, according to the materialistic conception of the universe, matter or substance precedes motion or active force. According to the spiritualistic conception of the universe, on the contrary, active force precedes matter. Both views are dualistic, and we hold both of them to be equally false. A contrast to both views is presented in the monistic philosophy, which can as little believe in force without matter as in matter without force. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), II. 466.

Cf. monastery and minster, from the same source.] 1. Originally, a man who retired from the world for religious meditation and the practice of religious duties in solitude; a religious hermit; in later use, a member of a community or fraternity of men formed for the practice of religious devotions and duties, and bound by the vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior; specifically, a regular male denizen of a monastery. Communities of a more or less monastic character in Palestine and Egypt before the diffusion of Christianity were the Essenes and Therapeutae (which see). The ordinary Christian life of the first three centuries, even when not celibate, was largely ascetic and in communities. Christian monasticism in a definite form originated in Upper Egypt in the third or fourth century (perhaps with St. Anthony; according to other accounts it is traced to the ascetic Paul, about A. D. 250). The first monks were anchorites, living in solitude. The collection of anchorites in a monastery (laure or cenobium) is ascribed to Pachomius, in the fourth century. The institution spread rapidly, and was greatly helped in the West by the establishment of the Benedictine order in the sixth century. Various developments of the monastic system are to be found in the middle ages, as the military orders, friars (often distinguished from monks proper), etc. Since the Reformation, and especially since the French revolution, monachism has declined in Western countries, or has been overshadowed by the society of Jesuits, but still continues to flourish in Eastern churches.

simian; any one of the Primates except man and the lemurs; an ape, baboon, marmoset, etc. The term is very vague, and has no technical or fixed restriction. Those monkeys which have very short tails and faces are commonly called apes, most of them belonging to the higher family Simiidae. The monkeys with long faces like dogs are usually termed baboons; they are at the bottom of the series of Old World simians, in the family Cynopithecidae. The small bushy-tailed monkeys of America are usually known as marmosets. Excluding these, the name monkey applies mainly to long-tailed simians of either hemisphere. All the Old World monkeys, in any sense of the word, are catarrhine, and have 32 teeth, as in man. They constitute two families, Simiidae and Cynopithecidae. (See cuts under Cercopithecus, Catarrhina, and Diana, 2.) All the New World monkeys are platyrrhine: there are two families, Cebidae, with 36 teeth and mostly prehensile tails, and Atelidae or marmosets, with 32 teeth and bushy non-prehensile tails. (See cuts under Cebina, Eriodina, and Lagothrix.) The genera of monkeys are about 35 in number, including several that are fossil. The species are particularly numerous in Africa and South America, especially in the tropical parts. There are many, however, in the warmer parts of Asia, and even up to the snow-line; a single one is found in Europe, the Barbary ape, Inuus caudatus. (See cut at ape.) Almost all the leading species have specific names in the vernacular as well as their technical scientific designations.

The strain of man's bred out Into baboon and monkey.

Shak., T. of A., I. 1. 280.

2. An epithet applied to any one, especially to a boy or girl, in either real or pretended disapproval: sometimes expressing endearment.

Now God help thee, poor monkey! But how wilt thou do for a father?

Shak., Macbeth, IV. 1. 59.

Help your companions, but don't talk religious sentiment to them; and serve the poor, but, for your lives, you little monkeys, don't preach to them.

Ruskin, Letter to Young Girls.

3. A pile-driving instrument with two handles, raised by pulleys, and guided in its descent so as to cause it to fall on the head of a pile and drive it into the ground; a fistuca; a beetle-head.—4. A sort of power-hammer used in ship-building for driving bolts, composed of a long pig of iron traversing in a groove, which is raised by pulleys, and let fall on the spot required.—5. A small crucible used in glass-making.—6. A certain sum of money: in the United States, $500; in Great Britain, £500: used especially in betting. [Slang.]

A monkey at least to the credit side of your own book landed in about a minute and a half.

Whyte Melville, Good for Nothing.

The Grand Hurdle Handicap, the added money to which is a monkey. Daily Chronicle, Feb. 3, 1885. (Encyc. Dict.)

7†. A kind of bustle formerly worn by women. See the quotation.

The monkey was a small "bustle," which in the days of very short waists was worn just below the shoulder blades. N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 498.

8. Same as water-monkey.

In the front room a monkey and two tumblers stood on the center table.

Oliver Schreiner, Story of an African Farm, II. 8.

9. A fluid composed of two parts of chlorhydric acid (generally called spirits of salt by workmen) and one part of zinc, used in soldering. It is applied to the joints to be soldered, and acts both to prevent oxidation when heat is applied and to dissolve any oxide which may have already formed, and which would otherwise prevent the adherence of the solder.—Gibbaltar monkey. Same as Barbary ape (which see, under ape).—Leonine monkey, masked monkey, etc. See the adjective.—Monkey's allowance. See the quotation. [Humorous.]

You fellows worked like bricks, spent money, and got midshipman's half-pay (nothing a day, and find yourself) and monkey's allowance (more kicks than half-pence).

Kingsley, Letter, May, 1856. (Davies.)

Monkey's dinner-bell. See Hura.—Mustache monkey, negro monkey, etc. See the qualifying words.—Silky monkey. Same as maritima.—To have or get one's monkey up, to have one's temper roused; get angry. [Slang.]—To suck the monkey. (a) To suck wine or spirits from a cask through an inserted tube or straw. (b) To drink rum or other liquor. [Nautical slang.]

Jack will suck the monkey, in whatever form or wherever he presents himself.

Macy.

"Do you know what sucking the monkey means?" "No, sir." "Well then, I'll tell you; it is a term used among seamen for drinking rum out of cocoanuts, the milk having been poured out and the liquor substituted."

Murray, Peter Simple, xxx.

monkey (mung'ki), v. [< monkey, n.] I. intrans. To act in an idle or meddlesome manner; trifle; fool: as, don't monkey with that gun. [Colloq.]

I hope he'll fetch money. I've had enough o' monkeying 'long o' checks.

Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 468.

II. trans. To imitate as a monkey does; ape. [Rare.]

All cursed the doer for an evil
Called here enlarging on the Devil,
There monkeying the Lord.

Mrs. Browning, Tale of Villafranca, st. 8.

monkey-apple (mung'ki-ap'l), n. The West Indian tree Clusia flava.

monkey-bag (mung'ki-bag), n. A small bag used by sailors for holding money, hung round the neck by a string.

monkey-block (mung'ki-blok), n. Naut., a small swivel-block used as a leader for running rigging.

monkey-board (mung'ki-börd), n. The conductor's footboard on an omnibus. Hoppe. [Slang, Eng.]

monkey-boat (mung'ki-böt), n. A half-decked narrow boat used in docks and on rivers. [Eng.]

monkey-bread (mung'ki-bred), n. The fruit of the baobab-tree; also, the tree itself. The fruit is an oblong indehiscent capsule, 8 to 12 inches long, containing numerous seeds embedded in a pulp, which is slightly acid, and edible by man as well as by the monkey. See baobab and Adansonia.

monkey-cup (mung'ki-kup), n. A plant of the genus Nepenthes.

monkey-engine (mung'ki-en'jin), n. A form of pile-driver having a ram or monkey working in a wooden frame. The monkey is held by a staple in a pair of tongs which seize it automatically, and is raised by means of a winch. The tongs open and drop the monkey when their handles come in contact with a couple of inclined planes at the top of the lift.

monkey-flower (mung'ki-flou'ér), n. A plant of the genus Mimulus.

monkey-gaff (mung'ki-gaf), n. A small gaff placed on some large merchant ships above the spanker-gaff, for displaying the flag.

monkey-grass (mung'ki-gräs), n. A coarse stiff fiber afforded by the leaf-stalks of Attalea funifera: used largely on the Amazon for cordage and brooms, and in London and Paris for the brushes of street-sweeping machines.

monkey-hammer (mung'ki-ham'ér), n. A drop-press in which the weight, sliding in guides, is suspended from a cord by which it is raised and let fall. Also called monkey-press.

monkeyism (mung'ki-izm), n. [< monkey + -ism.] An action or behavior like that of a monkey. [Rare.]

Numerous passages . . . might be quoted (from comedies and satirical journals), attacking the monkeyism and parrotism of those who indiscriminately adopted foreign manners and customs. D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 412.

monkey-jacket (mung'ki-jak'et), n. A short close-fitting coat or jacket, generally made of stout material, as pilot-cloth, much worn by sailors in cold weather; a Guernsey frock.

monkey-pot (mung'ki-pot), n. See Lecythis.—Monkey-pot tree, the tree bearing the monkey-pot fruit.

monkey-press (mung'ki-pres), n. Same as monkey-hammer.

monkey-pump (mung'ki-pump), n. Naut., a straw or quill introduced through a gimlet-hole into a wine- or spirit-cask, for the purpose of sucking the liquor.

monkey-puzzle (mung'ki-puz'l), n. The Chili pine, Aracaria imbricata.

monkey-rail (mung'ki-räl), n. Naut., a light rail raised about half a foot above the quarter-rail of a ship.

monkey's-face (mung'ki-z-fäs), n. A plant of the genus Mimusops.

monkey-shine (mung'ki-shin), n. A trick or prank like a monkey's; buffoonery; tomfoolery; monkeyism. [Slang, U. S.]

You may have noticed barefooted boys cutting up monkey-shines on trees with entire safety to themselves. A. R. Grote, Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 435.

monkey-spar (mung'ki-spär), n. Naut., a reduced mast or yard for a vessel used for the training and exercise of boys.

monkey-tail (mung'ki-täl), n. Naut.: (a) A short round lever formerly used for training caronades and for like purposes. (b) A piece of rope with a knot at the end, seized to the back of a hook, used as a handle in attaching the hook, to prevent the hand from being jammed.

monkey-wheel (mung'ki-hwöl), n. A tackle-block over which runs a hoisting-rope; a whip-gin, gin-block, or rubbish-pulley.

monkey-wrench (mung'ki-rench), n. In mech., a screw-key with a movable jaw, which can be adjusted, by a screw or wedge, to the size of the nut which it is required to turn. Weale.

monk-fish (mung'ki-fish), n. 1. The angel-fish, Squatina angelus.—2. The angler, Lophius piscatorius. [Maine.]

monkhood (mung'ki-hüd), n. [< monk + -hood.] 1. The character or condition of a monk.

He had left off his monkhood too, and was no longer obliged to them. Bp. Atterbury.

2. Monks collectively.

I think the name of Martin Luther alone sufficient to relieve all monkhood from the reproach of laziness. Longfellow.

monking† (mung'king), a. [< monk + -ing².] Monkish: a term of contempt.

Monasteries and other monking receptacles. Coleridge.

monkish (mung'kish), a. [< monk + -ish¹.] Like a monk; pertaining to monks or to the monastic system; monastic: often a term of contempt: as, monkish manners; monkish solitude.

monkishness (mung'kish-nes), n. The quality of being monkish: a term of contempt.

monkly (mung'ki-li), a. [< monk + -ly¹.] Relating to a monk; monkish. [Rare.]

monk-monger† (mung'ki-mung'gér), n. A fosterer of monasticism.

Never age afforded more pluralist bishops. . . . Oswald (a great monk-monger, of whom hereafter) held York and Worcester. Fuller, Ch. Hist., II. v. 2.

monk-seal (mung'ki-säl), n. A seal of the genus Monachus.

monk-seam (mung'ki-säm), n. Same as monk's-seam.

monk's-gun (mung'ki-gun), n. The wheel-lock gun of the beginning of the sixteenth century: so called from the legend that it had been invented by the monk Schwarz, the supposed discoverer of gunpowder.

monk's-harquebus (mung'ki-här'kwe-bus), n. Same as monk's-gun.

monk's-hood (mung'ki-hüd), n. A plant of the genus Aconitum, especially A. Napellus. Also called friar's-cap, foxbane, helmet-flower, Jacob's-chariot, and wolf's-bane. See Aconitum and aconite.

monk's-rhubarb (mung'ki-rö'bärb), n. A European species of dock, Rumex Patientia. See dock¹.

monk's-seam (mung'ki-säm), n. 1. Naut., a seam formed by stitching through the center of a joining made by laying the selvages of two cloths of canvas one over the other and stitching them on both sides. Also called middle stitching.—2. The mark left on a bullet by the mold at the junction of its two halves. [Eng.] Also monk-seam.

monmouth (mon'muth), n. A flat cap originally made at Monmouth, England, formerly much worn by seamen.

Caps which the Dutch seamen buy, called monmouth caps. De Vos, Tour through Great Britain, II. 539. (Davies.)

Monmouth cock. A fashion of wearing the flap-hat imitated from the Duke of Monmouth, son of Charles II., and still prevailing in the early part of the eighteenth century.

The smartest of the country Squires appear still in the Monmouth Cock, and when they go a wooing, whether they have any post in the militia or not, they generally put on a red coat. Spectator, No. 128.

Monmouth hat. A hat worn with a Monmouth cock.

monnet† (mon'et), n. See the quotation.

Little ears denote a good understanding, but they must not be of those ears which, being little, are withal deformed, which happens to men as well as cattle, which for this reason they call monnets; for such ears signify nothing but mischief and malice.

Swunders, Physiognomie (1653). (Nares.)

mono (mō'nō), n. [Sp. mono, m., a monkey; cf. mona.] The black howler or howling monkey, Myceles villosus.

mono-. [L., etc., mono-, < Gr. μόνος, stem of μόνος, single, only: see monad.] A prefix in many words of Greek origin or formation, meaning 'single,' 'one.'

monocaxal (mon-ō-ak'sal), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. axis, axis: see axal.] Pertaining to a single axis.—Monocaxal isotropy, the case in which the homotactic coefficients are completely isotropic round one axis only.

monobasic (mon-ō-bä'sik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + βάσις, base.] Having one base: applied in chemistry to an acid which enters into combination with a univalent basic radical to form a neutral salt, or a salt containing one equivalent of a base.

monoblastic (mon-ō-blas'tik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + βλαστός, germ.] Relating to that condition of the metazoic ovum or embryo which immediately succeeds segmentation, in which a single germinal layer is alone represented: correlated with diploblastic and triploblastic.

Monoblepharides (mon-ō-blef'ä-rīd'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Monoblepharis (-id-) + -ēs.] A monotypic order of oömycetous fungi, closely related to the Peronosporæ. The thallus-hyphae bear both terminal and interstitial oögones, in which the whole protoplasm contracts and forms the oöspere. Propagation takes place by the formation of uniloculated zoöspores in zoösporangia, as in the well-known genus Phytophthora.

Monoblepharis (mon-ō-blef'ä-ris), n. [NL. (Cornu), < Gr. μόνος, single, + βλέπω, eyelid.] A genus of fungi, typical of the order Monoblepharides.

monoblepsis (mon-ō-blep'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + βλέπω, sight, < βλέπεν, see, look on.] In pathol., a condition of vision in which it is more distinct when one eye only is used.

Foliage, Fruit and Flower of Monkey-bread Tree (Adansonia digitata).

monobrachius (mon-ō-brā'ki-us), n.; pl. monobrachii (-i). [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + L. brachium, the arm.] In teratol., a monster having a single arm.

monobromated (mon-ō-brō'mā-ted), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. brom(ine) + -ate + -ed.] Containing one bromine atom: used only of organic compounds in which one atom of bromine has been introduced into each molecule by substitution or addition.—Monobromated camphor. See camphora monobromata, under camphor.

monobromized (mon-ō-brō'mīzd), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + brom(ine) + -ize + -ed.] Same as monobromated. Nature, XL, 539.

monocarbonate (mon-ō-kār'bō-nāt), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. carbonate.] A carbonate in which both hydrogen atoms of the acid are replaced by basic elements or radicals: distinguished from bicarbonates, in which only one hydrogen atom is so replaced. More appropriately called normal carbonate.

monocarp (mon-ō-kārp), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., a plant that perishes after having once borne fruit; an annual plant.

monocarpellary (mon-ō-kār'pe-lā-ri), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. carpel + -ary.] Composed of one carpel. Compare polycarpellary.

monocarpic (mon-ō-kār'pik), a. [< monocarp + -ic.] Same as monocarpous (a.).

monocarpous (mon-ō-kār'pus), a. [< monocarp + -ous.] In bot.: (a) Producing fruit but once in its life: said of annual plants. (b) Noting a flower in which the gynoecium forms only a single ovary, whether simple or compound.

Monocaulidae (mon-ō-kā'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monocaulis + -idae.] A family of tubularian hydroids or gymnoblastic Hydroida, typified by the genus Monocaulis, having a simple hydrosoma with a single fixed hydranth.

Monocaulis, Monocaulus (mon-ō-kā'lis, -lus), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + καύλος, a stalk, stem: see caulis.] The typical genus of Monocaulidae. M. pendula is a simple tubular hydromedusa with a single hydranth pendulous upon the nodding or cernuous stem, and bearing two circlets of tentacles. It is of very soft, delicate structure and pink color, attaining a length of 4 inches. Also Monocaulos.

monocellular (mon-ō-sel'ū-lār), a. [< monocellule + -ar.] Same as unicellular. Nature, XII, 148.

monocellule (mon-ō-sel'ūl), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. cellule.] A unicellular organism; an animal or a plant which consists of a single cell.

monocentric (mon-ō-sen'trik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κέντρον, center: see centric.] 1. Having or proceeding from a single center.—2. In anat., unipolar: applied to a rete mirabile which is not gathered again into a single trunk: opposed to amphicentric.

Monocentridae (mon-ō-sen'tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monocentris + -idae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Monocentris. They have the body covered with large angular bone-like scales, the head rounded and cavernous, a spinous dorsal fin separate from the soft dorsal and composed of 5 large spines divergently and not completely connected by membrane, and the ventrals represented only by very large spines. There is but one species, Monocentris japonicus of the Japanese seas.

Monocentris (mon-ō-sen'tris), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κέντρον, point, center: see center.] The typical genus of Monocentridae, characterized by the great development of the ventral spines. Bloch and Schneider, 1801. Also Monocentrus.

monocephalous (mon-ō-sef'a-lus), a. [< NL. monocephalus, < Gr. μονοκέφαλος, one-headed, < μόνος, single, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. Having only one head; in bot., bearing a single capitulum or head.—2. Specifically, having the character of a monocephalus.

monocephalus (mon-ō-sef'a-lus), n.; pl. monocephali (-li). [NL.: see monocephalous.] In teratol., a double monster having only one head but two bodies. Also called syncephalus.

monocercous (mon-ō-sēr'kus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κέρκος, the tail of a beast: see cercus.] Having only one "tail," or flagellum; unflagellate, as an infusorian.

monoceros (mō-nōs'ē-rōs), n. [< L. monoceros, < Gr. μόνος, single, + κέρας, horn.] 1. A unicorn, or some other one-horned animal, real or imaginary.

Mighty Monoceroses with immeasured tails.

Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 23.

2. [cap.] A constellation, the Unicorn, south of the Twins and the Crab, and between the two Dogs, introduced by Jacob Bartsch in 1624.—3. The narwhal, Monodon monoceros.—4. [cap.] In zool.: (a) A genus of prosobranchiates of the family Muricidae, so called from the large spine on the outer lip; the unicorn-shells. There are several species from the west coast of America. Lamarck, 1809. (b) A genus of balistoid fishes. Bloch and Schneider, 1801.

monoceros (mō-nōs'ē-rus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κέρας, one-horned: see monoceros.] Having one horn or horn-like part; unicorn.

monochasial (mon-ō-kā'si-al), a. [< monochasium + -al.] In bot., pertaining to or resembling a monochasium.

monochasium (mon-ō-kā'si-um), n.; pl. monochasia (-ia). [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + χάσις, separation, chasm, < χαίρειν, gape: see chasm.] In bot., a cyme with one main axis; a uniparous cyme: a term proposed by Eichler.

Monochitonida (mon-ō-kī-ton'i-dā), n. pl. [NL. (cf. Gr. μονοχίτων, wearing only a tunic), < Gr. μόνος, single, + χίτων, a tunic (see chiton); + -ida.] A division of tunicaries or Tunicata, containing those which have the inner and outer integuments united in a single tunic, such as the Salpidae and Doliolidae: opposed to Dichitonida. Fleming, 1828.

monochitonidan (mon-ō-kī-ton'i-dan), a. and n. 1. a. Having a single tunic; specifically, pertaining to the Monochitonida, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Monochitonida, as a salp or doliolid.

Monochlamydeae (mon-ō-kla-mīd'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1819), fem. pl. of monochlamydeus: see monochlamydeus.] A division of dicotyledonous plants, characterized by apetalous flowers—that is, flowers with a perianth of a single row of envelopes—and so distinguished from the divisions Polypetales and Gamopetales, which have two rows, or both calyx and corolla; the Apetales. It includes 36 orders, among them the amaranth, chenopod, buckwheat, pepper, laurel, euphorbia, nettle, walnut, oak, and willow families.

monochlamydeous (mon-ō-kla-mīd'ē-us), a. [< NL. monochlamydeus, < Gr. μόνος, single, + χλαμύς (χλαμύς), a cloak: see chlamys.] In bot., having a single instead of a double perianth: applied to flowers. The missing set is considered to be the inner, or corolla. Compare achlamydeous and diachlamydeous. See Monochlamydeae.

monochord (mon-ō-kōrd), n. [= F. monocorde = Sp. Pg. monocordio = It. monocordo, < L.L. monochordos, monochordon, < Gr. μόνος, single, + χορδή, string.] An acoustical instrument, invented at a very early date in Egypt or Greece, consisting of a long resonance-box over which a single string of gut or wire is stretched, the vibrating length, and thus the pitch, of which is fixed by a movable bridge. The position of the bridge required to produce particular intervals may be mathematically determined, and marked on the body of the instrument. The monochord has been much used in acoustical demonstration and in teaching pure intonation. In the middle ages smaller instruments with several strings were made, and were often permanently tuned to give certain intervals. (See heliom (a).) The notion of a primitive keyboard-instrument doubtless sprang from some such beginning.

monochroic (mon-ō-krō'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + χρῶμα, color.] Having but one color; monochromatic.

monochromatic (mon-ō-krō-mat'ik), a. [= F. monochromatique = Pg. monochromático, < Gr. μονοχρόματος, of one color, < μόνος, single, + χρῶμα (-r), color: see chromatic.] Consisting of light of one wave-length, and in that sense of one color only, as the light produced by a Bunsen flame in which sodium is being volatilized. The light of the flame is almost entirely that due to the two sodium lines, the colors of which are barely distinguishable from one another, and the consequence is that objects viewed by this light are all yellow, and differ only in form and illumination. A monochromatic light gives a single bright line when viewed with the spectro-scope.

monochrome (mon-ō-krōm), n. [= F. monochrome = Pg. monochroma, < ML. monochroma, Monoceros imbricatus.

fem. of L. monochromos, < Gr. μόνος, single, + χρῶμα, color.] Painting or a painting in one color, which may, however, be relieved by the use of lighter and darker shades. Compare camaiën and grisaille.

monochromical (mon-ō-krō'mi-kal), a. [As monochrom(at)ic + -al.] Of a single color; one-colored.

monochromy (mon-ō-krō-mi), n. [As monochrome + -y.] The art or practice of painting in monochrome, or in one or more shades of a single color.

Monochromy is advantageously employed when it is desired, on the one hand, to avoid the brilliancy attendant on the introduction of several distinct colours, and, on the other, the dullness consequent on the exclusive use of a single tone. O. N. Rood, Modern Chromatics, p. 310.

monochronic (mon-ō-kron'ik), a. [< LL. monochronos, of the same time or measure, < Gr. μόνος, single, + χρόνος, time.] Of one and the same time; existing or happening at the same time; contemporaneous; in geol., deposited, or apparently deposited, at the same period: said of organic remains.

monochronous (mō-nōk'rō-nus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + χρόνος, of the same time or measure: see monochronic.] In anc. pros., consisting in or equal to one time or mora; monosemic.

monociliated (mon-ō-sil'i-ā-ted), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. cilium + -ate + -ed.] Having one cilium or flagellum; unciliate or unflagellate.

monocle (mon-ō-kl), n. [= OF. monocle, one-eyed, F. monocle, a single eye-glass, < LL. monoculus, one-eyed: see monoculous.] 1. A monoculous or one-eyed animal; a monocle.—2. A glass for one eye; a single eye-glass.

Another [man], with a monocle in his eye, watched each new comer, his vacant and necessarily glassy stare expressing neither present pleasure nor anticipation. The Century, XXXIII. 208.

Monocleae (mon-ō-klē'ē), n. [NL. (W. J. Hooker, 1820), so called because the sporangia open only on one side; < Gr. μόνος, single, + κλέειν, a key.] A monotypic genus of cryptogamous plants of the class Hepaticae, giving name to the order Monocleaceae. They are small plants with frondose thallus, and have much the appearance of Marchantia.

Monocleaceae (mon-ō-klē'ē-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Nees von Esenbeck, 1833-8), < Monoclea + -aceae.] A small order of cryptogamous plants of the class Hepaticae, intermediate in position between the Jungmanniaceae and the Anthocerotaceae. The vegetative structure is either thalloid or foliose; the sporangium dehisces longitudinally, and contains elaters, but has no columella. The order contains the genera Calobryum and Monoclea.

monoclinial (mon-ō-klī-nal), a. and n. [< monocline + -al.] 1. a. In geol., dipping in one direction: said of a zone of stratified rocks throughout which the strata all incline toward the same point of the compass. The term was introduced by H. D. Rogers (1842), and has taken the place of Darwin's hybrid word unifacial: thus, monoclinial valley (a valley bounded by ridges the strata of which all dip in the same direction); monoclinial ridge; monoclinial flexure, etc. A monoclinial flexure may be regarded as a half of an anticlinal fold, which would have been completed had the flexing action not been limited to one side of the axis, the strata resuming their horizontality on the other side.

The Echo-Cliff flexure, the Water-Pocket flexure, one of the grandest monoclinals of the west, and the San Rafael flexure, all monoclinial flexures of imposing dimensions and perfect form. Capt. Dutton considers go far back in Tertiary time, and possibly are pre-Tertiary. Heade, Origin of Mountain Ranges, p. 250.

II. n. A monoclinial fold or flexure. See I. monocline (mon-ō-klī-nāt), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίειν, incline, + -ate.] Same as monoclinic.

monocline (mon-ō-klīn), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίειν, incline: see cline.] Same as monoclinial.

monoclinic (mon-ō-klīn'ik), a. [= F. monoclinique; < Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίειν, incline.] In mineral., an epithet noting that system of crystallization in which the crystals are referred to three unequal axes, two of which intersect each other at an oblique angle, while they are at right angles to the third. See crystallography. Also monosymmetric, clinorhombic, hemiorthotype, monoclinometric, and monoclinohedric.

monoclinohedric (mon-ō-klī-nō-hed'rik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίειν, incline, + ἔδρα, seat, base.] Same as monoclinic.

monoclinometric (mon-ō-kli-nō-met'rik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίνειν, incline, + μέτρον, measure.] Same as monoclinic: as, "monoclinometric prisms," Frey.

monoclinous (mon-ō-kli-nus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίνειν, incline: see clinic.] 1. In bot., hermaphrodite, or having both stamens and pistils in the same flower. —2. In geol., monoclinous.

Monocelia (mon-ō-sē'li-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κελία, a cavity, hollow: see celia.] Animals whose encephalocoele is single, neuron epaxial only, and axon unsegmented. The lancelet (Branchiostoma) is the only example. Synonymous with Aerania, Cephalochorda, Leptocardia, and Monocaularia. Wüder, Amer. Nat., Oct., 1887, p. 914.

monocellian (mon-ō-sē'li-an), a. [< Monocelia + -an.] Having the encephalocoele single; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monocelia.
mono-compound (mon-ō-kom'pound), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + Ε. compound.] In chem., a compound containing one atom of the element or one individual of the radical specified, as monochloroacetic acid, which contains one atom of chlorine, and monophenylamine, which contains one molecule of phenyl.

Monocondyla (mon-ō-kon'di-lā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κόνδυλος, a knuckle, joint, knob: see condyle.] The Reptilia and Aves (reptiles and birds) collectively: so called from the single occipital condyle characteristic of these classes among the higher vertebrates. The term indicates a group exactly conterminous with Sauropsida. Opposed to Amphicondyla.

monocondylar (mon-ō-kon'di-lār), a. Same as monocondylarian.

monocondylarian (mon-ō-kon'di-lār-i-an), a. [As Monocondyla + -ian.] Having one occipital condyle, as the skull of birds, reptiles, and some fishes: distinguished from dicondylarian.

monocotyledon (mon-ō-kot-i-lē'don), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κοτύληδον, a hollow, a sucker, etc.: see cotyledon.] A monocotyledonous plant; an endogen. See endogen, and cut under cotyledon.

Monocotyledones (mon-ō-kot-i-lē'don-ēz), n. pl. [NL. (Ray, 1703), < Gr. μόνος, single, + κοτύληδον, a cup-shaped cavity: see cotyledon.] A natural class of flowering plants, having a single seed-leaf or cotyledon in the embryo. They have generally the parts of their flowers in threes (not in fives, as in dicotyledons), their earliest leaves alternate, and the veins parallel. From the structure of the stem, increasing by internal or endogenous growth, they are also called endogens. The wood of their stems occurs in longitudinal bundles of fibers, scattered, as in Indian corn, or becoming compact, as in palms. New bundles of fibers form between the old, not, as in dicotyledons or exogens, in an annual external layer enveloping the stem. The class is divided into 34 orders, among which are the lily, iris, amaryllis, orchid, banana, palm, pineapple, screw-pine, arum, rush, sedge, and grass families. By Bentham and Hooker these are classed in seven groups or series; by others in three, the spadiaceous, petaloidaceous, and glumaceous divisions. About 20,000 species are known, included in about 1,500 genera.

monocotyledonous (mon-ō-kot-i-lē'don-us), a. [< monocotyledon + -ous.] In bot., having only one seed-leaf or seminal leaf.

monocracy (mō-nok'rā-si), n.; pl. monocracies (-siz). [< LGr. μονοκρατία, sole dominion, < Gr. μόνος, single, + κρατειν, rule, < κράτος, strength.] Government or rule by a single person; autocracy.

A scene of wholesale bacchanalian fraud, a posse comitatus of liars, which would disgust any man with a free government, and make him sigh for the monocracy of Constantinople. Sydney Smith, Ballot. (Latham.)

monocrat (mon-ō-krat), n. [< MGr. μονοκράτωρ, a sole ruler; < Gr. μόνος, single, + κρατειν, rule, < κράτος, strength.] 1. One who governs alone; an autocrat. —2. In U. S. hist., a name often applied by opponents to a member of the Federalist party, to which monarchial tendencies were imputed.

monocular (mo-nok'ū-lār), a. [= F. monoculaire, < LL. monoculus, one-eyed: see monocu- lous.] 1. Having only one eye. Also monocular. —2. Of or referring to one eye or vision with one eye; suited or intended for the use of one eye only. —Monocular microscope. See microscope.

monocularly (mo-nok'ū-lār-li), adv. By means of one eye; so as to be seen by one eye only.

No one who has only thus worked monocularly can appreciate the guidance derivable from binocular vision.

W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 32.
monoculate (mo-nok'ū-lāt), a. [As monocul- (ar) + -ate.] Same as monocular, 1.

monocule (mon-ō-kūl), n. [< NL. Monoculus.] A member of the genus Monoculus.

monoculite (mo-nok'ū-lit), n. [< LL. monoculus, one-eyed (see monoculus), + -ite.] A fossil animal that appears to have but one eye.

monoculous (mo-nok'ū-lus), a. [= OF. monocle, monoculo = It. monocolo, < LL. monoculus, one-eyed, < Gr. μόνος, single, + L. oculus, eye: see oculus. Cf. monocle.] One-eyed; monocular.

Dr. Knox was the monoculous Waterloo surgeon, with whom I remember breakfasting.

O. W. Holmes, The Atlantic, LIX, 638.

Monoculus (mo-nok'ū-lus), n. [NL., < LL. monoculus, one-eyed: see monoculous.] 1. An old and disused genus of the Linnean class Insecta and order Aptera, having or seeming to have only one eye—that is, two eyes coalesced in one. These "apterous insects" were entomostrophic crustaceans. Monoculus and some other entomostrophic were afterward made by Latreille his first order of Entomostrophia, called Branchiopoda and divided into two principal sections, Lophypoda and Phyllopoda.

2. [L. c.] A one-eyed animal; a monocule or monocle. —3. [L. c.] A bandage for one eye.

monocycle (mon-ō-si-kl), n. [< Gr. μονόκυκλος, having but one wheel or circle, < μόνος, single, + κύκλος, a circle, a wheel: see cycle.] A vehicle with one wheel: used figuratively in the quotation. [Rare.]

Nay, a not unfrequent "penance" consists in tying the hands to the ankles, and turning round and round like a cart-wheel. Near Goruckpoor the train of Lord Dalhousie met dozens of these animated monocycles.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII, 263.

Monocyclia (mon-ō-sik'li-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κύκλος, a circle: see cycle.] A division of holothurians containing those in which the tentacles are in one circle or series: correlated with Heterocyclia.

monocyclic (mon-ō-sik'lik), a. [< Gr. μονόκυκλος, having but one circle: see monocycle and -ic.] 1. Disposed in a single whorl or circular series, as the stamens in many flowers. —2. Of or pertaining to the Monocyclia.

monocyst (mon-ō-sist), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κύστις, a bag, pouch.] A tumor consisting of only one cyst. Thomas, Med. Dict.

Monocystaceæ (mon-ō-sis-tā-sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κύστις, a bladder, + -αἰμα, a family of fungi of the order Monadineæ. They are moisture-loving plants, occurring on living Algae and Protozoa, with the organs of reproduction reduced to the form of sporocysts. The family contains 3 genera.

monocysted (mon-ō-sis-ted), a. [As monocyst + -ed.] Having a single cyst; monocystidean.

The developmental history of the monocysted gregarines.

monocystic (mon-ō-sis'tik), a. [< monocyst + -ic.] Consisting of a single cyst, as a gregarine. Encyc. Brit., XIX, 853.

Monocystidea (mon-ō-sis-tid'ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Monocystis + -idea.] A division of Gregarinida, containing those gregarines whose body consists of a single sac: contrasted with Dicystidea. Also Monocystidæ, as a family.

monocystidean (mon-ō-sis-tid'ē-an), a. Monocysted; of or pertaining to the Monocystidea.

Monocystis (mon-ō-sis'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κύστις, a bag, pouch.] The typical genus of Monocystidæ. M. agilis is found in the male organ of the earthworm.

Monocyttaria (mon-ō-si-tā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κυττάριον, dim. of κύτταρος, a hollow, a cell, < κύτος, a hollow.] A division of Radiolaria, containing those radiolarians which have a single central capsule: distinguished from Polycyttaria. Most radiolarians are of this character. Also called Monozoa.

monocyttarian (mon-ō-si-tā'ri-an), a. and n. [As Monocyttaria + -an.] 1. a. Having a single central capsule, as a radiolarian; of or pertaining to the Monocyttaria. Also monozoan.

II. n. A radiolarian whose central capsule is single.

monodactyl, monodactyle (mon-ō-dak'til), a. Same as monodactylous. Nature, XXXVIII, 623.

monodactylic (mon-ō-dak'til'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δάκτυλος, a finger, a dactyl: see dactylic.] In anc. pros., containing but one dactyl: noting certain logæædic meters. See monanapestic.

monodactylous (mon-ō-dak'ti-lus), a. [= F. monodactyle = Pg. monodactilo, < Gr. μονοδάκτυλος, one-fingered, < μόνος, single, + δάκτυλος, a finger or toe: see dactyl.] 1. Having but one finger or toe; undigitate. —2. In Crustacea, subchelate: applied to the subcheliform limbs of crustaceans and arachnidans, in which there is no opposable finger to convert the terminal hook into a pincer-like claw or chela proper.

monodelph (mon-ō-delf), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δελφίς, womb.] A monodelphian mammal.

Monodelphia (mon-ō-del'fi-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + δελφίς, womb.] The highest of three primary divisions of mammals, or subclasses of the class Mammalia (the other two being Didelphia and Ornithodelphia); placental mammals, or Placentalia. The subclass contains all mammals except the marsupials and monotremes. The young are retained in the womb by means of placental attachment till they are well developed; the scrotum is never in front of the penis; and the uterus and vagina are never paired. The brain has a well-developed corpus callosum, and comparatively small anterior commissure. The Monodelphia are variously divided into an upper and a lower series, Educatia or Megasthena and Ineducabilia or Microsthenia; or into Archencephala (man alone), Gyrencephala, and Lissencephala; or directly into a number of orders. The orders of living monodelphians now usually adopted are eleven: Primates, Fera, Ungulata, Hyrocidea, Proboscidea, Sirenia, and Cete, of the upper series; and Chiroptera, Insectivora, Glires (or Rodentia), and Bruta (or Edentata), of the lower series. The families are about 120 in number. Eutheria is a synonym. Also, wrongly, Monadelphia.

monodelphian (mon-ō-del'fi-an), a. and n. [< Monodelphia + -an.] 1. a. Having the female generative passages single; specifically, pertaining to the Monodelphia, or having their characters.

II. n. A monodelphian mammal.

monodelphic (mon-ō-del'fik), a. [< monodelph + -ic.] Same as monodelphian.

monodelphous (mon-ō-del'fus), a. Same as monodelphian.

monodia (mō-nō-di-ā), n. Same as monody.

monodic (mō-nod'ik), a. [= It. monodico, < Gr. μονωδικός, < μονωδία, a monody: see monody.] In music, pertaining to monody or homophony; homophonic. Also monophonic. —Monodic school or style, that style of composition which supplanted the purely polyphonic or contrapuntal about 1600.

monodical (mō-nod'ik-āl), a. [< monodic + -al.] Same as monodic.

monodically (mō-nod'ik-āl-i), adv. In a monodic manner.

monodichlamydeous (mon-ō-dī-kla-mid'ē-us), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δι-, two, + χλαμύς (χλαμύδ), a cloak.] In bot., having indifferently either a calyx only, or both calyx and corolla.

Lindley. [Not now in use.]

monodimetric (mon-ō-dī-met'rik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δις, di-, twice, + μέτρον, measure: see dimetric.] In crystal., same as dimetric or tetragonal.

monodist (mon-ō-dist), n. [= Pg. monodista; as monod-y + -ist.] One who composes or sings in a monodic style, as opposed to the polyphonic style: opposed to contrapuntist.

Monodon (mon-ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth: see monodont.] 1. A genus of delphinoid odontocete cetaceans, containing only the narwhal, M. monoceros, distinguished by its unique dentition.

With the exception of some rudimentary and irregular teeth, the whole dentition consists of a pair of teeth lying horizontally in the jaw; in the female they remain embedded and cemented in their sockets, but in the male the left one grows into an enormous tusk like a horn projecting from the forehead, sometimes half as long as the entire animal, straight, slender, cylindrical, but spirally grooved sinistrally, and thus resembling a rope. The vertebrae are 50 in number, the ribs 11; the cervicals are normally free, and there is no dorsal fin. See cut under narwhal.

2. In conch., same as Monodonta. Cuvier, 1817.

monodont (mon-ō-dont), a. [< Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth, < μόνος, single, + δούς = E. tooth.] Having only one tooth.

Monodonta (mon-ō-don'tā), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth: see monodont.] A genus of top-shells of the family Trochidae, having a toothed columella: named horizontally in the jaw; in the female they remain embedded and cemented in their sockets, but in the male the left one grows into an enormous tusk like a horn projecting from the forehead, sometimes half as long as the entire animal, straight, slender, cylindrical, but spirally grooved sinistrally, and thus resembling a rope. The vertebrae are 50 in number, the ribs 11; the cervicals are normally free, and there is no dorsal fin. See cut under narwhal.

Skull and Tusk of Male Narwhal (Monodon monoceros).

2. In conch., same as Monodonta. Cuvier, 1817.

monodont (mon-ō-dont), a. [< Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth, < μόνος, single, + δούς = E. tooth.] Having only one tooth.

Monodonta (mon-ō-don'tā), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth: see monodont.] A genus of top-shells of the family Trochidae, having a toothed columella: named horizontally in the jaw; in the female they remain embedded and cemented in their sockets, but in the male the left one grows into an enormous tusk like a horn projecting from the forehead, sometimes half as long as the entire animal, straight, slender, cylindrical, but spirally grooved sinistrally, and thus resembling a rope. The vertebrae are 50 in number, the ribs 11; the cervicals are normally free, and there is no dorsal fin. See cut under narwhal.

2. In conch., same as Monodonta. Cuvier, 1817.

monodont (mon-ō-dont), a. [< Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth, < μόνος, single, + δούς = E. tooth.] Having only one tooth.

Monodonta (mon-ō-don'tā), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth: see monodont.] A genus of top-shells of the family Trochidae, having a toothed columella: named horizontally in the jaw; in the female they remain embedded and cemented in their sockets, but in the male the left one grows into an enormous tusk like a horn projecting from the forehead, sometimes half as long as the entire animal, straight, slender, cylindrical, but spirally grooved sinistrally, and thus resembling a rope. The vertebrae are 50 in number, the ribs 11; the cervicals are normally free, and there is no dorsal fin. See cut under narwhal.

2. In conch., same as Monodonta. Cuvier, 1817.

monodont (mon-ō-dont), a. [< Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth, < μόνος, single, + δούς = E. tooth.] Having only one tooth.

Monodonta (mon-ō-don'tā), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth: see monodont.] A genus of top-shells of the family Trochidae, having a toothed columella: named horizontally in the jaw; in the female they remain embedded and cemented in their sockets, but in the male the left one grows into an enormous tusk like a horn projecting from the forehead, sometimes half as long as the entire animal, straight, slender, cylindrical, but spirally grooved sinistrally, and thus resembling a rope. The vertebrae are 50 in number, the ribs 11; the cervicals are normally free, and there is no dorsal fin. See cut under narwhal.

by Lamarek in 1799. There are a number of species, known as rosary-shells.

Monodontinae (mon'ō-don-ti'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Monodon (t) + -inae.] The narwhals as a subfamily of Delphinidae: now usually merged in the subfamily Delphinapterinae.

Monodora (mon-ō-dō'rā), n. [NL. (Dunal, 1817), so called in allusion to the solitary flowers; < Gr. μόνος, single, + δωρον, gift.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the order Anonaceae and the tribe Mitrephoreae, distinguished by a one-celled compound ovary with numerous seeds attached over the whole surface of the walls. They are trees with large solitary variegated flowers, hanging upon a long stalk which terminates the stem or is opposite the leaves. They have three sepals, six wavy petals, many short stamens, and a shield-shaped stigma; their large globose woody fruit contains numerous seeds in a resinous central pulp. There are 3 species, natives of central Africa, of which M. Myrsine, the calabash-nutmeg, furnishes in its seeds a nutmeg-like spice. It is cultivated in Jamaica, etc., and hence called American, Jamaica, and Mexican nutmeg. M. Angolensis yields a similar product.

monodrama (mon-ō-drā'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + δράμα, a drama.] A dramatic piece for a single performer or actor: sometimes used also for a piece for two performers.

monodramatic (mon-ō-drā-mat'ik), a. [< monodrama + -atic.] Pertaining to a monodrama.

monodramet, n. [< monodrama.] Same as monodrama.

monodromic (mon-ō-drom'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δρόμος, a course, running, race.] In math., having a single sheet in the Riemann's surface; not having different values for one value of the variable. A monodromic function is one having the property that if, by a continuous change, the variable makes an excursion and returns to its original value, the function will also return to its original value. Also monotropic.

monody (mon'ō-di), n.; pl. monodies (-diz). [Also monodia; = F. monodie = Sp. monodia = Pg. It. monodia, < ML. monodia, < LL. monodia, monodum, < Gr. μονωδία, a solo, lament, < μόνος, single, + ὠδή, a song, ode: see ode.] 1. In music: (a) A style of composition in which one voice-part decidedly preponderates in interest over the others; homophony: opposed to polyphony, in which all the voice-parts are equally important. The term is specially applied to the modern style which arose somewhat before 1600 in Italy, and which led rapidly to the invention and great popularity of the opera, the oratorio, and the instrumental suite. The style itself had long before been known in popular songs and dances, but only then asserted itself as a controlling power in artistic music. (b) A piece written in monodic style; a melody, tune, or air, usually for the voice. (c) A composition written in one part only; a solo. Also monophony.

Funeral songs were called . . . Monodia if they were vited by one alone, and this was used at the enternment of Princes and others of great account, and it was reckoned a great ciuillitie to vse such ceremonies. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 89.

2. Monotonous sound; monotonousness of sound.

Hear the tolling of the bells —
Iron bells!
What a world of solemn thought their monody compels!
Poe, The Bells, iv.

monodynamic (mon'ō-di-nam'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δύναμις, power: see dynamic.] Having but one power, capacity, or talent. [Rare.]

Monodynamic men, men of a single talent, are rarely misapprehended. De Quincey.

Monœca (mō-nē'kā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + οἶκος, house.] In De Blainville's classification (1825), the second of three sub-classes of his Paracephalophora, contrasted with Dioica and Hermaphrodita, named in the form Monœca.

Monœcia (mō-nē'shi-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + οἶκος, house.] The twenty-first class of plants in the artificial system of Linnæus. In this class the stamens and pistils are in separate flowers on the same plant, as in the Araceae.

monœcian, monœcian (mō-nē'shi-ān), a. and n. [< monœci-ous + -an.] 1. a. Same as monœci-ous.

II. n. A monœcious animal.

monœcious, monœcious (mō-nē'shus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + οἶκος, house.] 1. In bot.: (a) In phanerogams, having the stamens and pistils in different flowers on the same plant. (b) In cryptogams, having both male and female organs on the same individual.—2. In zool., having both male and female sexual organs; hermaphrodite; androgynous: applied according to the corresponding usage in botany: opposed to diœcious. In numberless lower invertebrates the male and female products of generation, or ova and spermatozoa, mature in the same individual without sexual intercourse. In many other cases, as those of worms and snails, every individual is both male and female, but there is sexual intercourse and reciprocal impregnation between two individuals.

monœciously, monœciously (mō-nē'shus-li), adv. In a monœcious manner; with a tendency to monœcism.—Monœciously polygamous, in bot. See polygamous.

monœcism, monœcism (mō-nē'sizm), n. [< monœci-ous + -ism.] The state or quality of being monœcious; hermaphroditism; androgyny.

monœmbryony (mon-ō-em'bri-on-i), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἐμβρυον, embryo: see embryo.]

In bot., the condition of possessing only a single embryo, as the seeds of most angiosperms.

monoflagellate (mon-ō-flaj'e-lāt), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. flagellate, a.] Monomastigote or uniflagellate, as an infusorian.

monogam (mon'ō-gam), n. [< LL. monogamus, < LGr. μονόγαμος, married but once: see monogamous.] In bot., a plant that has solitary flowers with the anthers united.

Monogamia (mon-ō-gā'mi-ā), n. pl. [NL., < LGr. μονόγαμος, married but once: see monogamous.] In bot., one of the six orders of the nineteenth class, the Syngenesia, in the Linnean system, in which the flowers are solitary and have united anthers.

monogamian (mon-ō-gā'mi-ān), a. Same as monogamous.

monogamic (mon-ō-gam'ik), a. [< MGr. μονογαμικός, < μονόγαμος, one married but once: see monogam.] Same as monogamous. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 227.

monogamist (mō-nog'a-mist), n. [< monogamy + -ist.] 1. One who has been married only once; one who believes that a person should not marry oftener than once—that is, that a widower or widow should not remarry.

I maintained . . . that it was unlawful for a priest of the Church of England, after the death of his first wife, to take a second, or, to express it in one word, I valued myself upon being a strict monogamist. Goldsmith, Vicar, ii.

2. One who has but one (living and undivorced) wife, as opposed to a bigamist or a polygamist.

monogamistic (mon'ō-ga-mis'tik), a. [< monogamist + -ic.] Same as monogamous.

monogamous (mō-nog'a-mus), a. [< F. monogame = Sp. monógamo = Pg. It. monogamo, < LL. monogamus, < LGr. μονόγαμος, married but once, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γάμος, marriage.] 1. Practising or supporting the principle of monogamy. (a) Marrying only once—that is, not remarrying after the death of the spouse: opposed to bigamous. (b) Marrying only one at a time: opposed to bigamous or polygamous.

2. Of or pertaining to monogamy: as, monogamous doctrines or customs.—3. In zool., having only one mate; living in pairs: as, a monogamous family of birds.—4. In bot., having solitary flowers with united anthers, as in Lobelia.—Doubly monogamous, in ornith., said of birds the male of which takes part in nest-building, incubation, and care of the young, as pigeons and many other birds.

monogamy (mō-nog'a-mi), n. [= F. monogamie = Sp. monogamia = Pg. It. monogamia, < LL. monogamia, < LGr. μονογαμία, single marriage, < μονόγαμος, married but once: see monogamous.]

1. The practice of marrying only once, or the principle which upholds that practice; the principle that forbids remarriage after the death of a former husband or wife: opposed to digamy. See bigamy, 2.—2. The condition of being mara, male catkins; b, female catkins; c, fruit.

ried to only one person at one time: opposed to bigamy or polygamy. See bigamy, 1.

The monogamy of the modern and western world is, in fact, the monogamy of the Romans, from which the license of divorce has been expelled by Christian morality. Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 60.

3. In zool., the habit of having only one mate; the habit of living in pairs; the paired state.—Double monogamy, in ornith., the state or habit of being doubly monogamous. See phrase under monogamous.

monoganglionic (mon-ō-gang-gli-on'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. ganglion + -ic.] Having a single ganglion.

monogastric (mon-ō-gas'trik), a. [= F. monogastrique, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γαστήρ, stomach: see gaster, gastric.] Having only one stomach or digestive cavity.—Monogastric Diphyids or Diphyds. See the quotation under diphyzoid.

Monogenea (mon-ō-jē'nē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μονογενής, only-begotten, single: see monogenous.] A division of fluke-worms or trematoids, containing those which undergo scarcely any change or comparatively little transformation in development: opposed to Digenea. There are several families and numerous genera.

monogeneous (mon-ō-jē'nē-us), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + γένος, kind.] 1. In biol., generated in the same form as that of the parents; homogeneous as regards stages of development: specifically said of the Monogenea.—2. In math., having a single differential coefficient.

monogenesis (mon-ō-jen'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + γένεσις, origin: see genesis.] In biol.: (a) Development of the ovum from a parent similar to itself: opposed to metagenesis. E. van Beneden. (b) Generation of an individual from one parent which develops both male and female products, or ova and spermatozoa. A. Thomson. (c) Descent of all living things from a single cell. Haeckel.

monogenesy (mon-ō-jen'e-si), n. [As monogenesis.] Same as monogenesis or monogeny. Encyc. Dict.

monogenetic (mon'ō-jē-net'ik), a. [< monogenesis, after genetic.] 1. Of or pertaining to monogenesis.—2. Of or relating to monogenesis.

The monogenetic theory, which believes in the original common origin of all mankind from one pair. Science, VII. 169.

3. In geol., being the result of one genetic process: applied by Dana to mountain-ranges.

The Appalachians, a range of many mountain ridges and valleys, constitute one individual among mountains, because a result of one genetic process, or, in a word, monogenetic. Dana, Man. of Geol. (3d ed.), p. 796.

monogenism (mō-noj'e-nizm), n. [< monogen-y + -ism.] The descent of the whole human race from a single pair. Also called monogeny.—Adamitic monogenism, the descent of the human race from Adam and Eve, according to the Mosaic account. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 159.

monogenist (mō-noj'e-nist), n. and a. [< monogen-y + -ist.] 1. n. 1. One who maintains the doctrine of monogenesis in any form.

To meet the inevitable question of "Whence the first organic matter?" the Monogenist is reduced to enumerate the existing elements into which the simplest living jelly or sarcode is resolvable. Owen, Anat. (1868), iii. 817.

2. One who believes in the doctrine of monogenism.

According to the Monogenists, all mankind have sprung from a single pair, whose multitudinous progeny spread themselves over the world. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 159.

II. a. Of or pertaining to monogenesis or monogenism: as, a monogenist theory.

monogenistic (mon'ō-jē-nis'tik), a. [< monogenist + -ic.] Same as monogenist.

monogenous (mō-noj'e-nus), a. [< Gr. μονογενής, only-begotten, single, < μόνος, single, + -γενής, < γεν, produce: see -genous.] 1. Generated or generating by means of fission, gemmation, or sporulation, as modes of asexual reproduction.

Reproduction by fission, which, with that by budding and spore-formation, is included under the term monogenous asexual reproduction. Claus, Zöology (trans.), p. 96.

2. Of or pertaining to monogenism.—3. In math., having a single differential coefficient considered as a rule of generation.—Monogenous function, a function, $X + Y$, of the imaginary variable $x + yi$, such that

$$\frac{\partial X}{\partial x} = \frac{\partial Y}{\partial y} \text{ and } \frac{\partial X}{\partial y} = -\frac{\partial Y}{\partial x}.$$

It is usually defined as a function having a differential coefficient.

monogeny (mō-noj'e-ni), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + -γενεα, < γεν, produce: see -geny.] 1.

Same as monogony, 1, or monogenesis.—2. Same as monogenism.

monoglot (mon'ō-glōt), a. [LGr. μονόγλωττος, monóglōttos, speaking but one language, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γλῶττα, Attic form of γλῶσσα, tongue, language.] 1. Speaking or using only one language.—2. Written or published in only one language.

monogonentic (mon'ō-gō-nū'tik), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, + γονεῖν, produce, < γόνος, offspring, generation.] In entom., single-brooded; having only one brood during a year.

monogenic (mon'ō-gōn'ik), a. [monogony + -ic.] Of or pertaining to monogony: same as monogenous, 1.

Monogonopora (mon'ō-gō-nop'ō-rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monogonoporus: see monogonoporous.] A division of dendrocoelous turbellarian worms, having the sexual opening single, whence the name. It contains the land and fresh-water planarians of the families Planariidae and Geoplanidae. Opposed to Digonopora.

monogonoporic (mon'ō-gō-nop'ō-rīk), a. [As monogonoporus + -ic.] Having a single sexual opening or generative pore; specifically, pertaining to the Monogonopora, or having their characters.

monogonoporous (mon'ō-gō-nop'ō-rus), a. [NL. monogonoporus, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γόνος, generation, + πόρος, passage.] Having a single genital pore, as a turbellarian; pertaining to the Monogonopora: opposed to digonoporous.

monogony (mō-nog'ō-nī), n. [Gr. μόνος, single, + γονία, < γεν, produce: see -gony.] 1. Asexual reproduction; agamogenesis: used by Haeckel in distinction from amphigony. Monogony is exhibited in the lowest animals, in which there is no sex, as in cases of reproduction by fission or gemmation without conjugation. The term is not applied to asexual modes of reproduction, as parthenogenesis, which occur in sexed animals. Also monogeny, monogenesis. 2. Same as monogenesis.

monogram (mon'ō-gram), n. [= F. monogramme = Sp. monograma = Pg. It. monogramma, < LL. monogramma, < Gr. μονογράμματον (not μονόγραμμα), a character consisting of several letters in one, neut. of μονογράμματος, consisting of one letter (μονόγραμμα), drawn with single lines, outlined, > L. monogrammus, an outline sketch, skeleton, shadow, < μόνος, single, + γράφω (r-), letter: see gram.] 1. One character in writing; a mark or design formed or consisting of one letter.

If in compass of no art it [my superficies] came To be described by a monogram.

B. Jonson, Discoveries, lxx.

2. Two or more of the letters of a name or word, or of the initials of several names or words, so combined as to form or appear to form a single character.

That the founder was a Bishop Euphrasius is shown by his monogram on many of the stiles.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 101.

3t. A picture drawn in lines without color; a sketch.

A kind of first draught or ground colours only, and monogram of life. Hammond, Works, IV, 671. (Latham.)

monogram-machine (mon'ō-gram-mā-shēn'), n. A foot-press used to stamp monograms, initials, etc., on paper and the like.

monogrammal (mon'ō-gram-al), a. [monogram (LL. monogramma) + -al.] Same as monogrammatic. [Rare.]

monogrammatic (mon'ō-gra-mat'ik), a. [= F. monogrammatique, < LL. monogramma(t), monogram: see monogram.] In the style or manner of a monogram; pertaining to monograms.

One photo-lithographed plate of monogrammatic emblems, the meaning of which remains unknown.

The Academy, April 6, 1889, p. 248.

monogrammic (mon'ō-gram'ik), a. [= F. monogrammique; as monogram (LL. monogramma) + -ic.] Same as monogrammatic.

monograph (mon'ō-grāf), n. [= F. monographie = Pg. monographo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γραφῆ, writing.] An account or description of a single thing or class of things; a treatise on a single subject or a single department, division, or detail of a branch of study.

A monograph on the ant, as treated by Solomon, showing the harmony of the Book of Proverbs with the results of modern research. George Eliot, Middlemarch, xvii.

monograph (mon'ō-grāf), v. t. [monograph, n.] To write or produce a monograph on; treat in a monograph.

The British species of Lumbricus have never been carefully monographed.

Darwin, Formation of Vegetable Mould, p. 8.

monographer (mō-nog'ra-fēr), n. A writer of monographs.

monographic (mon'ō-grāf'ik), a. [= F. monographique = Sp. monográfico = It. monografico; as monograph + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to a monograph; of the nature of a monograph.

It does not pretend to monographic completeness, which would require far more profound and exhaustive studies. Science, VII, 96.

2. Pertaining to or of the nature of a monogram.

A monographic combination of the letters A and P. Harper's Mag., LXXVI, 746.

3. Drawn in lines without colors.

monographical (mon'ō-grāf'ī-kal), a. [monographic + -al.] Same as monographic.

monographically (mon'ō-grāf'ī-kal-ī), adv. In the manner or form of a monograph.

monographist (mō-nog'ra-fist), n. [monograph + -ist.] One who writes a monograph.

monographous (mō-nog'ra-fus), a. [monograph + -ous.] Monographic.

monography (mō-nog'ra-ſī), n. [= F. monographie = Sp. monografía = Pg. monographia = It. monografia, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γραφία, < γράφω, write.] 1. A delineation in lines without colors; an outline sketch.—2. A monograph; also, a system of monographs.

In order to write a complete monography of the Kashmiri style, we ought to be able to trace it very much further back than anything in the previous pages enables us to do. J. Ferguson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 294.

monogyn (mon'ō-jin), n. [Gr. μόνος, single, + γυνή, female (in mod. bot. a pistil).] In bot., a plant having only one pistil or stigma.

Monogynia (mon'ō-jin'ī-ſī), n. pl. [NL.: see monogyn.] In bot., the name of the first order in each of the first thirteen classes in the Linnean system, comprehending such plants as have only one pistil or stigma in a flower.

monogynian (mon'ō-jin'ī-an), a. [NL. Monogynia + -an.] Pertaining to the order Monogynia; having only one pistil or stigma.

monogynist (mō-nōj'ī-nist), n. [monogyn + -ist.] One who adopts or favors monogyny.

monogynœcial (mon'ō-jī-nē-shāl), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. gynœcium + -al.] In bot., formed by the pistil of one flower: applied to simple fruits.

monogynous (mō-nōj'ī-nus), a. [monogyn + -ous.] 1. Having only one wife; living in monogyny; monogamous, as a man: correlated with monandrous.—2. In zoöl., having only one female mate.—3. Same as monogynian.

monogyny (mō-nōj'ī-nī), n. [Gr. μόνος, single, + γυνή, female.] In zoöl. and anthrop., a mating with only one female or wife; the monogynous state: correlated with monandry.

monohamœrous (mon'ō-hē-me-rus), a. [Gr. μονήμερος, prop. μονήμερος, lasting one day only, < μόνος, single, + ἡμέρα, day.] In med., lasting or existing only one day.

monohydrated (mon'ō-hī-drā-ted), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, + ὕδωρ (hōdōr), water: see hydrate.] Containing one molecule of water. This term was formerly applied to such acids as were regarded as formed from an acid by the addition of one molecule of water, as monohydrated nitric acid, (HNO₃), formed from the oxid N₂O₅ by adding a molecule of water, H₂O.

monohydric (mon'ō-hī-drik), a. [mono- + hydr (ogen) + -ic.] Containing one atom of hydrogen. Specifically applied to such acids as have a single hydrogen atom replaceable by a basic atom or radical, as formic or lactic acid; and also to alcohols which by oxidation exchange two atoms of hydrogen for one of oxygen, and form acids containing the same number of carbon atoms as the alcohols from which they were derived.

Monolca (mō-nōi'kā), n. pl. Same as Monæca. monoid (mon'oid), a. and n. [Gr. μονοειδής, of one form, uniform, < μόνος, single, + εἶδος, form.] 1. a. In anc. pros., containing but one kind of foot: noting certain meters. Monoid meters are also called pure meters or simple meters, and distinguished from compound (epithetetic) meters and mixed or logacetic meters. 2. n. In math., a surface which possesses a conical point of the highest possible (n—1)th order.

monoidicism (mon'ō-i-dē'izm), n. [Gr. μόνος, single, + idea, idea (see idea), + -ism.] Concentration of the mind upon one thought or idea; a brooding on one subject; mild monomania. [Rare.]

It is observed that the mental condition of hypnotised "subjects" is often one of marked monoidicism—of strong and one-sided attention.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III, 407.

monolatry (mō-nol'a-trī), n. [Gr. μόνος, single, + λατρεία, service, worship: see latría.] The idolatrous or pagan worship of one divinity:

also, the worship of one God, but not necessarily with an explicit disbelief in other divinities.

Thus results a worship of one God—monolatry, as Wellhausen calls it—which is very different from genuine monotheism. Huxley, in Nineteenth Century, XIX, 468.

monolith (mon'ō-lith), n. [= F. monolithe = Sp. monólito = Pg. monolito, a monolith, < LL. monolithus, < Gr. μόνολιθος, made of one stone, as a pillar or column, < μόνος, single, + λίθος, stone.] A single stone; by extension, any structure or object in stone formed of a single piece: it may be an independent monument standing alone, as an Egyptian obelisk, or a menhir, or any part of a structure, as a column.

monolithic (mon'ō-lith'al), a. [monolith + -al.] Same as monolithical.

monolithical (mon'ō-lith'ik), a. [= F. monolithique = Pg. monolítico; as monolith + -ic.] 1. Formed of a single stone, as an obelisk or the shaft of a column.—2. Consisting of monoliths: as, a monolithical circle.—3. Of or pertaining to a monolith.

There is no doubt that their monolithical character is the principal source of the awe and wonder with which they have been regarded.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 338.

monolobite (mō-nol'ō-bit), n. [Gr. μόνος, single, + λοβός, lobe (see lobe), + -ite.] A trilobite in which the trilobed or tripartite character of the upper surface is almost lost, as in the genus Homalonotus.

monolobular (mon'ō-lob'ū-lār), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. lobulus, lobe: see lobular.] Consisting of or pertaining to a single lobe.

monolocular (mon'ō-lok'ū-lār), a. [Gr. μόνος, single, + L. locus, a compartment (cell), dim. of locus, place: see locular.] Same as unilocular.

Monolocularia (mon'ō-lok'ū-lā-rī-ſī), n. pl. [NL.: see monolocular.] Those animals whose hearts are monolocular, or which have but one cardiac cavity. Wilder, Amer. Nat., 1887, p. 914.

monologant, n. [monology + -ant.] Same as monologue, 1. Mimsheu.

monologist (mō-nol'ō-jist), n. [= Sp. monologista; as monologue + -ist.] 1. One who talks in monologue or soliloquies.—2. A monopolizer of conversation. De Quincey.

monologue (mon'ō-log), n. [F. monologue = Sp. monólogo = Pg. It. monologo, a sole speaker, also a soliloquy, < LGr. μονόλογος, speaking alone or to oneself, < Gr. μόνος, alone, + λέγειν, speak.] 1t. One who does all the talking. Mimsheu.—2. That which is spoken by one person alone. Especially—(a) A dramatic soliloquy. (b) A kind of dramatic entertainment, consisting of recitations, imitations, anecdotes, songs, etc., performed throughout by one person.

He [Charles Mathews] instituted in 1818, in imitation of Foote and Dibdin, a species of entertainment in the form of a monologue, which, under the title of "Mathews at Home," proved very successful. Amer. Cyc., XI, 279.

(c) A long speech or harangue uttered by one person, especially in the course of a conversation.

He sat at the feet of the teacher and listened with much apparent interest to monologues, not one-fifth part of which he could anyways understand. W. Black.

His [Wordsworth's] finest passages are always monologues. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 240.

monologuize (mon'ō-log'iz), v. i.; pret. and pp. monologuized, ppr. monologuizing. [monologue + -ize.] To soliloquize. [Rare.]

Her lips had a habit of silently monologuizing, moving in the manner of one who speaks with great rapidity, but with no audible utterance.

W. Besant, Children of Gibeon, 1.

monology (mō-nol'ō-jī), n. [LGr. μονολογία, simple language (taken in sense of 'a soliloquy'), < μονόλογος, speaking alone: see monologue.] The act or habit of indulging in monologues, or of monopolizing conversation by long narratives or dissertations; the habit of soliloquizing.

It was not by an insolent usurpation that Coleridge persisted in monology through his whole life. De Quincey.

monomachia (mon'ō-mā'ki-ſī), n. [LL.: see monomachy.] Same as monomachy.

monomachist (mō-nom'a-kist), n. [monomachy + -ist.] One who fights in single combat; a duelist. [Rare.] monomachy (mō-nom'a-ki), n. [Also monomachia; < F. monomachie = Sp. monomachia = Pg. It. monomachia, < LL. monomachia, < Gr. μονομαχία, single combat, < μονομάχος, fighting in single combat, < μόνος, single, + μάσθαι, fight.] A single combat; a duel.

Herotically monomachies.

Harvey, Pierce's Supererogation (1868).

There is to be performed a monomachy.
Combat, or duel, time, place, and weapon
Agreed betwixt us.

Webster and Rowley, Cure for a Cuckold, i. 2.

monomane (mon'-ō-mān), n. [F. monomane (= Pg. monomano), < monomanie, monomania: see monomania.] One afflicted with monomania; a monomaniac. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

monomania (mon'-ō-mā'-ni-ā), n. [= F. monomanie = Sp. monomania = Pg. It. monomania, < NL. monomania, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + μανία, madness: see mania.] 1. Insanity in which there is a more or less complete limitation of the perverted mental action to a particular field, as a specific delusion, or an impulse to do some particular thing. The other mental functions may show some signs of degeneration.—2. In popular use, an unreasonable zeal for or interest in some one thing; a craze.

Frederic was as anxious as any prince could be about the efficiency of his army. But this anxiety never degenerated into a monomania, like that which led his father to pay fancy prices for giants.

Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

Instinctive monomania, the excessive tendency to do some particular thing without intelligible motive and unrestrained by considerations of propriety, morality, or personal prudence. Persons manifesting this form of mental derangement usually have exhibited signs of more or less extensive mental degeneration. It includes suicidal insanity, homicidal insanity, dipsomania, pyromania, kleptomania, and certain forms of perverted sexual instinct. Also called impulsive insanity. = Syn. 1. Lunacy, Derangement, etc. See insanity.

monomaniac (mon'-ō-mā'-ni-ak), a. and n. [= F. monomaniac = Sp. It. monomaniaco; as monomania + -ac.] I. a. Same as monomaniacal.

II. n. 1. A person affected by monomania.—2. In law, one who is insane upon some one or more subjects, and apparently sane upon all others.

monomaniacal (mon'-ō-mā'-ni-ak-al), a. [F. monomaniac + -al.] Of or pertaining to monomania; also, afflicted with monomania.

Patients confess that they have been under the influence of monomaniacal ideas and terrible hallucinations for a long period, without their existence being suspected even by their most intimate associates.

F. B. Winslow, Obscure Diseases of the Brain, ix.

Monomastiga (mon'-ō-mas'-ti-gā), n. pl. [NL. (in neuter) pl. of Monomastix.] A division of flagellate infusorians having one flagellum, as the Monadida, etc.: distinguished from Dimastiga.

monomastigate (mon'-ō-mas'-ti-gāt), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + μαστιγία (mastrig-ia), a whip, scourge.] Having one flagellum; unflagellate: said of the Monomastiga.

Monomastix (mon'-ō-mas'-tik-s), n. [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + μαστιγία (mastrig-ia), a whip, scourge.] A genus of unflagellate infusorians proposed by Diesing in 1850, giving name to the Monomastiga.

monome (mon'-ōm), n. [F. monôme = Sp. Pg. It. monomio, < *NL. monomium, for mononimium*, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + L. nom(en), name. Hence monomial. Cf. binomial.] Same as monomial.

Monomera (mō-nom'-ē-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μονομερής, consisting of one part, single: see monomerous.] A section of coleopterous insects proposed by Latreille for the reception of certain minute species. It is now known that his observations were imperfect, these insects having really several tarsal joints, and pertaining to families which Latreille had included in other groups.

Monomerosomata (mō-nom'-ē-rō-sō-ma-tā), n. pl. [NL.: see monomerosomatous.] The acarids or mites as an order of tracheate arachnidans; the Acarida or Acaridea. In Leach's system there were 4 orders of Arachnida—Dimerosomata, spiders; Polymerosomata, scorpions, etc.; Monomerosomata, mites; and Podomerosomata, the Pycnogonida. Westwood interposed Adelarthrosomata between the second and the third of these.

monomerosomatous (mō-nom'-ē-rō-som'-a-tus), a. [Gr. μονομερής, consisting of one part (see monomerous), + σῶμα (sōma), body.] Having the body all in one piece or mass—that is, apparently unsegmented—as an acarid; of or pertaining to the Monomerosomata, or having their characters, as a mite: distinguished from dimerosomatous, polymerosomatous, etc.

monomerous (mō-nom'-ē-rus), a. [Gr. μονομερής, consisting of one part, < μῶνος, single, + μέρος, part.] 1. In zool., having the tarsi single-jointed; unarticulate, as a tarsus; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monomera.—2. In bot., having but one member in each cycle (pistil, stamen, petal, or sepal): said of a flower. Compare dimerous, 2.

monometallic (mon'-ō-me-tal'-ik), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + μέταλλον, metal: see metal.] Consisting of but one metal; specifically, comprising coins that consist of but one metal (or alloy), as gold or silver: as, a monometallic currency.

monometallism (mon'-ō-met'-al-izm), n. [monometall(ic) + -ism.] The use of only one metal as a standard of value in the coinage of a country; also, the economic theory that advocates such a single standard. See bimetallism.

monometallist (mon'-ō-met'-al-ist), n. [monometall(ic) + -ist.] One who advocates the theory of monometallism: opposed to bimetallist.

monometer (mō-nom'-ē-tēr), a. and n. [LL. monometron, as a noun monometron, < Gr. μονόμετρος, consisting of one measure, < μῶνος, single, + μέτρον, a measure: see meter.] I. a. In pros., consisting of a single measure.

II. n. In pros., a meter consisting of a single measure.

monometric (mon'-ō-met'-rik), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + μέτρον, measure. Cf. monometer.] In crystal., same as isometric, 2.

monometrical (mon'-ō-met'-ri-kal), a. [monometer + -ic-al.] Pertaining to or consisting of monometers; containing only one meter.

monomial (mō-nō'-mī-al), a. and n. [monome (*NL. monomium) + -al. Cf. binomial, multinomial, polynomial. See also monomial.] I. a. 1. In alg., consisting of only one term, and not of several added together.—2. In zool. and bot., same as mononomial.—Monomial differentiant. See differentiant.

II. n. In alg., an expression or quantity consisting of a single term. See binomial. Also monome.

Monomorium (mon'-ō-mō'-ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + μόριον, dim. of μῶρος, a part, piece.] A genus of Formicidae, having the metathorax unarmed, the mandibles narrow, and the antennae 11- or 12-jointed. It is wide-spread, with many species, among them the common little red ant, M. pharaonis. This well-known domestic pest America owes Pharaoh's Ant (Monomorium pharaonis).

1, female; 2, worker. (Lines show natural sizes.)

to Europe, though it has generally been considered of American origin; it is now almost cosmopolitan. It does no great damage, but is troublesome from its myriads. Its habit of overrunning almost everything in the house that is eatable, and the great difficulty or impossibility of its extermination.

monomorphic (mon'-ō-mor'-fik), a. [As monomorphous + -ic.] 1. In zool., of one and the same (or essentially similar) type of structure; formed much alike; notably uniform in morphic character: said of a number of animals collectively, or of the zoological group which they constitute: as, birds are a highly monomorphic class of animals.—2. In entom., having but one form, structure, or morphological character; identical or invariable in form throughout successive stages of development; monomorphous; homomorphous; ametabolous.

monomorphous (mon'-ō-mōr'-fus), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + μορφή, form.] 1. Same as monomorphic in any sense.—2. Of invariable form: specifically applied to certain neuropterous insects which in their larval state are similar in form to the perfect insect, though wingless.

monomphalus (mō-nom'-fa-lus), n.; pl. monomphali (-li). [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + μπαλός, navel.] In teratol., a double monster, each person being nearly complete, but united with the other in a common umbilicus.

Monomyaria (mon'-ō-mī-ā'-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + μῦς, muscle, + -aria.] An order of bivalve mollusks with a single adductor muscle, or with one such muscle enlarged at the expense of another, subcentral in position and remote from the pallial margin. The order contains the scallops, oysters, pearl-oysters, and related forms, and is nearly coincident with Asiphonata. See cut under edortum.

monomyarian (mon'-ō-mī-ā'-ri-ān), a. and n. [Monomyaria + -an.] I. a. Having one adduc-tor muscle, as an oyster; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monomyaria. Also monomyary.

II. n. A monomyarian bivalve mollusk.

monomyary (mon'-ō-mī-ā'-ri), a. and n. [= F. monomyaire, < NL. Monomyaria.] Same as monomyarian.

Mononeura (mon'-ō-nū-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + νεῦρον, nerve.] Animals with only a ganglionic nervous system. Rudolphi.

mononomial (mon'-ō-nō'-mī-al), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + L. nom(en), name: see nominal. Cf. monomial.] In zool. and bot., consisting of a single word or term: applied to the name of an animal or a plant: opposed to binomial and polynomial. Coues, The Auk, i. 320. Also monomial.

mononuclear (mon'-ō-nū'-klē-ār), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + L. nucleus, nucleus: see nuclear.] Having a single nucleus; uninuclear: as, large mononuclear cells. Hueppe, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 68.

Mononychinae (mon'-ō-nī-kī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mononyx (-onych-) + -inae.] A subfamily of Galgidae, typified by the genus Mononyx. It contains heteropterous insects of flattened form, truncate in front, rounded behind, and rough on top; of dull or dark color; and with the fore legs raptorial, fitted for clutching insect prey.

mononym (mon'-ō-nim), n. [Gr. μονώνυμος, having one name, < μῶνος, single, + ὄνομα, ὄνυμα, a name: see onym.] A name consisting of a single term; a mononomial name in zoology. Coues, The Auk, i. 321.

mononymic (mon'-ō-nim'-ik), a. [mononym + -ic.] Having but one name; named in one word; mononomial: applied in zoology to a system of nomenclature in which the name of each species is a single word: opposed to dionymal and polynymic.

In a mononymic system we should require as many separate names as there are objects to be named.

J. W. Dunning, Entomol. Monthly Mag., VIII. 274.

mononymization (mon'-ō-nim-i-zā'-shon), n. [mononymize + -ation.] The substitution of a single word for several which had been used together as the name of something, as the employment of the name iter for a part of the brain usually called iter a tertio ad quartum ventriculum. [Rare.]

The desired mononymization is best attained by simply dropping the superfluous genitive (in the phrase "torcular Herophilii").

Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 525, note.

mononymize (mon'-ō-nim-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mononymized, ppr. mononymizing. [mononym + -ize.] To convert (a polynomial name) into a mononym.

Mononyx (mon'-ō-niks), n. [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + ὄνυξ, a nail: see onyx.] In entom.: (a) The typical genus of Mononychinae, founded by Laporte in 1837. M. amplicollis is a large, broad South American species; M. stygius is found in the southern United States. (b) An unused genus of coleopterous insects. Brullé, 1838.

monodūsian (mon'-ō-δ'-si-ān), a. Same as monodūsious.

monodūsious (mon'-ō-δ'-si-us), a. [LGr. μονοδυσίος, of single essence, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + οὐσία, essence, < ὄν (fem. οὐσα), ppr. of εἶναι, be: see bel. ens. Cf. homodūsious.] Having the same substance; consisting of the same matter: used to describe the Sabellian confounding of God the Father and God the Son.

monoparesis (mon'-ō-par'-ē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μῶνος, single, + πάρεσις, a weakening, paralysis: see paresis.] In pathol., the paresis of a single part of the body, as of one limb.

monopathic (mon'-ō-path'-ik), a. [monopathy + -ic.] In pathol., involving the disorder of only one organ or function: said of disease.

monopathy (mō-nop'-a-thi), n. [LGr. μονοπάθεια, suffering in one part of the body only, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + πάθος, suffering.] 1. Solitary suffering or sensibility.

Every one calculateth his nativity, and sentenceth his own future fate, by crying at his birth; not coming only from the body's monopathy, or sole suffering by change of its warm quarters; but, according to some, from sympathy with the divining soul, that knoweth itself for a time banished from the Father of Spirits.

Whitlock, Manners of the English (1654), p. 82. (Latham.)

2. In pathol., a disease or affection in which only one organ or function is disordered.

monopersonal (mon'-ō-pēr'-sōn-al), a. [Gr. μῶνος, single, + L. persona, person: see personal.] In theol., having but one person or one mode of existence.

monopetalous (mon'-ō-pet'-a-lus), a. [= F. monopétale = Sp. monopétalo = Pg. It. monopetalo, < Gr. μῶνος, single, + πέταλον, leaf (petal.) In bot., having the petals united into one piece by their edges: more properly gamopetalous or sympetalous.

monophanous (mō-nōf'a-nus), a. [< LGr. μονοφανής, visible alone, < Gr. μόνος, single, alone, + φαίνεσθαι, appear.] Having an appearance similar to something else; resembling each other. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

Monophlebites (mon'ō-flē-bī'tēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + φλέψ (φλεβ-), a vein, + -ites, E. -ite.] A tribe or section of the homopterous subfamily Coccinae, including the largest bark-lice known. Some Australian forms are nearly two inches long.

monophobia (mon'ō-fō-bī-ē), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + φοβία, < φέβεσθαι, fear (> φόβος, fear).] In pathol., morbid dread of being left alone.

monophonic (mon'ō-fon'ik), a. [< monophon-y + -ic.] Same as monodic.

monophonous (mon'ō-fō-nus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, with but one voice or sound, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φωνή, voice.] Producing a single sound or note at one time: said of an instrument.

monophony (mon'ō-fō-ni), n. [As monophonous + -y.] Same as monody, 1.

monophote (mon'ō-fōt), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + φῶς (φωτ-), light.] An electric arc-lamp regulator designed to work in single series, or on the parallel-arc system, between the leads of an electric-light circuit. More fully named monophote regulator.

monophthalmus (mon-of-thal'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ὄφθαλμος, the eye.] In teratol., a monster with one eye; a cyclops.

The term anophthalmus unilateralis would seem to serve better . . . than the term monophthalmus, given by some writers. Medical News, LII. 636.

monophthong (mon'of-thōng), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + φθόγγος, of or with but one sound, containing but one vowel; as a noun, a single vowel; < μόνος, single, + φθόγγος, sound. Cf. diphthong.] 1. A simple vowel-sound.

Again, the sound of the so-called long English a in make, paper, &c., although once a monophthong, is now pronounced as a diphthong. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 782.

2. A combination of two written vowels pronounced as one.

monophthongal (mon'of-thōng-gal), a. [< monophthong + -al.] Consisting of or pertaining to a monophthong.

monophthongization (mon-of-thōng-gi-zā'shon), n. [< monophthongize + -ation.] The reduction of a diphthong to a single sound.

Examples of the monophthongization of ei, so far as they are found in the text of the Homeric poems. Amer. Jour. Philol., VI. 420.

monophthongize (mon'of-thōng-gīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. monophthongized, ppr. monophthongizing. [< monophthong + -ize.] To reduce in enunciation to a single sound.

A monophthongized diphthong.

Amer. Jour. Philol., VI. 435.

monophyletic (mōn'ō-flē'tik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + φύλος, of one tribe, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φύλη, a tribe, > φυλῆτος, a tribesman, φυλετικός, belonging to a tribesman: see phylum.] Of or pertaining to a single phylum: said of a group of any grade in zoology, with reference to the origin of all the members of such group from a common ancestor: opposed to polyphyletic. The monophyletic hypothesis, in its logical application to the animal kingdom, derives all animals from a single prototype; it is equivalent to the monogenetic hypothesis in phylogeny.

My gastræa theory, on which I base the monophyletic genealogy of the animal kingdom. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), I. 247.

monophyllitic (mon'ō-flī'tik), a. An erroneous form of monophyletic.

Polyphyllitic origin, so far from being improbable, is as likely an occurrence as monophyllitic origin. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 426.

monophylline (mon'ō-flī'in), a. [As monophyllous + -ine.] Same as monophyllous.

monophyllous (mon'ō-flī'us), a. [= F. monophylle = Pg. monophilo = It. monofilo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φύλλον, leaf.] In bot., having but one leaf; formed of one leaf.

Monophyllus (mon'ō-flī'us), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + φύλλον, leaf: see monophyllous.] A genus of leaf-nosed bats of the family Phyllostomidae, founded by Leach in 1822. M. redmani is a West Indian species, about 12 inches in extent, and of a grayish-brown color.

monophyodont (mon'ō-fi'ō-dont), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, of simple nature, single, as teeth (< μόνος, single, + φύειν, produce), + ὀδούς (δοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. a. Having only one set of teeth: opposed to diphyodont and polyphyodont.

II. n. An animal having only one set of teeth. Monophyodonta (mon'ō-fi'ō-don'tā), n. pl. [NL.: see monophyodont.] A division of mammals containing those which are monophyodont, as the cetaceans. Sir R. Owen.

Monophysite (mō-nōf'i-sīt), n. and a. [= F. monophysite, < LGr. μονοφυσίτης, one who held that Christ has but one nature, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φύσις, nature: see physis.] 1. n. One who holds that there is but one nature in Christ; more specifically, one of a sect which teaches that there is but one commingled or compound nature in Christ, partly divine and partly human, in contradistinction to the orthodox doctrine that by the incarnation two complete and perfect natures, the divine and the human, are united without confusion or mutation in the one person of Christ. Among Monophysites in the wider sense are included the Eutychians and Monothelites. The sect of Eutychians was founded by Eutyches, who was condemned at the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451. They taught that there is but one nature in Christ, the divine. The Monophysites properly so called hold that the divine and human natures in Christ are combined into one composite nature. The first leaders of the Monophysites, and founders of the present Monophysite or Coptic Church of Egypt, were Dioscorus, condemned at Chalcedon (died A. D. 454), and Timothy Ælurus ('Cat'), made patriarch A. D. 457. In later times their most important leader was Severus, about A. D. 520, whose followers were called Severians, Corrupticolas, or Phthariolatrae, while those of an opposite Monophysite sect were known as Jukanists, Aphthartodocists, and Phantastasts. In the sixth century the Monophysites spread widely in Syria, and were named Jacobites, from Jacob Baradaeus, Bishop of Edessa, 541-78. At various times the Monophysites divided into a great number of sects, known by more than thirty different titles. These represented different shades of original Eutychianism and Monophysitism and attempts at approach to orthodoxy. The most subtle form of Monophysitism is Monothelitism (which see). Monophysitism is at the opposite pole of doctrine to Nestorianism, the orthodox doctrine as to the nature of Christ lying midway between the two. As distinguished from the Monophysites, the orthodox are called Diphysites and Meletites. At the present day the two great bodies of Monophysites are the Copts and the Syrian Jacobites. The Armenian Church is also often regarded as Monophysite or Eutychian, and the Maronites before their submission to the Roman Church were Monothelites. See Accephali (?), Agnoetes, Theopaschites, Trithelites.

II. a. Same as Monophysitism.

Monophysitism (mon'ō-fī-sīt'i-kal), a. [< Monophysite + -ism.] Of or pertaining to the Monophysites or their doctrines; of the nature of the doctrines of the Monophysites.

Monophysitism (mō-nōf'i-sīt-izm), n. [< Monophysite + -ism.] The doctrines of the Monophysites. Compare diphysitism.

Eutychianism revived in the form of Monophysitism, or the doctrine that Christ had but one composite nature. It makes the humanity of Christ a mere accident of the immutable divine nature. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 62.

monoplacid (mon'ō-plas-id), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πλακίς, a flat cake: see placenta.] Having but one madreporic plate, as a starfish: distinguished from polyplacid.

monoplacula (mon'ō-plak'ū-lā), n.; pl. monoplaculae (-lā). [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. placula, q. v.] A single-layered germ; a placula of one layer of cells, formed by vertical fission of the germ: opposed to diploplacula. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1884, p. 89.

monoplacular (mon'ō-plak'ū-lār), a. [< monoplacula + -ar.] Single-layered, as a germ; having the characteristics of a monoplacula.

monoplaculate (mon'ō-plak'ū-lāt), a. [< monoplacula + -ate.] Same as monoplacular. A. Hyatt.

monoplast (mon'ō-plást), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πλαστός, formed, molded, < πλάσσειν, form, mold.] An organism consisting of a single cell; a simple or homogeneous form-element.

monoplastic (mon'ō-plas'tik), a. [< monoplast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a monoplast.

monoplegia (mon'ō-plē'jī-ē), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πληγῆ, stroke.] In pathol., paralysis limited to a single part, as of one arm or leg. Compare hemiplegia, paraplegia.

monopleurobranch (mon'ō-plē'rō-brang), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πλευρά, side, + βράγχια, gills.] 1. a. Having gills on only one side; of or pertaining to the Monopleurobranchiata.

II. n. A member of the Monopleurobranchiata. Monopleurobranchia (mon'ō-plē'rō-brang'-ki-ē), n. pl. [NL.: see monopleurobranch.] Same as Monopleurobranchiata.

monopleurobranchian (mon'ō-plē'rō-brang'-ki-ān), a. and n. [< monopleurobranch + -ian.] Same as monopleurobranch.

Monopleurobranchiata (mon'ō-plē'rō-brang'-ki-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL.: see monopleurobranch.] A suborder of opisthobranchiate gastropods having plumose gills usually on one side, the right, under the edge of the mantle. This name was proposed by De Blainville in 1825 as that of the third order of his Paracephalophora monota, divided into 4 families, as the sea-hares and their allies. It is synonymous with Tacsiobranchiata of Cuvier. The group is also called Pomatobranchiata. Also Monopleurobranchia. J. E. Gray, 1821.

monopleurobranchiate (mon'ō-plē'rō-brang'-ki-āt), a. and n. [< monopleurobranch + -ate.] Same as monopleurobranch.

Monopneumona (mon-op-nū'mō-nē), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl.: see Monopneumones.] A division of Dipneusta or Dipnoi, containing those dipnoans which are single-lunged: distinguished from Dipneumona. The only existing representative is Ceratodus.

Monopneumones (mon-op-nū'mō-nēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πνεῦμα, lung, usually pl. πνεύματα, the lungs.] Same as Monopneumona.

Monopneumonia (mon'op-nū-mō-nī-ē), n. pl. [NL.: see Monopneumones.] Same as Monopneumona.

monopneumonian (mon'op-nū-mō-nī-ān), a. and n. [As Monopneumonia + -an.] 1. a. Having only one lung: specifically applied to the Monopneumonia.

II. n. A lung-fish, as Ceratodus. monopneumonous (mon-op-nū'mō-nus), a. [As Monopneumones + -ous.] Having only one lung; of or pertaining to the Monopneumonia, Monopneumones, or Monopneumonia.

Monopnoa (mō-nop'nō-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πνοα, breathing, < πνέω, breathe.] In Owen's classification, a "subclass of Reptilia," containing all reptiles which breathe in one way only—that is, by lungs: distinguished from Dipnoa or Branchiotoca, which breathe in two ways—that is, either by gills first and lungs afterward in the case of the same individual, or some of them by gills and others by lungs. In this scheme, not easy to define satisfactorily, Prof. Owen makes his "class Reptilia" cover not only Reptilia in the usual sense, but also Amphibia or Batrachia. His Dipnoa are then continuous with Amphibia proper. He divides Monopnoa into the orders Pterosauria, Dinosauria, Crocodylia, Chelonis, Lacertilia, Ophidia, Anomodontia, Sauropsyrgia, and Ichthyopterygia. Comp. Anat. Vert. (1868), III. 850.

monopode (mon'ō-pōd), a. and n. [Cf. LL. monopodius, one-footed, L. monopodium, a table or stand with one foot, < Gr. μόνος, single, + ποῖς (pod-) = E. foot.] 1. a. Having but one foot.

II. n. 1. Any object supported on one foot only; specifically, one of a fabled race of men having but one leg. These, the Monocelli or Scipodes, are described by Pliny (Hist. Nat., viii.) as dwelling in Ethiopia, and as possessing a single foot, so large that it served when held up to shade them from the sun when they lay down to rest.

The monopodes, sheltering themselves from the sun beneath their single umbrella-like foot. Lowell, Fire-side Travels, p. 172.

2. In bot., same as monopodium.

monopodial (mon'ō-pō-dī-āl), a. [< monopodium + -al.] Resembling or after the manner of a monopodium.

monopodic (mon'ō-pōd'ik), a. [As monopod-y + -ic.] In pros., constituting a single foot; of or pertaining to a single foot, or a measure consisting in a single foot: as, monopodic measurement: opposed to dipodic.

monopodium (mon'ō-pō-dī-um), n.; pl. monopodia (-ē). [NL., neut. of LL. monopodius, < Gr. μόνος, single, + ποῖς, one-footed: see monopode.] In bot., an axis of growth which continues to extend at the apex in the direction of previous growth, while lateral structures of like kind are produced beneath it in acropetal succession. Goebel. Compare sympodium and dichotomy.

monopody (mon'ō-pōd-i), n.; pl. monopodies (-iz). [< LL. monopodia, < Gr. μονοποδία, a single foot, esp. as a measure, < μόνος, single, + ποῖς (pod-) = E. foot.] In pros., a measure consisting of but one foot: opposed to dipody. See measure, 11.

monopolert, n. [< OF. monopolier (F. monopoleur), < monopole, monopoly: see monopoly.] A monopolist. Cotgrave.

monopolical (mon'ō-pol'i-kal), a. [< monopolic* (= Pg. monopolico) (< monopol-y + -ic) + -al.] Monopolistic.

I wish, according to the decree of Darius, that whosoever is an enemy to our peace, and seeketh, either by getting monopolical patents or by forging unjust tales, to hinder our welfare, that his house was pulled downe.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 58.

monopolisation, monopolise, etc. See monopolization, etc.

monopolist (mō-nop'ō-list), n. [= Sp. Pg. It. monopolista; as monopol-y + -ist.] 1. One who monopolizes or possesses a monopoly; one who has exclusive command or control of any branch of trade or article of commerce; specifically, a buyer up of the whole of a commodity in market for the purpose of selling at an advanced price; one having a license or privilege granted by authority for the sole buying or selling of any commodity. See monopoly.—2. One who obtains, assumes, or occupies anything to the exclusion of others: as, a monopolist of advantages.

monopolistic (mō-nop'ō-lis'tik), a. [< monopolist + -ic.] Relating to a monopoly or to a system of monopolies; of a kind promoted by monopoly; existing for the maintenance of a monopoly: as, monopolistic abuses; a monopolistic corporation.

monopolitane (mon-ō-pol'i-tan), n. [As monopolite + -an, after the erroneously assumed analogy of cosmopolitan, etc.] A monopolist.

Hee was no diving politician,

Or project-seeking monopolitane.

John Taylor, Works (1630). (Nares.)

Monopolitane of starch, tin, fish, cloth, oil, vinegar, salt, and what not.

Quoted in Oliver's Sir Walter Raleigh.

monopolite (mō-nop'ō-lit), n. [< monopol-y + -ite, after the erroneously assumed analogy of cosmopolite.] Same as monopolist.

You marchant Mercers, and Monopolites,

Gain-greedy Chap-men, perliur'd Hypocrites.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 3.

monopolization (mō-nop'ō-li-zā'shon), n. [< monopolize + -ation.] The act or process of monopolizing. Also spelled monopolisation.

monopolize (mō-nop'ō-liz), v. t.; pret. and pp. monopolized, ppr. monopolizing. [= F. monopoliser = Sp. monopolizar = Pg. monopolisar; as monopol-y + -ize.] 1. To obtain a monopoly of; have an exclusive right of trading in: as, to monopolize all the corn in a district.

The Arabs have a law that, if three camels depart at the same time, the convent shall be obliged to pay thirty plasters; which I suppose is designed to prevent any one Arab with several camels monopolizing the whole business of conveying the monks.

Pococke, Description of the East, I. 159.

2. To obtain or engross the whole of; obtain exclusive possession of.

As if this age had monopolized all goodness to itself.

Fuller.

Gold alone does Passion move,

Gold monopolizes Love!

Cowley, Anacreontics, vii.

Also spelled monopolise.

monopolizer (mō-nop'ō-lī-zēr), n. Same as monopolist, especially in sense 2: as, a monopolizer of conversation. Also spelled monopoliser.

Those senseless monopolizers of time that form the court of a duke.

Shelley, in Dowden, I. 204.

monopoly (mō-nop'ō-li), n.; pl. monopolies (-liz). [= F. monopole = Sp. Pg. It. monopolio, < L. monopolium, < Gr. μονοπώλιον, a right of exclusive sale, μονοπωλία, exclusive sale, monopoly, < μόνος, sole, + πωλεῖν, barter, sale.] 1. An exclusive privilege to carry on a traffic.

Monopolies are much the same offence in other branches of trade that engrossing is in provisions, being a license or privilege allowed by the king for the sole buying and selling, making, working, or using of any thing whatsoever; whereby the subject in general is restrained from that liberty of manufacturing or trading which he had before.

Blackstone, Com. (ed. Waite), IV. 159.

2. Specifically, in Eng. constitutional hist., and hence sometimes in Amer. law, such an exclusive privilege when granted by the crown or state to an individual, association, or corporation, for the sake of the pecuniary advantage of its exclusiveness. A privilege not granted by the state, but secured by buying up the article, is termed by the English law engrossing. The legal objection to a monopoly, in this sense of the word, is that it can be secured only by forbidding all other citizens except the favored grantee to exercise a common-law right. Exclusive privileges granted by the state to a limited number of persons for the sake of enabling the state the better to regulate the traffic for the protection of the rest of the community, as in case of banking franchises, liquor traffic, etc., are not deemed monopolies, although the same privileges would be, if conferred on a single or a very few grantees, for the sake of the pecuniary benefit to them. So the exclusive privileges conferred on inventors and authors, by the patent and copyright laws, for the sake of the encouragement of the arts and literature, and extending only to articles originally devised under that encouragement, are not deemed mono-lies. Both these classes of grants have, however, been condemned by some as partaking of the character of monopolies.

If any man, out of his own wit, industry, or endeavour, find out anything beneficial to the Commonwealth, or bring out any new invention which every subject of this kingdom may use, yet, in regard of his pains and travel therein, her Majesty perhaps is pleased to grant him a privilege to use the same only, by himself or his deputies, for a certain time. This is one kind of Monopoly. Sometimes there is a glut of things, when they be in excessive quantity, as perhaps of corn; and perhaps her Majesty gives licence of transportation to one man. This is another kind of Monopoly. Sometimes there is a scarcity or a small quantity; and the like is granted also.

Bacon, in E. A. Abbott's Account of his Life and Works.

I will have no private monopolies, to enrich one man, and beggar a multitude.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., To the Reader, p. 68.

He thinks he can never trade to his advantage unless he can have the monopoly of everything he values.

South.

3. In polit. econ., and as used in a general sense in law, such an exclusive privilege to carry on a traffic, or deal in or control a given class of articles, as will enable the holder to raise prices materially above what they would be if the traffic or dealing were free to citizens generally. In this sense, that exclusive control of a particular kind of product which results from the legitimate ownership of the only land from which it can be obtained, as in the case of some mineral waters, or earths, or ores, is sometimes spoken of as a natural monopoly, in contrast to the artificial monopolies created by state grant. See virtual monopoly, below.

4. That which is the subject of a monopoly: as, in Bengal opium is a monopoly.—5. The possession or assumption of anything to the exclusion of other possessors: thus, a man is popularly said to have a monopoly of any business of which he has acquired complete control.

Jonson, who, by studying Horace, had been acquainted with the rules, yet seemed to envy to posterity that knowledge, and to make a monopoly of his learning.

Dryden, tr. of Juvenal, Ded.

Caleb hain't no monopoly to court the scenereetas.

Lowell, Biglow Papers, 1st ser., II.

6. Loosely, a company or corporation which enjoys a monopoly.—Monopoly Act, an English statute of 1823 (21 Jaa. I. c. 3), declaring all monopolies for the manufacture, sale, or use of anything to be void, excepting to inventors their patent rights. Also known as the Statute of Monopolies.—Virtual monopoly, a term in constitutional law and the history of legislation (the appropriate applications of which have been much contested) used to characterize a business which, though not declared by law to be a monopoly or exclusive franchise protected as such, as by a patent or an exclusive charter, is yet so related to the great channels and currents of commerce that the allowing of it to enjoy the same protection as other private property and business secures to it indirectly exclusive advantages substantially equivalent to a legal monopoly. Thus the great grain-elevators of modern commerce, although erected as private property on private lands, if by their situation they have exclusive advantages for the transfer of grain from vessels at the wharf to the railroad terminus of a trunk-line, are said to constitute a virtual monopoly, because, if not subjected to a legislative power to restrict their charges such as other private property and business are not subjected to, they might be conducted in a manner oppressive to commerce.

monopolyloguet (mon-ō-pol'i-log), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πολύλογος, much talking, < πολύς, many, much, + λέγειν, speak.] An entertainment in which a single actor sustains many characters. Brande.

monoprionidian (mon-ō-pri-ō-nid'i-an), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πρίων, a saw (< πρίειν, saw), + -ιδιον, dim. suffix, + -αν.] Having small uniserial serrations; uniserrulate: specifically applied to those graptolites or rhabdophorous coelenterates which have the cells or hydrothecae in a single row: opposed to diprionidian.

monopteral (mō-nop'te-ral), a. [< monopteron + -al.] 1. In arch., formed as a monopteron.—2. In zool., having a single fin, wing, or alate part.

Monopteridae (mon-op-ter'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monopterus + -idae.] A family of symbranchiate teleostean fishes, typified by the genus Monopterus, having the shoulder-girdle directly connected with the skull, and the abdominal and caudal regions of the body excessively elongated.

monopteron, monopteros (mon-op'te-ron, -ros), n. [= F. monoptère = Sp. monopterío, < L. monopteros, < Gr. μονόπτερος, with only one row of pillars, < μόνος, single, + πτερόν, a wing, a row of columns along the sides of a Greek temple.] In arch., a type of temple or portico, usually with an inclosed circular cella, composed of columns arranged in a circle and supporting a cupola or a conical roof.

Plan of Monopteron.

Monopteron.—Temple of Vesta at Tivoli, near Rome.

Monopterus (mō-nop'te-rus), n. [NL. (cf. Gr. μονόπτερος, lit. having one wing (see monopteron), < Gr. μόνος, single, + πτερόν, a wing.)] The typical genus of Monopteridae, containing anguilliform or eel-like fishes whose fin-system is reduced to a continuous marginal membrane around the tail. M. javanicus is a common fish of the Indian archipelago, about 3 feet long.

monopterygian (mō-nop-te-rij'i-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Monopterygi, or having their characters.

II. n. A monopterygian fish.

Monopterygi (mō-nop-te-rij'i-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πτερυγ (πτερυγ), fin.] Fishes whose fins are reduced to one. Block and Schneider.

monoptote (mon'op-tōt), n. [= F. monoptote, < L.L. monoptotus (in neut. pl. monoptota), < L.Gr. μονόπτωτος, with but one case, < Gr. μόνος, single, + πτῶσις (πτῶσις), case, < πτίνω, fall.] In gram., a noun or an adjective having but one case-form. A monoptote may be (a) a word with only one case in use, or (b) a word with but one case-form which may be used for several or for all cases.

monopus (mon'ō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόπους, one-footed, < μόνος, single, + πούς (πούς) = foot.] In teratol., a monster having but a single foot or hind limb.

Monopyleæ (mon-ō-pil'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πίλη, a gate.] A division of Phaeodaria, containing those phaeodarians which have only one pseudopodal opening: opposed to Amphipyleæ.

monopylean (mon-ō-pil'ē-an), a. and n. [As Monopyleæ + -an.] I. a. Having one pore or pseudopodal opening; pertaining to the Monopyleæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A monopylean radiolarian.

monopyrenous (mon'ō-pi-rē-nus), a. [= F. monopyrene, < Gr. μόνος, single, + πυρήν, the stone of a fruit.] In bot., having but one nutlet or stone.

monorchid (mo-nōr'kid), a. [< monorchis, after orchid.] Having only one testicle; exhibiting or characterized by monorchism.

monorchis (mo-nōr'kis), n.; pl. monorchides (-ki-dēz). [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ὄρχις, testicle.] An animal or a person having only one testicle.

Monorchides, as they are called, have been known to be prolific.

A. S. Taylor, Medical Jurisprudence, p. 726.

monorchism (mo-nōr'kizm), n. [As monorchis + -ism.] The presence of only one testicle.

monorganic (mon-ōr-gan'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ὄργανον, organ: see organic.] Pertaining to or affecting one organ or set of organs.

Monorhina (mon-ō-rī'nā), n. pl. [NL.: see monorhine.] A primary division of the Vertebrata, or other major group of vertebrates, represented by the Marsipobranchii (Cyclostomi or roundmouths), the lampreys and hags (Hyperotreta and Hyperoartia), in which the nasal passage is single: distinguished from all other cranial vertebrates, or Amphirhina. Also, more correctly, Monorrhina.

monorhinal (mon'ō-rī-nal), a. [< monorhine + -al.] Having the nostril single; monorhine.

monorhine (mon'ō-rin), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ῥίς (ῥίς), the nose.] I. a. Having but one nasal passage; single-nostriled: specifically applied to the Monorhina.

II. n. A monorhinal vertebrate, as a lamprey or a hag.

Also spelled monorrhine.

monorime, monorhyme (mon'ō-rim), n. [= F. monorime, < Gr. μῦνος, single, + E. rime.] A composition in verse in which all the lines end with the same time.

Monorrhina, monorrhine. More correct forms of Monorhina, monorhine.

monoschemic (mon-ō-skē'mik), a. [< Gr. μονόσχημος, of but one form, < μῦνος, single, + σχῆμα, form.] In anc. pros., consisting of one form of foot throughout; containing spondees only or dactyls only: noting a variety of the dactylic hexameter. A hexameter said to contain only dactyls necessarily lacks the last syllable of the last dactyl—that is, contains five dactyls and a trochee. See isochronal.

monosemic (mon-ō-sē'mik), a. [< Gr. μονόσημος, having but one signification, < μῦνος, single, + σημα, a sign, mark, σημειον, a sign, mark, unit of time, mora.] In anc. pros., consisting in or equal to a single semeion (mora or unit of time); equivalent to or constituting an ordinary or normal short; monochronous: as, a monosemic arsis; a monosemic pause. See disemic, trisemic.

monosepalous (mon-ō-sep'ā-lus), a. [= F. monosépale; < Gr. μῦνος, single, + NL. sepalum, sepal.] In bot., having the sepals united by their edges: more properly gamosepalous.

monosiphonous (mon-ō-sī'fon-us), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + σίφων, siphon: see siphon.] Having a single siphon; not polysiphonous: applied in botany to certain of the higher algae (Florideae) in which the siphons or pericentral tubes are wanting. See siphon.

monodist (mō-nō'dis), n. [< Gr. μόνωσις, solitariness, separation, < μονῶν, make single or solitary, < μῦνος, single: see monad.] In bot., the isolation of an organ from the rest. Cooke, Manual.

Monosomata (mon-ō-sō'mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monosomatus: see monosomatous.] An order of Rhizopoda, containing simple single-celled or unicellular forms, naked or capsulated, such as the families Proteidae and Arcellidae. They are the ordinary normal amœbiform protozoans.

monosomatous (mon-ō-sōm'ā-tus), a. [< NL. monosomatus, < Gr. μῦνος, single, + σῶμα (sōmat-), body.] Having a single body—that is, cell; unicellular, as a rhizopod.

monospasm (mon'ō-spazm), n. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + σπασμός, a spasm.] In pathol., spasm of a particular part, as a limb or portion of a limb.

monosperm (mon'ō-spērm), n. [= F. monosperme = Sp. monospermo, < Gr. μῦνος, single, + σπέρμα, seed: see sperm.] A plant that has only one seed.

monospermal (mon-ō-spēr'mal), a. [< monosperm + -al.] Same as monospermous.

monospermous (mon-ō-spēr'mus), a. [< monosperm + -ous.] In bot., having one seed only.

monospherical (mon-ō-sfer'ikāl), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + σφαῖρα, sphere: see spherical.] Consisting of or having a single sphere.

monospondylic (mon'ō-spon-dil'ik), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + σπόνδυλος, a joint of the backbone.] Having a single centrum, as a vertebra; without intercentra, as a vertebral column; not diplospondylic or embolomerous.

monosporous (mon'ō-spōrd), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + σπόρος, a seed, + -ed.] Same as monosporous.

monosporous (mon'ō-spōr-us), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + σπόρος, a seed.] In mycology, having but a single spore, as the threads of Garia intricata or the ascus of Pertusaria communis.

monostachous (mō-nos'tā-kus), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + στάχυς, an ear of corn, a spike.] In bot., having a single spike.

Monostega (mō-nos'tē-gā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monostegus*: see monostegous.] A division of foraminifers.

monostegous (mō-nos'tē-gus), a. [*< NL. monostegus, < Gr. μῦνος, single, + στέγος, for τέγος, a roof.] Having a single covering; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monostega.

monostich (mon'ō-stik), n. [= F. monostique = Sp. monóstico, < Gr. μῦνος, single, + στιχός, a line, verse.] A single or isolated verse; also, an epigram or a poem consisting of but one verse.

monostichous (mō-nos'ti-kus), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + στιχός, a line. Cf. monostich.] Arranged in one vertical row, rank, or series, as the flowers in the spike of some species of Spiranthes; uniserial: opposed to distichous.

monostigmatous (mon-ō-stig'mā-tus), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + στίγμα, point, stigma: see stigma.] In bot., having only one stigma.

Monostomata (mon-ō-stō'mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monostomatus: see monostomatous.] 1. A suborder of acalephs, or discophoran Hydrozoa: same as Monostomea.—2. A prime series or division of Metazoa, including all metazoic animals excepting the sponges or Polysomata. Huxley, Quart. Jour. Micros. Sci., 1875.

monostomatous (mon-ō-stōm'ā-tus), a. [< NL. monostomatus (cf. Gr. μονόστομος), < Gr. μῦνος, single, + στόμα, the mouth.] Having a single mouth, pore, or stoma; of or pertaining to the Monostomata: opposed to polystomatous.

Monostomea (mon-ō-stō'mē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μονόστομος, having a single mouth: see monostomatous.] An order of acalephs, or discophoran Hydrozoa, with single central mouth and one polypite. They are free oceanic jelly-fishes, some of them of enormous size, the disk 6 or 7 feet in diameter, and the tentacles trailing 50 feet. The leading forms are Pelagia, Cyanea, and Aurelia, each of them type of a family. Also Monostoma, Monostoma, Monostoma, and Pelagiada.

monostomean (mon-ō-stō'mē-an), a. and n. [< Monostomea + -an.] 1. a. Pertaining to the Monostomea, or having their characters.

II. n. A jelly-fish of the order Monostomea.

Monostomidae (mon-ō-stō'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monostomum + -idae.] A family of digenous parasitic worms of the order Trematoda, represented by the genus Monostomum.

Monostomum (mō-nos'tō-mum), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόστομος, having a single mouth: see monostomatous.] A genus of flukes or trematoid worms, typical of the family Monostomidae, of an oval elongated form, with only one sucker which surrounds the mouth, a strong pharynx, and the sexual openings near the anterior end of the body. Several species of these parasites are named, as M. mutabile, which is viviparous and infests birds; M. bipartitum, from the gills of fishes; M. lentis, found in the crystalline lens of the human eye. Also called Monostoma. See cuts under cercaria.

monostrophe (mō-nos'trō-fē), n. [< LL. monostrophus, < Gr. μονόστροφος, consisting of a single kind of strophe, < μῦνος, single, + στροφή, a strophe: see strophe.] In pros., a poem in which all the strophes or stanzas are of the same metrical form.

monostrophic (mon-ō-strof'ik), a. [< Gr. μονόστροφικός, < μονόστροφος, consisting of a single kind of strophe: see monostrophe.] In pros., consisting of a succession of systems or strophes all of which are of the same metrical form; of or pertaining to such a succession of systems. Monostrophic composition is a subdivision of antistrophic composition, and is opposed to composition by pericopes. Most English poems which are composed in strophes or stanzas are monostrophic (as, for instance, our ordinary ballads, short- and long-meter hymns, etc.).—composition by pericopes being limited to imitations of the Greek dramatists and lyric poets. See systematic.

monostyle (mon'ō-stil), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + E. style.] In arch., having the same style of architecture throughout. Oxford Glossary.

monostyle (mon'ō-stil), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + στυλος, pillar: see style.] In arch., having or consisting of a single shaft: applied to mediæval pillars, in contradistinction to polystyle.

monostylous (mon'ō-sti-lus), a. [As monostyle + -ous.] In bot., having only one style.

monosy (mon'ō-si), a. [NL. (Morren, 1852), < Gr. μῦνος, singleness, < μονῶν, make single, < μῦνος, single: see monad.] In bot., an abnormal condition in which organs that are ordinarily entire, or more or less united, have become split or disunited, as when a normally entire leaf becomes lobed or partite. It includes two kinds of abnormal isolation—(a) when the separation is congenital (adamy), and (b) when it is the result of the separation of parts previously joined (dialysis).

monosyllabic (mon'ō-si-lab'ik), a. [= F. monosyllabique = Sp. monosilábico = Pg. monosyllábico (cf. Sp. monosilabo = It. monosillabo, adj.), < L. monosyllabus, < Gr. μονοσύλλαβος, of one syllable, monosyllabic: see monosyllable.] 1. Consisting of one syllable: as, a monosyllabic word.—2. Consisting of words of one syllable: as, a monosyllabic verse.—Monosyllabic echo, an echo of such kind that separate monosyllables are distinctly heard. This requires that the reflecting surface be about 112 feet from the observer. See echo.

monosyllabically (mon'ō-si-lab'i-kal-i), adv. In monosyllables; with the use of monosyllables.

monosyllabism (mon-ō-sil'ā-bizm), n. [= F. monosyllabisme; as monosyllab(ie) + -ism.] 1. A predominance of monosyllables; the exclusive use of monosyllables: as, the monosyllabism of Chinese.—2. The state of being monosyllabic; the character of a monosyllable.

monosyllable (mon'ō-sil'ā-bl), n. [*For monosyllabe (as syllable for *syllabe) = F. monosyllabe = Sp. monosilabo = Pg. monosyllabo = It. monosillaba, a monosyllable, < L. monosyllabus, < Gr. μονοσύλλαβος, of one syllable, < μῦνος, single, + συλλαβή, syllable: see syllable.] A word of one syllable.

She dealt in nothing but in monosyllables, as if to have spoken words of greater length would have cracked her voice. Decker, Lanthorne and Candle-Light, I.

monosyllable (mon'ō-sil'ā-bl), v. t.; pret. and pp. monosyllabled, ppr. monosyllabing. [< monosyllable, n.] To express in or reduce to one syllable. [Rare.]

Nine tailors, if rightly spelled,
Into one man are monosyllabled. Cleveland.

monosyllologism (mon-ō-sil'ō-jizm), n. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + E. syllogism.] A syllogism viewed as an isolated and independent whole.

monosyllogistic (mon-ō-sil'ō-jis'tik), a. [< monosyllologism + -istic.] Consisting of a single syllogism.—Monosyllogistic proof. See proof.

monosymmetric (mon'ō-si-met'rik), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + E. symmetry + -ic.] In crystal., noting that system of crystallization in which there is but one plane of symmetry, the clinodiagonal plane: same as monoclinic.

monosymmetrical (mon'ō-si-met'ri-kal), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + E. symmetric + -al.] In bot., applied to flowers or other structures which can be bisected into similar halves in only one plane: synonymous with zygomorphous.

monota (mō-nō'tā), n.; pl. monotae (-tē). [NL., < Gr. μῦνος for μονοτάτος, one-eared, < μῦνος, single, + ὅς (ōs-), ear, handle: see ear.] A one-handled vase.

Amphora with small monota beside it.

B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, p. 521.

monotelephone (mon-ō-tel'ē-fōn), n. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + E. telephone.] A telephone adapted for transmitting or receiving a sound of definite pitch or frequency of vibration.

monotelephonic (mon-ō-tel'ē-fōn'ik), a. [As monotelephone + -ic.] Adapted for transmitting one note or sound of definite pitch.

monotessaron (mon-ō-tes'ā-rōn), n.; pl. monotessara (-rā). [NL., < Gr. μῦνος, single, + τέσσαρες, four.] A Scriptural narrative prepared from a collation of the four evangelists; a harmony of the four gospels; a diatessaron.

monothalamian (mon-ō-thal'ā-mān), a. and n. [< monothalamous + -an.] Same as monothalamian.

Monothalamia (mon'ō-thā-lā'mi-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῦνος, single, + θάλαμος, chamber: see thalamus.] 1. A division of reticulate amœbiform protozoans, or Foraminifera, containing those whose test is single-chambered: opposed to Polythalamia. The term does not indicate any natural division of the foraminifers. See cut under Foraminifera.—2. In conch., a division of Cephalopoda, containing those cephalopods whose shell is single-chambered, as the genus Argonauta. Lamarck.

monothalamian (mon'ō-thā-lā'mi-an), a. and n. [< Monothalamia + -an.] 1. a. Single-chambered; unilocular; having but one compartment: especially applied to Foraminifera of this character, in distinction from polythalamian. See cut under Foraminifera.

II. n. An organism whose test or shell is unilocular or monothalamous: said of cephalopods, and especially of foraminifers.

Also monothalamian.

monothalamous (mon-ō-thal'ā-mus), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + θάλαμος, chamber: see thalamus.] 1. In bot., single-chambered; having but one compartment; unilocular: applied to galls upon plants, and also rarely (as by Tuckerman) to the apothecia of certain lichens.—2. In entom., having but one cavity: applied to the nests or galls of insects when they have only a single chamber.

monothecal (mon-ō-thē'kal), a. [< Gr. μῦνος, single, + θήκη, case, receptacle: see theca.] In bot., having only one loculant or cell of the pericarp.

monotheism (mon'ō-thē-izm), n. [= F. monotheïsme = Sp. monotheísmo = Pg. monotheísmo =

It. monoteismo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + θεός, God: see theism.] The doctrine or belief that there is but one God.

monothelism (mon'-ō-thē-ist), n. [= F. monothéisme = Sp. monoteísmo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + θεός, God: see theist.] One who believes that there is but one God.

monothelistic (mon'-ō-thē-ist'ik), a. [< monothelism + -ic.] Of or pertaining to monothelism; of the nature of monothelism; believing in monothelism.

Monothelitic (mon'-ō-the-let'ik), a. Same as Monothelistic.

Monothelism (mon'-ō-thel'e-tizm), n. Same as Monothelistic.

Closely connected with Monophysitism was Monothelism, or the doctrine that Christ has but one will, as he has but one person. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 62.

monothellous (mon'-ō-thē-li-us), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + θηλυς, female.] In zoöl., polyandrous: noting species in which several males serve to fecundate a single female.

Monothelism (mō-noth'e-lizm), n. [= F. monothélisme = Sp. monoteísmo; as monothel(ite) + -ism.] Same as Monothelistic.

Monothelism was the simple and natural consequence of Monophysitism, and originated from the endeavors which the State Church made in the seventh century to conciliate the Monophysites. Schaff-Herzog, Encyc.

Monothelite (mō-noth'e-lit), n. [= F. monothélite = Sp. It. monotelita, < L.L. Monothelita, < L.Gr. μονοθέλιται, the sect of the Monothelites (cf. μονοθέλιτος, of one will), < Gr. μόνος, single, + θέλειν, will, > θέλητης, one who wills.] One who holds that Christ has but one will, the divine; specifically, one of a heretical sect or party in the Eastern Empire in the seventh century, which held that in Christ there are but one will (the divine will absorbing the human) and one operation or energy (ἐνέργεια).

The Church hath of old condemned Monothelites as heretics, for holding that Christ had but one will.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 48.

The Monothelites, a sect who adopted in a modified form the views of the Monophysites, were condemned by the Sixth General Council in 680. Their opinions took root among the Maronites, a people of Lebanon, who about the end of the seventh century received the name of Maronites from Maro, their first bishop. They afterwards abjured the Monothelite heresy, and were admitted into communion with Rome in 1182.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 292.

Monothelitic (mon'-ō-the-lit'ik), a. [Also Monothelitic; < Monothelite + -ic.] Pertaining or akin to the Monothelites or their doctrine.

Monothelitism (mō-noth'e-li-tizm), n. [= F. monothélisme; as Monothelite + -ism.] The doctrine that in the person of Christ there are but one will and one energy or operation; opposed to the orthodox doctrine (dyothelism) that since the incarnation Christ has two distinct wills, the divine and the human, and two distinct but harmonious operations. The Monothelites argued that his will must be one, will being attached to personality. The orthodox urged that there must be two wills in him, as otherwise either the divine or the human nature would be imperfect, and cited the texts Mat. xxvi. 42; Luke xxii. 42; John v. 30, vi. 38. See Monothelite. Also Monothelism, Monothelism.

monothetic (mon'-ō-thet'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + θεός, verbal adj. of τίθεναι, put: see thesis.] In philos., positing or supposing a single essential element.

monotint (mon'-ō-tint), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. tint.] Drawing, painting, printing, etc., in a single tint. Compare monochrome.

The characters are mere studies in monotint. Contemporary Rev., L. 406.

monotocous (mō-not'ō-kus), a. [< Gr. μονότοκος, bearing but one at a time, < μόνος, single, one, + τίκτειν, τεκεῖν, bear (> τόκος, birth).] 1. In zoöl., having only one at a birth; uniparous, as the human species usually is; laying but one egg before incubating, as sundry birds.—2. In bot., bearing progeny (fruiting) only once, as in annuals or biennials: same as monocarpous. Also monotokous.

Monotoma (mō-not'ō-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + τομή, a cutting.] The typical genus of Monotomidae, often referred to Lathridiidae or Cryptophagidae, founded by Herbst in 1793. They are of small size, superficially resemble species of Stenopus, and have the antennae moderate, with a one-jointed club. About 25 species are known, 9 from North America, as M. americana, and the rest mainly from Europe. They are found under bark and stones and in ants' nests.

monotome (mon'-ō-tōm), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + τόμος, section, volume: see tome.] Comprised in one tome or volume. [Rare.]

This translation . . . was first published in the monotome edition of Gibbon's Miscellaneous Works.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 56, note.

Monotomidae (mon-ō-tom'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monotoma + -idae.] A family of clavicorn Coleoptera, typified by the genus Monotoma. The dorsal segments of the abdomen are partly membranous; the ventral segments are free; the tarsi are 3-jointed; the wings are not fringed; the second joint of the tarsi is not dilated; the elytra are truncate; the first and fifth ventral segments are longer than the others; the maxillae are bilobate; and the front coxae are small and rounded.

monotomoust (mō-not'ō-mus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + τρέμειν, ταπειν, out.] In mineral., having cleavage distinct in only one direction.

monotone (mon'-ō-tōn), n. [< Gr. μονότονος, of one and the same tone, < Gr. μόνος, single, + τόνος, tone: see tone.] 1. In rhet., a sameness of tone; the utterance of successive syllables at one unvaried pitch, with little or no inflection or cadence.—2. Monotony or sameness of style in writing or speaking.

He speaks of fearful massacres . . . in the same monotone of expression. Saturday Rev.

3. In music: (a) A single tone, without harmony or variation in pitch. (b) Recitation of words in such a tone, especially in a church service, sometimes with harmonic accompaniment and with occasional inflections or melodic variations; intoning; chanting. Monotone is a natural device for increasing the sonority of the voice, so that it may readily fill a large space, and is also thought by some to have a peculiar solemnity of effect. It is much used as an element in chanting.

4. Something spoken or written in one tone or strain.

"In Memoriam," . . . although a monotone, [is] no more monotonous than the sounds of nature, the murmur of ocean, the sighing of the mountain pines.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 180.

monotone (mon'-ō-tōn), v. t. and i.; pret. and pp. monotoned, ppr. monotoning. [< monotone, n.] To recite in a single, unvaried tone; intone; chant. Strictly speaking, to monotone and to intone are not the same, the latter having a technical meaning in connection with Gregorian music; but in common usage they are made synonymous.

monotonic (mon'-ō-ton'ik), a. [< monotone + -ic.] 1. Monotonous. [Rare].—2. Pertaining to a monotone; uttered in a monotone; also, capable of producing but a single tone, as a drum.

The use of Monotonic Recitation is of extreme antiquity, and was probably suggested, in the first instance, as an expedient for throwing the voice to greater distances than it could be made to reach by ordinary means.

Grove's Dict. Music, II. 855.

monotonical (mon'-ō-ton'ik-al), a. [< monotonic + -al.] Same as monotonic.

We should not be lulled to sleep by the length of a monotonical declamation. Chesterfield.

monotonically (mon'-ō-ton'ik-al-i), adv. In a monotonic or monotonous manner.

monotonist (mō-not'ō-nist), n. [< monotone + -ist.] One who talks or writes persistently on a single subject. Davies.

monotonous (mō-not'ō-nus), a. [= F. monotone = Sp. monótono = Pg. It. monotono, < L.Gr. μονότονος, of one tone, < Gr. μόνος, single, + τόνος, tone: see tone. Cf. monotone.] 1. Characterized by monotony; continued in the same tone without inflection or cadence; unvaried in tone.

Every line was perhaps uniformly recited to the same monotonous modulation with a pause in the midst.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II.

Then came silence, then a voice,
Monotonous and hollow like a ghost's.

Tennyson, Guinevere.

2. Unvarying in any respect; tiresomely uniform.

One salmon behaves much like another; and after one has caught four or five, and when one knows that one can catch as many more as one wishes, impatient people might find the occupation monotonous. Froude, Sketches, p. 85.

Monotonous function, in math., a function whose value within certain limits of the real variable continually increases or continually decreases.

monotonously (mō-not'ō-nus-li), adv. In a monotonous manner; with monotony, tiresome uniformity, or lack of variation.

monotonousness (mō-not'ō-nus-nes), n. The state or quality of being monotonous; monotony; irksome or dreary sameness.

monotony (mō-not'ō-ni), n. [= F. monotonie = Sp. monotonía = Pg. It. monotonia, < Gr. μονότονος, sameness of tone, < μονότος, of one and the same tone: see monotone.] 1. Uniformity of tone or sound; want of inflections of voice in speaking or reading; want of cadence or modulation; monotone.

Our earliest poets were fond of multiplying the same final sound to the most tedious monotony.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, I. 21.

"It is in vain longer," said my father, in the most querulous monotony imaginable. "to struggle as I have done."

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iv. 19.

2. Tiresome uniformity or lack of variation in any respect; sameness; want of variety.

At sea everything that breaks the monotony of the surrounding expanse attracts attention.

Ireing, Sketch-Book, p. 19.

Monotremata (mon-ō-trem'a-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + τρήμα (τ-), a perforation, hole, < τρεπαίνω, √ τρα, bore, perforate.] 1. In mammal., the lowest order of the class Mammalia, containing those mammals which have a single or common opening of the genital, urinary, and digestive organs, and are oviparous. The order coincides with the subclass Ornithodelphia, and also with Prototheria and Amata; it is divided into two suborders, Tachyglossa and Platypoda, respectively constituted by the families Tachyglossidae (or Echidnidae) and Ornithorhynchidae (or Platypodidae). There are mammary glands, but no nipples. There is a common cloaca, into which empty the sperm-ducts, oviducts, and ureters, and which also receives the feces, as in birds; and the females lay eggs like those of reptiles. The testes, like the ovaries, remain abdominal. There is a peculiar T-shaped episternum or interclavicle, and the coracoid joins the sternum, as in birds. (See cut at interclavicle.) There are no true teeth. The very peculiar mammals which constitute this order are the duck-mole or duck-billed platypus, Ornithorhynchus paradoxus, and several species of so-called spiny ant-eaters, of the genera Echidna or Tachyglossus and Zaglossus or Acanthoglossus. See cuts under duckbill and Echidnidae.

2. In conch., a division of geophilous pulmonate gastropods, having the external male and female orifices contiguous or common: opposed to Ditremata.

monotrematous (mon-ō-trem'a-tus), a. [As Monotremata + -ous.] Having a single or common opening for the genital, urinary, and digestive organs, as a mammal; pertaining to the Monotremata, or having their characters; monotreme; prototherian.

monotreme (mon'-ō-trēm), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + τρήμα, hole: see Monotremata.]

I. a. Same as monotrematous: as, monotreme mammals; a monotreme egg.

II. n. A member of the Monotremata, as a duck-mole or prickly ant-eater.

monotremous (mon'-ō-trē-mus), a. Same as monotrematous.

monotriglyph (mon'-ō-trī'glif), n. [= F. monotriglyphe = Sp. It. monotriglifo, < L. monotriglyphus, < Gr. μόνος, single, + τρίγλυφος: see triglyph.] In arch., the usual intercolumniation

Monotriglyph, Temple of Asos.—Archaic Doric. (From Report of Investigations, 1881, of Archaeological Institute of America.)
a, cornice; b, frieze composed of alternating triglyphs and metopes; c, architrave or epistyle.

of the Doric order, embracing one triglyph and two metopes in the entablature immediately above it.

Monotrocha (mō-not'rō-kā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνοτροχος, a one-wheeled car, prop. adj., having one wheel, < μόνος, single, + τροχός, wheel.] 1. In Ehrenberg's classification, a prime division of Rotifera, containing those wheel-animalcules in which the wheel is single, continuous, and ciliated: distinguished from Sorotrocha, with compound or divided wheel. He divided them into two orders, Holotrocha and Schizotrocha, each of two families.—2. In entom., one of two great divisions of Hymenoptera, including those groups in which the trochanters have but one joint, proposed by Hartig in 1837. It comprises the superfamilies Tribulifera, Heterogyna, Fossorea, Diplopteryga, and Anthophila. It is distinguished from Ditrocha, which includes the Phyllophaga, Xylophaga, and Parasitica.

monotrochal (mō-not'rō-kal), a. [As Monotrocha + -al.] 1. Having a single ciliated band, as a larval worm: as, a monotrochal polychæteous larva. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 8.—2. In entom., having a single trochanteric joint; of or pertaining to the Monotrocha.

monotrochian (mon-ō-trō'ki-an), a. and n. [As Monotrocha + -ian.] I. a. Monotrochous, as a rotifer; not sorotrochous.

II. n. A wheel-animalcule whose wheel is single and undivided; any member of the Monotrocha.

monotrochous (mō-not' rō-kus), a. [As Monotrocha + -ous.] Same as monotrochal.

Monotropia (mō-not' rō-pī), n. [NL (Linnæus, 1737), so called in allusion to the nodding flowers, which are 'turned to one side'; < Gr. μόνος, single, + τρέπειν, turn. Cf. Gr. μονότροπος, of one kind, living alone, < μόνος, single, + τρόπος, a turn, way, kind, < τρέπειν, turn.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, the type of the natural order Monotropæ, characterized by a solitary flower with separate petals. But one species is known, M. uniflora, of North America, Japan, and the Himalayas, the Indian-pipe, corpse-plant, or ice-plant. This plant is a root-parasite or feeds on vegetable mold; it is fleshy, white or pinkish throughout, its simple clustered stems 5 or 10 inches high, clad with small scales, the nodding flower with about ten similar sepals and petals. The pine-needle or bird's-nest, often classed as M. Hypopitys, is now referred to a separate genus, Hypopitys. See bird's-nest, 1 (b), and beech-drops.

Monotropæ (mon'ō-trō-pā-sē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1836), < Monotropia + -acæ.] Same as Monotropæ.

Monotropæ (mon-ō-trō-pē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Nuttall, 1818), < Monotropia + -æ.] A natural order of dicotyledonous plants of the cohort Ericales, typified by the genus Monotropia. It is composed of leafless parasitic herbs, with a four- to six-celled superior ovary. Nine genera are known, with 10 or 12 species, natives of woods in the north temperate zone, especially in America. They have short, scaly, unbranched stems, and no green color, but are tawny, white, or reddish.

monotropic (mon-ō-trōp'ik), a. [< Gr. μονότροπος, of one kind: see Monotropia.] Same as monodromic.

monotypal (mon'ō-tī-pal), a. [< monotype + -al.] Same as monotypic.

monotype (mon'ō-tīp), n. and a. [= F. monotype, < Gr. μόνος, single, + τύπος, type: see type.] I. n. 1. The only, single, or sole type, as a species single in its genus, a genus in its family, etc.; a typical representative alone of its kind.—2. A print from a metal plate on which a picture is painted, as in oil-color or printers' ink. Only one proof can be made, since the picture is transferred to the paper.

We do not remember to have seen the word monotype before, nor have we seen a public exhibition of examples of this curious combination of painting and printing; but the process, or something like it, is one well known among artists, and consists of taking off, on a sheet of wet paper, by means of a press, a transfer of a picture simply painted on a polished plate of metal. The Academy, No. 891, p. 384.

II. a. Monotypic.

monotypic (mon'ō-tīp'ik), a. [< monotype + -ic.] 1. Having but one type; consisting of a single representative; represented by a monotype, as a genus of one species, a family of one genus, etc.—2. Being a monotype; alone representing a given group, as a species single in its genus.

Also monotypal and monotypical.

monotypical (mon'ō-tīp'ī-kal), a. [< monotypic + -al.] Same as monotypic.

monovalence (mō-nov'a-lens), n. [< monovalen(t) + -ce.] The character of being monovalent.

monovalency (mō-nov'a-lən-si), n. Same as monovalence.

monovalent (mō-nov'a-lənt), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. valen(t)-s, ppr. of valere, be strong.] In chem., having a valence equal to that of hydrogen, represented by unity. Also, and more properly, called univalent.

monoxid, monoxide (mō-nok'sid, -sid or -sīd), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. oxid.] An oxid containing a single oxygen atom combined either with two univalent atoms or with one bivalent atom. The term is used where several oxids of the same element are to be distinguished, as carbon monoxid, CO, to be distinguished from carbon dioxid or carbonic acid, CO₂.

monoxyle (mō-nok'sil), n. [< Gr. μονόξυλον: see monoxylon.] Same as monoxylon. R. F. Burton, tr. Arabian Nights, IV, 168, note.

monoxylon (mō-nok'si-lon), n. [< LGr. μονόξυλον, neut. of μονόξυλος, made of a solid trunk: see monoxylous.] 1. A canoe or boat made from one piece of timber.—2. In the Ionian Islands, a boat propelled by one oar. Admiral Smythe.

monoxylous (mō-nok'si-lus), a. [= F. monoxyle, < L. monoxylus, < Gr. μονόξυλος, made of a solid trunk (neut. μονόξυλον, so. πλοῖον, a boat so made), also made of wood only, < μόνος, single, only, + ξύλον, wood, a piece of wood.] Formed of a single piece of wood. Dr. Wilson.

Monozoa (mon-ō-zō'), n. pl. Same as Monocytaria.

monozoan (mon-ō-zō'an), a. [As monozo(ie) + -an.] Same as monozoic or monocytarian.

monozoic (mon-ō-zō'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ζῷον, an animal.] In zool., having a single central capsule, as a radiolarian.

Monozonia (mon-ō-zō-ni-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ζώνη, a belt, girdle.] A division of myriapods. Brandt.

Monroe doctrine. See doctrine.

Monro's foramen. See foramen of Monro, under foramen.

mons (monz), n.; pl. montes (mon'tēz). [L., a mount.] In anat., the mons Veneris.—Mons Veneris, the mount of Venus, the prominence over the pubic symphysis of the human female, cushioned with fat and covered with hair.

Mons. An abbreviation of the French Monsieur.

monseigneur (mōn-sā-nyer'), n. [F. (= Sp. monseñor = Pg. monsenhor = It. monsignore, after F.), lit. my lord, < mon (< L. meus, acc. meum), my, + seigneur, < L. senior, elder, ML. lord: see senior, seignior, señor, etc. Cf. monsignor and monseigneur.] A French title of honor, equivalent to 'my lord', given to princes, bishops, and other dignitaries of the church or court. At different times the meaning has been considerably extended. Abbreviated Mgr.

Monseigneur, one of the great lords in power at the Court, held his fortnightly reception in his grand hotel in Paris. Dickens, Tale of Two Cities, II, 7.

monsieur (F. pron. mō-syē'), n.; pl. messieurs (F. pron. mē-syē'). [Formerly partly Anglicized as monseer, mounseur, mounseer; = Sp. monsiur = It. monsù, < F. monsieur, OF. monsiur (also messire, mesire = It. messer, orig. 'my sir,' i. e. my lord), < mon, < L. meus, acc. meum, my, + seigneur, OF. sire, etc. (> E. sir), contr. of OF. seigneur, seignour, etc., lord, lit. 'elder': see sir, sire, seignior, signor, señor, senior. Cf. monseigneur, of which monsieur is, on analysis, a contracted form.] 1. Literally, my lord; sir: the common title of courtesy in France, answering to the English Mr. Abbreviated M., Mons.; plural M^{rs}, Messrs.

For Monsieur Malvollo, let me alone with him.

Shak., T. N., II, 3, 144.

Did you ever know a Frenchman that could not take an affront? I warrant monseer knows what he is about; don't you, monseer?

Miss Burney, Evelina, xxv.

2. A title given to the eldest brother of the King of France.

O! let the King, let Monsieur and the Sover'n

That doth Nauarras Spain-wronged Scepter govern,

Be all, by all, their Countries Fathers cleapt.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Handy-Crafts.

3. A Frenchman: vulgarly and humorously mounseer.

A shoeless soldier there a man might meet

Leading his monseur by the arms fast bound.

Drayton, Battle of Agincourt.

Now the Baron was as unlike the traditional Mounseer of English songs, plays, and satires as a man could well be.

W. Collins, Lady of Glenwith Grange.

4. A gentleman: said of a Frenchman.

There is a Frenchman his companion, one

An eminent monseur. Shak., Cymbeline, I, 6, 65.

Monsieur de Paris, a euphemistic title given in France to the public executioner.

At the gallows and the wheel—the axe was a rarity—Monsieur (de) Paris, as it was the episcopal mode among his brother Professors of the provinces, Monsieur (d') Orleans and the rest, to call him, presided.

Dickens, Tale of Two Cities, II, 7.

monsignor (mon-sē'nyor), n. [< It. monsignor, monsignore: see monseigneur.] In the Rom. Cath. Ch., a title conferred upon prelates, and upon the dignitaries of the papal court and household. Also, in the fuller Italian form, monsignore, plural monsignori. Abbreviated Mgr.

It seemed the whole court of Rome was there—monsignori and prelates without end. Disraeli, Lothair, lxvi.

The master of the ceremonies, Monsignor Faber, advances up the Chapel. J. R. Shorthouse, John Inglesant, xxx.

Mons Mænalus. [NL.: L. mons, mount; Mænalus, < Gr. Μαίναλος, Maínalos, a range of mountains in Arcadia.] A constellation, the mountain Mænalus, formed of a few stars in the feet of Boötes. It was introduced in 1690, in a posthumous work of Hevelius. The name (that of a mountain in Arcadia) is connected with the myth of Arcas and his mother, personages identified with the Great Bear and Boötes by the Greeks. The constellation is not now admitted.

Mons Mensæ. [L., named after Table Rock at the Cape of Good Hope: mons, mount; mensæ, gen. of mensa, table.] A constellation introduced by Lacaille in 1752, between the south poles of the equator and the ecliptic. Its brightest star is of the fifth magnitude.

monsoon (mon-sōn'), n. [Formerly also monson; cf. Sw. monsoon = Dan. monsun (< E.), Sw. mousson (< F.); F. monson, monçon, now mousson = Sp. monzon = Pg. monção = It. monsone, a monsoon; with accom. Rom. term., < Malay mūsīm, monsoon, season, year, = Hind. mausim, time, season, < Ar. mausim, a time, season, < wasama, mark.] 1. A wind occurring in the alternation of the trade-winds in India and the north Indian ocean. During the half-year from April to October the regular northeast trade-winds are reversed, and with occasional interruptions, the wind blows almost a steady gale from the southwest. In some places the change of the monsoons is attended with calms; in others with variable winds; and in others, as in China, with storms and much rain. These tempests seamen call the breaking up of the monsoon. The reversed trade-wind is termed the summer, southwest, or wet monsoon, and the trade-wind is termed the winter, northeast, or dry monsoon.

The times of seasonable winds called Monsons, wherein the ships depart from place to place in the East Indies. Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 278.

They often lose the benefit of their monsoons, and much more easily other winds, and frequently their voyage. Boyle, Works, III, 771.

The summer monsoon is a much stronger current than its winter correlative; and in India this fact is recognized in popular language, since it is often spoken of distinctively as "the monsoon," the claim of the winter monsoon to the same designation being for the moment tacitly ignored. H. F. Blanford.

2. Any of the winds that have annual alternations of direction and velocity, arising from differences of temperature between continents or islands and the surrounding ocean.

All the great monsoons are found in countries and on oceans adjacent to high mountain ranges. W. Ferrel.

On the Brazilian coast, about and to the south of the tropic, there is so much regularity in the alternation of winds, although but for a few points, that their two prevailing currents, from south-east to north-east, are often called monsoons. Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 145.

monsoonal (mon-sō'nal), a. [< monsoon + -al.] Of or relating to monsoons; of regular or periodical occurrence: said of winds.

monster (mon'ster), n. and a. [ME. monstre, mounstre, < OF. monstre, F. monstre = Sp. monstruo = Pg. monstro = It. monstro, mostro, < L. monstrum, a divine omen, esp. one indicating misfortune, an evil omen, a portent, prodigy, wonder, monster, < monere, warn: see monish. Cf. monster, v., muster, monstration, etc.] I. n. 1. Anything extraordinary, supernatural, or wonderful; a thing to be wondered at; a prodigy.

For wende I never by possibilitee,

That swich a monstre or merveille mighte be.

Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, I, 616.

2. A fabulous animal of grotesque or chimerical figure and often of huge size, compounded of human and brute shape, or of the shapes of various brutes, as the sagittary, centaur, sphinx, mermaid, minotaur, griffin, manticores, etc.

This is some monster of the isle. . . . Four legs and two voices: a most delicate monster! Shak., Tempest, II, 2, 94.

Then Enoch traded for himself, and bought

Quaint monsters for the market of those times,

A gilded dragon, also, for the babe.

Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

3. Any very large animal; anything unusually large of its kind.

Where the wallowing monster spouted his foam-fountains in the sea. Tennyson, Lotos-Eaters, Choric Song.

4. An animal or a plant of abnormal form or structure; any living monstrosity. The deviation consists sometimes in an excess, sometimes in a deficiency, of certain organs or parts; sometimes in a general or particular malformation, and sometimes in the presence of organs or parts not belonging to the sex or species. The body of scientific doctrine or knowledge of such creatures is known as teratology.

5. A person regarded with horror because of his moral deformity, or his propensity to commit revolting or unnatural crimes.

He cannot be such a monster. Shak., Lear, I, 2, 102.

6. Something unnatural and horrible.

monster

By heaven, he echoes me,
As if there were some monster in his thought,
Too hideous to be shewn. Shak., Othello, III. 3. 107.
7f. An example; a pattern.

Trewly she
Was hir chefe patrone of beaute
And chefe ensample of all hir werke
And mounstre.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 912.

Gila monster. [So called from the Gila river in Arizona.] A large lizard, Holodermis suspectum, of the family Holodermidae, of clumsy figure and most repulsive aspect, notable as the only member of the order Lacertilia known to be venomous, except the very similar H. horridum, the crust-lizard, found in Mexico. The name is also given to H. horridum.—Many-headed monster. See many-headed.

II. a. Of inordinate size or numbers: as, a monster gun; a monster meeting.
monster (mon'stér), v. t. [ME. monstren, < OF. monstrier, < L. monstrare, show: see monster, n., and monish. Cf. muster, v.] 1. To exhibit; show; muster. See muster. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]—2f. To make monstrous; exaggerate or magnify extravagantly.

Men. Pray now, sit down.
Cor. I had rather have one scratch my head 't the sun
When the alarm were struck, than idly sit
To hear my nothings monster'd. Shak., Cor., II. 2. 81.

Monstera (mon'stê-râ), n. [NL. (Adanson, 1763); origin unknown.] A genus of monocotyledonous climbing shrubs of the natural order Araceae, type of the tribe Monsteroideae and the subtribe Monstereae, characterized by four ovules in a two-celled ovary. There are 12 species, natives of tropical America. They have large a, the spadix within the spathe; b, the flower.

firm two-ranked leaves, often with a row of large elliptical holes. Their flowers are small, without calyx or corolla, crowded upon a spadix, with a boat-shaped spathe, often yellow. The succulent fruit of coherent berries is, in the case of the Mexican M. deliciosa, an article of food. Several species are cultivated under glass for their singular foliage.

Monstereae (mon-stê-rê-ê), n. pl. [NL. (Engler, 1887), < Monstera + -eae.] A subtribe of plants of the order Araceae, embracing 9 genera, Monstera being the type, and about 59 species, confined to tropical regions.

monster-master (mon'stér-mâs'tér), n. A tamer of brutes. [Rare.]

This monster-master stout (Nimrod),
This Hercules, this hammer-ill.
Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., Babylon.

Monsteroideae (mon-stê-roî-dê-ê), n. pl. [NL. (Engler, 1887), < Monstera + -oideae.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Araceae (Aroideae). It embraces the subtribes Monstereae, Spathiphyllae, and Symplocarpeae, with 14 genera, Monstera being the type, and about 81 species.

monstership (mon'stér-ship), n. [< monster + -ship.] The state of being a monster: in the quotation used humorously as a title.

Cash. [It humor] is a gentleman-like monster.

Cob. I'll none on it; humour, avast, I know you not, begone. Let who will make hungry meals for your monster-ship, it shall not be I. B. Jonson, Every Man [in his Humour, III. 2.

monstrance (mon'strâns), n. [< OF. monstrance = It. mostranza, < ML. monstrantia, a monstrance, < L. monstari (to show), ppr. of

Monstrance.—French work of the end of the 14th century. (From "L'Art pour Tous.") monstrare, show: see monster, v., monstration, and cf. mustringe.] In the Rom. Cath. Ch., originally, any receptacle in which sacred relics were held up to view; after the fourteenth century, restricted to the transparent or glass-faced shrine in which the consecrated host is presented for the adoration of the people, either while being carried in procession or when exposed on the altar. It is placed in a stand, generally made of precious metal, and sometimes richly jeweled. See lunette, II. Also called expositorium, ostensory, monstrance, and theotoca.

monstration (mon-strâ'shôn), n. [< L. monstratio (n-), a showing, < monstrare, pp. monstratus, show, point out, indicate, ordain, indict, also advise: see monster, v.] A showing; demonstration; proof.

The blood burst incontinent out of the nose of the dead king at the coming of his sonne, geuling thereby as a certaine monstration howe he was the author of his death. Grafton, Hen. II., an. 38.

monstrator (mon'strâ-tôr), n. [< L. monstrator, < monstrare, pp. monstratus, show: see monstration.] An exhibitor; a demonstrator. [Rare.]

This exhibition a university ought to supply; and at the same time, as a necessary concomitant, a competent monstrator. Sir W. Hamilton.

monstricide (mon'stri-sîd), n. [< L. monstrum, a monster, + -cidium, < cadere, kill.] The slaughter of a monster. [Humorous.]

If Perseus had cut the latter's cruel head off, he would have committed not unjustifiable monstricide. Thackeray, Virginians, xxv.

monstriferous (mon-strîf'e-rus), a. [< L. monstrifer, monster-bearing, < monstrum, a monster, + ferre = E. bear.] Producing monsters.

This monstriferous empire of women . . . is most detestable and damnable. Knox, First Blast, Pref., p. 5.

monstrosity (mon-stros'i-ti), n.; pl. monstrosities (-tiz). [Also formerly monstruosity; < F. monstruosité = Sp. monstruosidad = Pg. monstruosidade = It. mostruosità, mostruosità, < LL. monstruositas (t-s), monstruositas (t-s), monstrousness, < monstruosus, monstruosus, monstrous: see monstrous.] 1. The state or character of being monstrous, or formed out of the common order of nature; the character of being shocking or horrible.

This is the monstruosity in love, lady—that the will is infinite, and the execution confined. Shak., T. and C., III. 2. 87.

In either case, it is a deviation from the normal type, and, as such, is analogous to the monstrosities, both of animals and of vegetables. Buckle, Civilization, II. vi. (Latham.)

At long intervals of time, out of millions of individuals reared in the same country and fed on nearly the same food, deviations of structure so strongly pronounced as to deserve to be called monstrosities arise; but monstrosities cannot be separated by any distinct line from slighter variations. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 23.

2. An unnatural production; a monster.

monstrous (mon'strus), a. [Formerly also monstruous, < F. monstrueux = Sp. Pg. monstruoso = It. mostruoso, mostruoso, < LL. monstruosus, monstruosus, preternatural, strange, < L. monstrum, a portent, monster: see monster.] 1. Of unnatural formation; deviating greatly from the natural form or structure; out of the common course of nature: as, a monstrous birth or production.

His Diadem was neither brass nor rust,
But monstrous metal of them both begot. J. Beaumont, Psyche, l. 15.

In monstrous plants we often get direct evidence of the possibility of one organ being transformed into another. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 392.

2. Enormous; huge; prodigious; unparalleled.

And even whole families of these monstrous men are found at this day in America, both neere to Virginia, as Captain Smith reporteth, and . . . about the Straits of Magellan, neere which he found Giants. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 38.

What a monstrous tall our cat has got!
Carey, Dragon of Wantley, II. 1.

Sown in a wrinkle of the monstrous hill,
The city sparkles like a grain of salt. Tennyson, Will.

3. Shocking; hateful; horrible: as, a monstrous delusion.

How monstrous
It was for Malcolm and for Donalbain
To kill their gracious father!
Shak., Macbeth, III. 6. 8.

They err who write no Wolves in England range;
Here Men are all turn'd Wolves; O monstrous change!
Hoswell, Letters, I. vi. 58.

What a monstrous Catalogue of sins do we meet with in the first Chapter to the Romans! Stillingsfleet, Sermons, II. III.

4f. Full of monsters or strange creatures.

Montanistic

Where thou, perhaps, under the whelming tide,

= Syn. 1. Abnormal.—2. Prodigious, vast, colossal, stupendous.—3. Wicked, atrocious, etc. (see atrocious).
monstrous (mon'strus), adv. [< monstrous, a.] Exceedingly; extremely; wonderfully: as, monstrous difficult. [Now vulgar or colloquial.]

An I may hide my face, let me play Thisby too: I'll speak in a monstrous little voice. Shak., M. N. D., I. 2. 54.

You are angry,
Monstrous angry now, grievously angry. Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, III. 1.

It is such monstrous rainy weather that there is no doing with it. Swift, Journal to Stella, x.

monstrously (mon'strus-li), adv. In a monstrous manner. (a) In a manner out of the common order of nature; hence, shockingly; hideously; horribly: as, a man monstrously wicked.

They melted down their stolen ear-rings into a calf, and monstrously cried out: These are thy gods, O Israel! Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., I. 2.

(b) Exceedingly; inordinately; enormously.

These truths with his example you disprove,
Who with his wife is monstrously in love. Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, vi.

monstrousness (mon'strus-nes), n. The state or quality of being monstrous, in any sense of that word; especially, enormity; exceeding wickedness.

The stateliness of the buildings and the monstrousness of the sepulchres. Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 29.

O, see the monstrousness of man
When he looks out in an ungrateful shape!
Shak., T. of A., III. 2. 79.

monstruosity, monstruous, etc. Obsolete forms of monstrosity, etc.

Montacuta (mon-ta-kû'tâ), n. [NL. (Turton, 1819), named after George Montagu, an English naturalist (died 1815); later also Montagua.] A genus of bivalve mollusks referred either to the family Kellidae or to the family Erycinidae, or made type of the Montacutidae. The shell is oblique, with the cartilage in a pit between two strong teeth, and there is no anterior tube. M. ferruginea is a small shell found on the northern coast of Europe.

Montacutidae (mon-ta-kû'ti-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Montacuta + -idae.] A family of bivalves named from the genus Montacuta, now generally merged in Erycinidae.

montagnard (môn-ta-nyâr'), n. [F., < montagne, mountain: see mountain.] 1. A mountaineer.—2. [cap.] One of the extreme democratic party in the legislatures of the first French revolution; hence, in general, a member of the radical or extreme liberal party. See The Mountain, under mountain.

mountain, n. A Middle English form of mountain.

montaña (mon-tan'yâ), n. [Sp.: see mountain.] See monte, I.

In the Peruvian Andes "montaña" has a peculiar meaning. It is the densely forested region on the eastern slope of the range, this country being divided into three longitudinal belts—the "Coast," "Sierra," and "Montaña," the "Sierra" being the region of the Andes proper. J. D. Whitney, Names and Places, p. 99.

montancel, n. A Middle English form of mountance.

montane (mon'tân), a. [= F. montane, OF. montain = Sp. Pg. It. montano, < L. montanus, belonging to a mountain: see mountain.] Mountainous; belonging or relating to mountains: as, a montane fauna.

montanic (mon-tan'ik), a. [< montane + -ic.] Pertaining to mountains; consisting of mountains.

Montanism (mon'tâ-nizm), n. [< Montanus (see def.) + -ism.] The tenets of a sect of the Christian church, now extinct, founded during the second century by Montanus of Phrygia. The Montanists believed in the divine and prophetic inspiration of Montanus, the continuance of the miraculous gifts of the apostolic church, the immediate approach of the second advent of Christ, and the establishment of the heavenly Jerusalem at Pepusa in Phrygia; they practised rigorous asceticism.

All the ascetic, rigorous, and chiliastic elements of the ancient church combined in Montanism. Schaff, Hist. Christian Church, II. 417.

Montanist (mon'tâ-nist), n. [< LGr. Movravvîstis, a follower of Montanus, < Movrâvîs, LL. Montanus: see Montanism.] A believer in the tenets of Montanism.

These zealots hailed the appearance of the Paraclete in Phrygia, and surrendered themselves to his guidance. In so doing, however, they had to withdraw from the church, to be known as Montanists, or "Kataphrygians," and thus to assume the character of a sect. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 775.

Montanistic (mon-tâ-nis'tik), a. [< Montanist + -ic.] Pertaining to the doctrines, customs, or character of the Montanists.

Montanistical (mon-tā-nis'ti-kal), a. [< Montanistic + -al.] Same as Montanistic.

montanite (mon-tā'nit), n. [< Montana (see def.) + *-ite*².] A rare tellurate of bismuth occurring as a yellow earthy incrustation on tetradymite at Highland in the State of Montana.

Montanize (mon'tā-niz), v. i.; pret. and pp. Montanized, ppr. Montanizing. [< Montanus (see Montanism) + -ize.] To follow the opinions of Montanus.

montant (mon'tant), a. and n. [< F. montant, an upright beam or post, also an upward blow or thrust (= Sp. montante, an upright post of a machine, a sword, = Pg. montante, a two-handed sword), < montant (= Sp. Pg. montante = It. montante), < ML. montan(t)-s, rising, ppr. of montare, mount: see *mount*². Cf. mountant.] 1. a. Rising; specifically, in her., (a) increasing, or in her increment (applied to the moon), or (b) placed in pale and with the head or point uppermost (same as haurient in the case of a fish).

II. n. 1. In fencing, apparently a blow from below upward, but the sense is uncertain.

To see these pass thy punto, thy stock, thy reverse, thy distance, thy montant. Shak., M. W. of W., II. 3. 26.

2. In joinery, the intermediate vertical part of a piece of framing which is tenoned with the rails. See cut under door.

montantot (mon-tan'tō), n. [Irreg. < Sp. montante, rising, a sword, etc.: see montant.] 1. A straight broadsword for two hands.—2. Same as montant, 1.

'Slid! an these be your tricks, your passados, and your montantos, I'll none of them.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv. 5.

mont-de-piété (mōn'dē-pē-ā-tā'), n. [F., = Sp. monte de piedad, < It. monte di pietà, lit. 'fund of pity' (cf. equiv. Sp. monte pio, 'pious fund'), < L. mon(t)-s, hill, heap, ML. also pile of money, fund, bank; de, of; pieta(t)-s, piety, ML. compassion, pity: see *mount*¹, *de*², piety, pity.] An institution established by public authority for lending money on the pledge of goods, at a reasonable rate of interest. These establishments originated in Italy in the fifteenth century, the object in founding them being to counteract the exorbitantly usurious practices of the Jews. The funds, together with suitable warehouses and other accommodations, are managed by directors, and the goods pledged are sold if the money lent on them is not returned by the proper time.

monte (mon'te), n. [< Sp. monte, a hill, mountain, wood, heap, a gambling-game, < L. mons (mont-), a hill, mountain: see *mount*¹.] 1. A tract more or less thickly covered with shrubby vegetation or scanty forests; a forest. In South America, and especially in the northern part, the word monte is used to designate more or less scantily forested regions or narrow belts of forest vegetation, while montaña is applied to broad, densely forested areas. In Mexico and California monte more generally has the signification of 'forest.'

Less than a league above there is [in New Granada] a spot destitute of trees. All such are called llano—plain—whether they be flat or hilly; and all land covered with thicket is called monte if it be but a few miles through, and montaña if more. I. F. Holton, New Granada, p. 436.

The montes of South and Central Uruguay form narrow fringes to the larger streams, and rarely exceed a few hundred yards in width. Seen from distant higher ground, they resemble rivers of verdure meandering through the bare campos, from which they are sharply defined—the reason being that the wood only grows where it is liable to inundation. Encyc. Brit., IX. 406.

2. A favorite Spanish and Spanish-American gambling-game, played with the Spanish pack of forty cards. The players bet on certain cards of a lay-out, and win or lose according as others drawn from the pack do or do not match with these. Monte was the most popular of the gambling-games of California in the early times of the gold discoveries.—Three-card monte, a gambling-game, of Mexican origin, played with three cards, of which one is usually a court-card. By skillful manipulation, the cards are so thrown on the table, face down, as to deceive the eye of the manipulator's opponent, who bets on the position of one of the cards, usually the court-card.

monte-bank (mon'te-bangk), n. A gaming-table or an establishment where monte is played; also, the bank or pile of money usually placed in front of the dealer, and used in paying the stakes.

montebrasite (mon-te-brā'zit), n. [< Montebras (see def.) + *-ite*².] A variety of amblygonite from Montebras in France.

Montefiasco (mon-te-fias'kō), n. Same as Montefiascone: an erroneous abbreviation.

Montefiascone (mon'te-fias-kō'ne), n. [It.: see def.] A fine wine produced near Montefiascone, in central Italy.

monteiro, n. Same as *montero*².

monteith (mon-tēth'), n. [So called after the inventor.] 1. A large punch-bowl of the eighteenth century, usually of silver and with a movable rim, and decorated with flutings and a scalloped edge. It was also used for cooling and carrying wine-glasses.

New things produce new words, and thus Monteith has by one vessel sav'd his name from Death.

Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, I. 188.

Silver cisterns could not have been common or often put to the baser use (rinsing forks and spoons during dinner); but when they were discarded from the table, the more interesting monteith, with its movable rim, tall punch-glasses, lemon-strainer, and ladle, took their place. N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 250.

2. [Appar. of different origin from the above, but from the same surname.] A kind of cotton handkerchief having white spots on a colored ground, the spots being produced by a chemical which discharges the color. Dict. Needlework.

monte-jus (F. pron. mōnt'zhū), n. [F., < monter, raise, + jus, juice: see *mount*², v., and juice.]

In sugar-manuf., a force-pump by which the juice from the cane-mill is raised to the clarifiers on a story above. It consists of a vessel with a well sunk in the bottom and having three valved pipes, one by which the juice is received, another by which it is discharged, and a third by which steam is admitted. The steam, entering above the surface of the juice, forces it up through the delivery-pipe to the clarifiers. The steam then condenses, and leaves a vacuum, and the operation of alternately filling and ejecting continues. E. H. Knight.

Monte-jus.

montem (mon'tem), n. [Short for L. processus ad montem, going to the hill: processus, a going forward, orig. pp. of procedere, go forward (see proceed); ad, to, toward; montem, acc. of mons, a hill, mount: see *mount*¹.] The name given to an ancient English custom, prevalent among the scholars of Eton till 1847, which consisted in their proceeding every third year on Whit-Tuesday to a tumulus or mound near the Bath road, and exacting "money for salt," as it was called, from all persons present, or passers-by. The sum so collected was given to the captain, or senior scholar, and was intended to assist in defraying the expenses of his residence at the university. The "salt-money" has been known to reach nearly £1,000.

Montenegrin, Montenegrine (mon-te-neg'-rin), a. and n. [< Montenegro (see def.), an It. translation of Serv. Crna Gora, Black Mountain (Serv. crn, black, gora, mountain); < monte, < L. mons (mont-), mountain, + negro, nero, < L. niger, black: see *mount*¹ and negro.] 1. a. Relating to Montenegro, a small country of Europe, east of the Adriatic, nearly surrounded by Austrian and Turkish territory, or to its inhabitants.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Montenegro. The Montenegrins are of Serbian race, and speak a dialect of that language.—2. [l. c.] An outer garment for women, the form of which was taken from some Eastern military costumes, close-fitting, and ornamented with braid-work and embroidery.

Montepulciano (mōn'te-pūl-chā'nō), n. [It.: see def.] A rich wine produced at or near Montepulciano, in central Italy.

Monterey cypress. See cypress, 1 (a).

Monterey pine. See pine.

montero¹ (mon-tā'rō), n. [< Sp. montero, a huntsman, < monte, a mountain, wood, < L. mon(t)-s: see *mount*¹.] A huntsman.

As Don Lorenzo approached the camp he saw a montero who stood sentinel. Irving, Moorish Chronicles, vii. 77.

montero² (mon-tā'rō), n. [Also monteiro; prop. montera*, < Sp. montera (= Pg. monteira = It. montiera), a hunting-cap, < montero, a hunter.] A horseman's or huntsman's cap, having a round crown with flaps which could be drawn down over the sides of the face.

His hat was like a helmet or Spanish montero. Bacon.

montero-cap (mon-tā'rō-kap), n. Same as *montero*².

The Montero cap was scarlet, of a superfine Spanish cloth, dyed in grain, and mounted all round with fur, except about four inches in the front, which was faced with a light blue, slightly embroidered.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, vi. 24.

The cedar bird, with its red-tipt wings and yellow-tipt tail, and its little montero cap of feathers.

Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 457.

montes, n. Plural of mons.

monteth, n. Same as monteith.

montgolfier (mont-gol'fi-ēr; F. pron. mōn-gol'fā'), n. [< F. montgolfière, a balloon, so called from the brothers Montgolfier, who in 1783 sent up the first balloon at Annonay, France.] A balloon filled with air expanded by heat.

Montgomery Charter. See charter.

month (munth), n. [Early mod. E. moneth; < ME. month, moneth, < AS. mōnath, mōnoth (in inflection syncopated mōnth) = OFries. monath, mōnad, mōnd = D. maand = MLG. manet, LG. maand = OHG. mǎnōd, MHG. mǎnōt, mānet, G. monat = Icel. mǎnuðr = Sw. månad = Dan. maaned = Goth. mēnoths, a month; cf. Gael. mios, Ir. mios, Old. mī (gen. mīs) = W. mis = OBulg. miesetsi = Serv. mjesec = Bohem. mesic = Pol. miesiac = Russ. miesyatsū = Lith. mēnesis = Lett. mēnes = L. mensis = Gr. μήν (for μηνς*), month, = Skt. māsa (for māns*, mēns), month: names derived from or connected with the name for 'moon,' AS. mōna = Goth. mēna = Gr. μήν, etc.; but the phonetic relations are not entirely clear: see *moon*¹.] 1. Originally, the interval from one new moon to the next, called specifically a lunar, synodical, or illuminative month. This seldom varies more than a quarter of a day from its mean value, which is 29.530689 days, or 29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes, and 2.7 seconds. There are, besides, other periods of the moon which are termed months by astronomers. These are—(a) The anomalistic month, or mean period of the revolution of the moon from one perigee to the next: it is 27 days, 13 hours, 18 minutes, 37.4 seconds. (b) The sidereal month, or mean period required by the moon to make a circuit among the stars: it is 27 days, 7 hours, 43 minutes, 11.5 seconds. (c) The tropical month, or the mean period of the moon's passing through 360 degrees of longitude, as from one vernal equinox to the next: it differs from the sidereal month only by an amount corresponding to the monthly precession of the equinoxes, and is 27 days, 7 hours, 43 minutes, 4.7 seconds. (d) The nodical or draconic month, which is the mean time between two successive passages by the moon through its rising node: it is 27 days, 5 hours, 5 minutes, and 36 seconds.

2. One twelfth part of a tropical year, or 30 days, 10 hours, 29 minutes, 3.8 seconds: called specifically a solar month.—3. One of the twelve parts into which the calendar year is arbitrarily divided: called specifically a calendar month. The calendar months are January, 31 days; February, 28 (except in leap-year, when it has 29); March, 31; April, 30; May, 31; June, 30; July, 31; August, 31; September, 30; October, 31; November, 30; December, 31.

4. At common law and in equity, month has been understood to mean 'a lunar month,' which is assumed to be 28 days, except when the contrary appears, and except when used of mercantile transactions, such as negotiable paper, etc. In ecclesiastical law, and now in all cases throughout the United States generally, its legal meaning is 'a calendar month,' except when the contrary appears. For the purpose of calculating interest, a month is generally considered the twelfth part of a year, and as equivalent to 30 days. 5. pl. Same as menses. Minshew; Cotgrave.

Abbreviated mo.

montmartrite (mont-mär'trit), n. [< Montmartre (see def.) + -ite.] A mineral of a yellowish color, occurring massive, found at Montmartre in Paris. It is soft, but resists the weather. It is a variety of gypsum, containing calcium carbonate.

montmorillonite (mont-mō-ril'ōn-it), n. [< Montmorillon (see def.) + -ite.] A hydrous silicate of aluminium occurring in soft clay-like masses of a rose-red color, originally from Montmorillon in France.

montoir (mōn-twor'), n. [F., < monter, mount: see mount.] A horse-block; a block to step upon when mounting a horse. Also monture.

monton (mon'ton), n. [Sp., < monte, < L. mon(t)-s, a hill, mountain: see mount.] A unit of weight employed in Mexico chiefly for ore under the process of amalgamation. It varies greatly in different mining districts, being at Guanajuato 3,200 Spanish pounds, and in some other localities only 1,800. Duport.

montre (mon'tér), n. [F., a sample, pattern, show, show-case, case of an organ, etc., < montrer, show, < L. monstrare, show: see monster, v.] 1. In organ-building, a stop whose pipes are mounted as a part of the visible organ-case, or otherwise set in a special position apart from the others; usually, the open diapason of the great organ. See also mounted cornet, under cornet, 1 (c).—2. An opening in a kiln for pottery or porcelain through which the superintendent looks to judge of the progress of the baking.

montross, n. A corrupt form of matross.
monture (mon'tūr), n. [< F. monture (= Sp. montadura, a trooper's equipments, = It. montura, livery, < monter, mount: see mount, v. The same word in older use appears as mounture.] 1. A saddle-horse. Compare mount, 2 (a).

And forward spurred his monture fierce withal,
 Within his arms longing his foe to strain.
Fairfax, tr. of Tasso, vii. 96.

2. Same as montoir.—3. A mounting, setting, or frame; the manner in which anything is set or mounted: as, the monture of a diamond.—Shaft-monture, a kind of mounting for the heddles of looms in figure-weaving. By its use warp-threads can be arranged in special systems of sheds. A mechanical draw-boy operates the heddles systematically to form the sheds in accord with the figures to be woven. Also called splitharness.

monument (mon'ū-ment), n. [Formerly also moniment; < ME. monument, monymēt, < OF. (and F.) monument = Sp. Pg. It. monumento, < L. monumentum, monimentum, that which calls a thing to mind, a memorial, < monere, remind: see monish.] 1. Anything by which the memory of a person, a period, or an event is preserved or perpetuated; hence, any conspicuous, permanent, or splendid building, as a medieval cathedral, or any work of art or industry constituting a memorial of the past; a memorial.

Our bruised arms hung up for monuments.
Shak., Rich. III., i. 1. 6.

I know of no such thing as an Indian monument, for I would not honour with that name arrow points, stone hatchets, stone pipes, and half-shapen images.
Jefferson, Notes on Virginia (1787), p. 156.

2. Specifically, a pile, pillar, or other structure erected expressly in memory of events, actions, or persons.

To fill with worm-holes stately monuments.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 946.

I would . . . pile up every stone
 Of lustre from the brook, in memory
 Or monument to ages.
Milton, P. L., xi. 326.

3. A stone shaft, or a structure of stone or other enduring material, erected over a grave in memory of the dead.—4. A burial-vault; a tomb.

Lord, if thou be he, shew me the monument that I put the in.
Joseph of Arimathea (E. E. T. S.), p. 33.

Make the bridal-bed
 In that dim monument where Tybalt lies.
Shak., R. and J., iii. 5. 203.

5. Any enduring evidence or example; a singular or notable instance.

I do much reverence the memory of so famous a man, that with the monuments of his wit . . . hath much benefited the Common-wealth of good letters.
Coryat, Crudities, l. 100.

The last ten years have seen the production of Mr. Freeman's Norman Conquest, which . . . is a monument of critical erudition and genius.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 57.

6. In surveying and the law of conveyancing, any object, natural or artificial, fixed in the soil and referred to in a deed or other document as a means of ascertaining the location of a tract of land or any part of its boundaries. In this sense the word is applied to such objects as trees, riverbanks, and ditches; and its importance is in the general rule that in case of discrepancy courses or distances mentioned in a description must give way so far as necessary to conform to a monument.

7. A treatise.

Quhen I had done refyning it, I fand in Barret's Alvarie, quhillk is a dictionarie Anglico-latium, that Sr. Thomas Smith, a man of nae less worth then learning, Secretarie to Queen Elizabeth, had left a learned and judicious monument on the same subject.
A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), Ded., p. 2.

8. Distinctive mark; stamp.

Some others [heaps of gold] were new driven, and distant into great Ingowes and to wedges square;
 Some in round plates withouten moniment.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 5.

Celtic monuments. See megalithic monuments, under megalithic.—Choragic monument, harpy monument, megalithic monuments. See the qualifying words.—Syn. 1–3. Memento, etc. See memorial.

monument (mon'ū-ment), v. t. [< monument, n.] 1. To erect a monument in memory of.

The ecclesiastical dignitaries bury themselves and monument themselves [in the cathedral], to the exclusion of almost everybody else in these latter times.
Hawthorne, English Note-Books, June 17, 1866.

2. To place monuments on; adorn with monuments: as, a region monumented with glorious deeds.

monumental (mon-ū-men'tal), a. and n. [= F. Sp. monumental, < L. monumentalis, of or belonging to a monument, < monumentum, a monument: see monument.] 1. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or connected with a monument or monuments: as, a monumental inscription.

Some have amused the dull sad years of life . . .
 With schemes of monumental fame; and sought
 By pyramids and mausolean pomp
 Short-liv'd themselves, t' immortalize their bones.
Cowper, Task, v. 182.

2. Belonging to a tomb.

Softly may he be possess't
 Of his monumental rest.
Crashaw.

3. Serving as a monument or as material for a monument; memorial; preserving memory: as, a monumental pillar.

And monumental brass this record bears,
 "These are—ah no! these were the gazetteers!"
Pope, Dunciad, ii. 313.

4. Having the character of a monument; resembling a monument.

Me, goddess, bring
 To arched walks of twilight groves,
 And shadows brown, that Sylvan loves,
 Of pine, or monumental oak.
Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 135.

5. Conspicuous and permanent; historically prominent; impressive.

Darius himself is, if we may use the expression, a monumental figure in history.
Von Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 114.

6. Conspicuous as a monument; notable; excessive; amazing: as, monumental impudence. [Colloq.]—Monumental cross. See cross, 2.—Monumental theology, the study of ancient monuments, inscriptions, coins, medals, statues, paintings, architecture, etc., in so far as they throw light upon theology.

II. n. A monumental record; a memorial.

When ras'd Messalla's monumentals must Lie with Scipio's lofty tomb in dust,
 I shall be read, and travellers that come Transport my verses to their fathers' home.
Cotton, tr. of Martial's Epigrams, viii. 3.

monumentality (mon'ū-men-tal'i-ti), n. [< monumental + -ity.] The state or quality of being monumental; the fact or the degree of serving as a monument.

monumentalization (mon-ū-men'tal-i-zā'shon), n. [< monumental + -ize + -ation.] The act of making or the state of being monumental; the recording by monuments.

This monumentalization of superhuman contemporary knowledge.
Piazzi Smyth, Pyramid, p. 32.

monumentally (mon-ū-men'tal-i), adv. 1. By way of memorial: as, the pillar was erected monumentally.—2. By means of monuments.—3. In a high degree: as, monumentally tedious. [Colloq.]

mony¹ (mon'i), a. An obsolete or dialectal (Scotch) form of many.

mony², n. An obsolete form of money.
-mony. [(a) = F. monie = Sp. Pg. It. -monia, < L. -mōnia, f., a suffix forming nouns from adjectives, nouns, or verbs, as in acrimonia, sharpness, cerimonia, a rite, parsimonia, thriftiness, sanctimonia, sacredness, etc. (b) = F. -moine = Sp. Pg. It. -monio, < L. -mōnium, neut., used similarly, as in alimonium, nourishment, matrimonium, marriage, testimonium, evidence, etc.] A suffix in some nouns of Latin origin, as in acrimony, ceremony, parsimony, sanctimony, alimony, matrimony, testimony, etc. See etymology. The suffix is not used as an English formative.

monymēt, n. An obsolete form of monument.

moo¹ (mō), v. i. [Imitative of the lowing of a cow. Cf. *mew*², imitative of the crying of a cat.] 1. To utter the characteristic cry of a cow; low.

I used to smell the grass, and see the dew shining, and hear the pretty sweet cows mooring.
Mrs. Trollope, Michael Armstrong, xxiv. (Davies.)

2. To make a noise like lowing. [Rare.]

The mooring of the waters seemed to deepen, more and more abysmally, through all the hours of darkness.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 738.

moo¹ (mō), n. [< *moo*¹, v.] The low of a cow; the act of lowing.

moo², a. and adv. An obsolete form of mo.

moo-cow (mō'kou), n. A cow. [Childish.]

The moo-cow low'd, and Grizzle neigh'd.
W. Combe, Dr. Syntax, i. 14. (Nares.)

mood¹ (mōd), n. [< ME. mood, mode, mod, < AS. mōd, mind, heart, soul, spirit, courage, pride, haughtiness, magnificence, zeal, = OS. mōd, muod = OFries. mōd = D. moed = MLG. mōt, mōit, mout, mūt, LG. mōt, mūt, mind, heart, courage, = OHG. muot, MHG. muot, sense, spirit, G. mut, muth, courage, = Icel. mōðr, wrath, grief, moodiness, = Sw. Dan. mōd, courage, = Goth. mōds, wrath; orig. appar. any strong or excited state of feeling; perhaps, with formative -d, from a root appearing in Gr. μῦσθαι, endeavor, seek, whence prob. μῦσα, muse: see *Muse*².] 1. Mind; heart.

This is his wyl after Moyses lawe,
 That ye shulde bryng your beistes good,
 And offer theme here your God to knowe,
 And frome your synus to turne your moode.
York Plays, p. 434.

2. Temper of mind; state of the mind as regards passion or feeling; disposition; humor; as, a melancholy mood.

When Fortune, in her shift and change of mood,
Spurns down her late beloved. Shak., T. of A., I. 1. 85.

Every landscape fair,
As fit for every mood of mind,
Or gay, or grave, or sweet, or stern, was there.
Tennyson, Palace of Art.

By mental moods is ordinarily understood those collective conditions of the mind which are characterized by some fundamental tone, but without any special feelings accompanied by clear consciousness of their inducing causes.
G. T. Ladd, Psychol. Psychology, p. 520.

3†. Heat of temper; anger.

Atte laste aalaked was his mood.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 902.

Who, in my mood, I stab'd unto the heart.
Shak., T. of V., iv. 1. 51.

4†. Zeal: in the phrase with main and mood, with might and main; with a will.

Saint Elyne than was wunder fayne . . .
That ilk figure of the rode Honored that with mayn and mode.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 88.

5. A morbid or fantastic state of mind, as a fit of bad temper, sudden anger, or sullenness; also, absence of mind, or abstraction: generally used in the plural.

Then turn'd Sir Torre, and, being in his moods, Left them.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

6. A state of mind with reference to something to be done or omitted; a more or less capricious state of feeling disposing one to action: commonly in the phrase in the mood: as, many artists work only when they are in the mood.

It should be remembered that the motive power always becomes sluggish in men who too easily admit the supremacy of moods. Lowell, New Princeton Rev., l. 167.

mood² (mōd), n. [A later form of model, which is preferable in both the grammatical and logical uses, though not usual in the latter: see model.] 1. In gram., same as model, 3.

The mood is an affection of the verb serving the variety of utterance. A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), p. 30.

2. In logic, a variety of syllogism depending on the quantity (universal or particular) and quality (affirmative or negative) of the propositions composing it. In the traditional logic the names of the moods (invented by Petrus Hispanus) are—First figure, Bārbara, Cālārēnt, Dārīl, Fērīō, Bārālīptōn, Cālāntēs, Dābītīa, Fāpēmō, Fīrīēōmōrūm; Second figure, Cēsārē, Cāmēstres, Festīnō, Bārōō; Third figure, Dārāptī, Fēlap-ton, Dīālmīa, Dātīal, Bōcārōd, Fērīson. These names are merely mnemonic, and many of their letters are significant. The vowel a denotes a universal affirmative proposition, e the universal negative, i the particular affirmative, and o the particular negative. By the first syllable is indicated the major premise, by the second the minor, and by the third the conclusion. For example, the name Barbara shows that the first mood of the first figure consists of two universal affirmative premises leading to a universal affirmative conclusion. The same understanding is to be had in regard to the vowels of the other words. Certain of the consonants also are significant. Thus, all indirect moods designated by a word beginning with b should be reduced to Barbara, the first mood of the first figure; all that are designated by a word beginning with c, to the second mood, Celarent; all in d to Darīl, the third; and all in f to Ferīō, the fourth. Other letters indicate how to reduce indirect to direct moods: thus s signifies that the proposition denoted by the vowel immediately preceding is to be simply converted in the reduction; p, that the proposition denoted by the vowel immediately preceding should be converted per accidens; m, that the premises should be transposed—that is, the major should be made the minor, and conversely; and c, that the mood designated by the word in which it occurs should be reduced per impossibile: whence the verses:

Simplīciter vult s vertī, p vero per accī;
N vult transponī, c per impossībile ducl.
Servat majorem, variatque secundā minorem;
Tertīa majorem variat, servatque minorem.

A mood is a lawful placing of propositions in their dewe quality or quantitie. Sir T. Wilson, Art of Logic, fol. 28.

3. In music, same as model, 7.

Anon they move
In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood
Of flutes and soft recorders; such as raised
To highth of noblest temper heroes old Arming to battle.
Milton, P. L., l. 560.

Indirect or inverse mood, a mood of indirect syllogism. See indirect.

mood³ (mōd), n. [A var. of mud, or of mother.] Mother-of-vinegar. [Prov. Eng.]

moodish (mō'dish), a. [*mood*¹ + -ish.] Sulky; sullen.

moodishly (mō'dish-lī), adv. In a moody, sulky, or sullen manner; moodily. Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, l. 166.

moodooga-oil (mō-dō'gā-oil), n. An oil obtained in small quantities from the seeds of Butea frondosa in India and Java. It is bright, clear, and fluid, and is used medicinally.

moody (mō'dī), a. [ME. moody, moody, modi, < AS. mōdig (= OS. mōdag, mōdeg, mōdig = D. moedig = OHG. muotig (only in comp.), MHG. muotig, G. mutig = Icel. mōdhugr = Sw. Dan. modig = Goth. mōdags, angry, < mōd, mood, temper: see mood.] 1†. Spirited; high-spirited; proud; obstinate.

Hof on ich herde sale,
Ful mōdi mon and proud.
MS. Digby 86, l. 165. (Halliwel.)

2†. Angry.

When, like a lion thirsting bloud,
Did moody Richard range
And made large slaughters where he went.
Warner, Albion's England, vii. 33.

3. Subject to or indulging in moods or humors; hence, peevish; fretful; out of humor; gloomy; sullen; melancholy.

Sweet recreation barr'd, what doth ensue
But moody and dull melancholy?
Shak., C. of E., v. 1. 79.

In a moody humour wait,
While my less dainty comrades bait.
Cowper, tr. of Horace's Satires, l. 5.

Moody madness laughing wild
Amid severest woe.
Gray, Ode on Prospect of Eton College.

4†. Corresponding or adapted to moods or varying states of mind. [Rare.]

Give me some music—music, moody food
Of us that trade in love. Shak., A. and C., II. 5. 1.

moody-hearted (mō'di-hār'ted), a. Melancholy. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

moody-mad (mō'di-mad), a. Mad with anger.

Moody-mad and desperate stags
Turn on the bloody hounds with heads of steel.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iv. 2. 50.

mool (mōl), n. A dialectal variant of moil.

By worms they're eaten, in mools they're rotten.
Clerk Saunders (Child's Ballads), II. 324.

Or worthy friends rak'd in the mools,
Sad sight to see! Burns, To the Toothache.

moolah, moolah (mō'lā), n. Same as molla.

moolberry, n. A Middle English form of mulberry.

Moolid (mō'lid), n. [< Ar. maulid, nativity, esp. the nativity of Mohammed.] An Egyptian festival in celebration of the birth of Mohammed and the dawn of Islamism; a birthday.

I have now a cluster of lamps hanging before my door,
In honour of the moolid of a sheikh who is buried near
The house in which I am living.
E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 307.

mooly, mooly (mū'lī), a. and n. See muley.

moon¹ (mōn), n. [< ME. moone, mone, < AS. mōna = OS. māno = OFries. mōna = MD. maene, D. maan = MLG. māne, mān, LG. maan = OHG. māno, MHG. māne, mōn, also (with ex-crescent t, due prob. in part to association with mānet, month) mānte, mānde, G. mond = Icel. māni = Sw. māne = Dan. maane = Goth. mēna (all masc.), the moon; = Gr. μήνη, the moon, = Lith. menū, the moon; cf., with appar. formative s, OBulg. miesetē, etc., moon, month, L. mensis, month, Gr. μῆς (for μῆς*), month (Mῆς, the Moon-god, L. Lunus, Mῆν, the Moon-god, L. Luna), Skt. māś (for māns*, mēns*) = Zend māś, > Pers. māh (> Hind. Turk. māh), moon, month. The relations of these forms to each other, and to the words for 'month' (see month), and their ult. root, are undetermined. The usual explanation is that the moon is the 'measurer' (sc. of time), < √ ma, Skt. mā, measure (whence ult. E. mete and measure). The L. name of the moon (luna) and the L., Gr., and Teut. names for the sun (L. sol = AS. sōl, etc.; Gr. ἥλιος; AS. sunne, E. sun, etc.) come from other roots, meaning 'shine.'] 1. A heavenly body which revolves around the earth monthly, accompanying the earth as a satellite in its annual revolution, and shining by the sun's reflected light. Next to the sun, the moon is the most conspicuous and interesting of celestial objects. The rapidity of its motion, the variety of its phases, and especially the striking phenomena of eclipses, compelled the attention of the earliest observers; and the fact that lunar observations can be made available to determine the longitude has given the theory of the moon's motion the first rank in economic importance, while the mathematical problems involved have proved most interesting and fertile from the scientific point of view. Of all the heavenly bodies (meteors excepted) the moon is nearest to us. Its mean distance is a little more than sixty times the radius of the earth, or 238,800 miles. The dimensions of the moon as compared with those of the earth are far greater than those of any other satellite in proportion to its primary. Its diameter is 2,162 miles (about 0.273 of the earth's equatorial diameter), and its volume, or bulk, is 0.0204, or about one forty-ninth of that of the earth. Its mean density, however (about 3.4 times that of water), is only about three fifths of that of the earth, and its mass about one eightieth. The inclination of its orbit to the ecliptic is 5° 8' 40". It completes its revolution around the earth in an average period of 27d. 7h. 43m. 11.5s., which constitutes the sidereal month; the ordinary, or synodical, month, from new moon to new moon again, is a little more than two days longer—29d. 12h. 44m. 2.7s. (See month.) The moon's orbital motion is subject to considerable inequalities, due to the disturbing action of the sun, and the investigation of these inequalities makes up the major part of the "lunar theory." The moon revolves on its axis once in a sidereal month, thus always presenting nearly the same face to the earth—a circumstance which has led to the fallacy of a denial of its rotation. (See rotation.) Its disk appears to the naked eye diversified by dark and bright patches, giving rise to the "man in the moon" of popular fancy (see under man); but on examination with a powerful telescope these are lost sight of, and replaced by a crowd of interesting objects, such as mountains and valleys, craters and clefts, on a scale unknown upon the earth: the surface-structure seems to be mainly volcanic, resembling very closely in certain respects, and differing most markedly in others from, that which is characteristic of volcanic regions on the earth's surface. The moon has no clouds, shows no indications of an atmosphere or of the presence of water, and is believed to have a temperature which at its maximum does not rise above the melting-point of ice. See libration.

A Part of the Moon's Surface.

To graffe and sowe in growing of the moone,
And kytte and mowe in wanyng is to doon.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 80.

What time the mighty moon was gathering light.
Tennyson, Love and Death.

2. A satellite of any planet: as, the moons of Jupiter; Uranian moons.—3. The period of a synodical revolution of the moon round the earth; a month.

This mone, in sunny daies and serene Withouten frost, thi cornea, weede hem cleene.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 46.

One twelve moons more she'll wear Diana's livery.
Shak., Pericles, II. 5. 10.

This roaring moon of daffodil

And crocus.
Tennyson, Pref. Sonnet to Nineteenth Century.

4. Something in the shape of a moon, especially of a half-moon or crescent. Specifically—(a) A crescent as a symbol or banner; especially, the Turkish national emblem. (b) In fort., a crescent-shaped outwork.

Much means, much blood this warlike Dane hath spent
To advance our flag above their horned moons.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, l. 3.

(c) In brickmaking, an implement of the nature of a sledge-bar, for slicing or loosening fires in the grates of brick-kilns. It is somewhat longer than half the width of the kiln, and has a nearly circular blade perforated in the middle, which is shoved in on the top of the grate and under the fire, to clear out ashes and brighten up the fire.

5. The golden-crested wren, Regulus cristatus. Also moonie, muin. C. Swainson. See cut under goldcrest.—6. The moon-daisy or moon-flower. Also moons.—Acceleration of the moon. See acceleration.—Age of the moon. See age.—Beyond the moon, beyond reach; extravagantly; out of depth.

Whither art thou rapt,
Beyond the moon that strivest thus to strain?
Drayton, Ecolgues, v.

Blue moon, an absurdity; an impossibility.

Yf they saye the mone is beleue,
We must beleve that it is true,
Admittynge their interpretation.

See hoax.—Moon in distance, a nautical phrase used when the angle between the moon and the sun or a star admits of measurement for lunar observation.—Mount of the moon, in palmistry. See mount, 5.—The old moon in the new moon's arms, that appearance of the moon during the first quarter in which the whole orb is made faintly visible by earth-shine.

I saw the new moon late yestreen
Wi' the guld moon in her arm.
Sir Patrick Spens (Child's Ballads), III. 154.

To bark at the moon. See bark.—To level at the moon, to cast beyond the moon, to be very ambitious; calculate deeply; make an extravagant conjecture. See also under cast. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

moon¹ (mōn), v. t. [*< moon*¹, n.] 1. trans. 1. To adorn with a moon or moons; furnish with crescents or moon-shaped marks.—2. To expose to the rays of the moon. [Rare in both uses.]

If they would have it to be exceeding white indeed, they see the it yet once more, after it hath been thus sunned and mooned. Holland.

From 7 to 10 the whole population will be in the streets, not sunning but mooning themselves. Kingsley, 1884 (Life, II. 175) (Davies.)

II. intrans. To wander or gaze idly or moodily about, as if moonstruck. [Colloq.]

He went mooning along with his head down in dull and helpless despondency. Mrs. Oliphant, Poor Gentleman, xlv.

moon-culminating (mōn'kul'mi-nā-ting), a. In astron., passing the meridian at nearly the same time and on nearly the same parallel of declination as the moon.—Moon-culminating stars, stars which culminate at about the same time and nearly on the same parallel of declination as the moon. They are the stars of which the places are given in the Nautical Almanac (generally four in number for each day) for the days on which the moon can be observed, for use in longitude determinations.

moon-culminations (mōn'kul'mi-nā'shonz), n. pl. In astron., a method of determining the longitude of a place by observing with a transit-instrument the times at which the limb of the moon and certain stars in the same part of the sky culminate, or cross the meridian. The fundamental principle is essentially the same as that involved in the nautical method of "lunar distances." Among the stars the moon's position is utilized to make known the Greenwich time—but the transit observations are more easy and accurate than those made with a sextant, and the reductions are more simple. The method has been entirely superseded by the telegraphic method wherever circumstances render the latter practicable.

mooring-stump (mōr'ing-stump), n. A fixture to which boats were formerly moored. It consisted of a large stone, weighing from 5 to 4 tons, with a hole in the middle about 8 inches in diameter, into which a straight white-oak butt, about 17 feet long, was inserted, so that at high tide some 3 or 4 feet of the stump appeared above the water. To it were attached a crab and a piece of cable, which were kept aloft by a buoy. [Gloucester, Massachusetts.]

Mooring-swivel or Mooring-shackle.

mooring-swivel (mōr'ing-swiv'l), n. Naut., a swivel used in mooring a ship to shackle two chains together so that they may not become twisted. Also mooring-shackle.

moorish (mōr'ish), a. [*< moor*¹ + *-ish*¹.] 1. Marshy; resembling a moor.

There now no rivers course is to be seen,
But moorish fennes, and marshes ever green.
Spenser, Ruins of Time, l. 140.

The Ground here [Amsterdam], which is all 'twixt Mash and Moerish, lies not only level but to the apparent Sight of the Eye far lower than the Sea. Howell, Letters, l. i. 5.

Along the moorish fens
Sighs the sad genius of the coming storm.
Thomson, Winter, l. 66.

2. Belonging to a moor; growing on a moor: as, moorish reeds.—3. Having the qualities of a moor; characterless; barren.

They be pathless, moorish minds,
That, being once made rotten with the dung
Of damned riches, ever after sink
Beneath the steps of any villainy.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

Moerish (mōr'ish), a. [*< Moor*⁴ + *-ish*¹. Cf. *Morisco, Moresque, morris*¹.] Of or pertaining to the Moors.—Moerish art, decoration, etc., the art of the Mohammedan people of northern Africa both at home and in Spain during their occupation of that country. It is a branch of the Saracenic art, and bears a close general resemblance to Arabic art, as seen in Syria, and especially in Egypt, but is generally inferior in dignity, refinement, and variety. Like other Saracenic art, it is nearly devoid of the representation of animal or vegetable life, and is especially rich in purely conventional or geometrical patterns, such as interlacings, produced in stamped and colored plaster, in glazed and painted tiles, in carving, etc. Alhambraic art is a late development of the Moorish. See cut under arabesque.—Moorish drum, a tambourine.—Moorish pottery, pottery made by the people of northern Africa: a name specifically given to the bacini built into the walls of ancient Italian churches, assumed by modern writers to have been brought from Africa as trophies.

Moorish Art.—Doorway of Mosque, Tangiers, Morocco.

moorland (mōr'land), n. and a. [*< ME. morland, < AS. mōrlānd, < mōr, moor, + land, land.] 1. n. A tract of waste land; a moor.

O the dreary, dreary moorland! O the barren, barren shore!
Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

II. a. Consisting of moorland; having the properties of a moor.

Moorman (mōr'man), n.; pl. Moormen (-men). [*< Moor*⁴ + -man.] A Moor; one supposed to be a Moor: specifically applied to Mohammedan tradesmen of Arabic descent in Ceylon.

Loku-Appu, tying the Moorman up in the sack, and taking his clothes and bundle of cloth, then hid himself.
The Orientalist, II. 53.

moor-monkey (mōr'mung'ki), n. A book-name of a Bornean macaque, Macacus maurus: so called from the blackish color. It is about 18 inches long, with scarcely any tail.

moory¹ (mōr'i), a. [*< ME. mory, < AS. mōrig, moory, < mōr, moor: see *moor*¹ and *-y*¹.] Marshy; fenney; boggy; watery.

In process of time (they) became to be quite overgrown with earth and moulds; which moulds, wanting their due sadness, are now turned into moorie plots.
Holinshead, Descrip. of England, xxii.

The dust the fields and pastures covers,
As when thick mists arise from moory vales.
Fairfax.

moory² (mōr'i), n. [E. Ind.] A blue cloth principally manufactured in the presidency of Madras in India and exported to the Malay peoples of the south. Balfour.

moost, n. An old form of moose.

moose (mōs), n. [Formerly also moosis; < Algonkin musu, Knisteneaux mousuah: said to mean 'wood-eater'.] An animal of the family Cervidae, the Cervus alces or Alces malechis of those who hold that it is the same as the elk of Europe; the moose-deer of America, by some considered specifically distinct from the elk of Europe, and then called Alces americana. It is the largest animal of its kind in America, and corresponds to the elk of Europe, being very different from the American elk or wapiti, Elaphus (Cervus) canadensis. The male may attain the height of 17 hands, and weigh 1,000 pounds or more. The form is very ungainly, with humped withers and sloping quarters, and a very heavy, unshapely head. The horns are enormous and completely palmate, with many short points. A kind of bag or pouch hangs from the throat. The limbs are thick, with broad hoofs; the tail is very short; the ears are large and slouching; and the muzzle is very broad, with a thick pendulous upper lip. The color is brown of variable shade. The female is hornless, and much smaller and more slightly built than the male. The moose inhabits the northernmost part of the United States, as northern New England, and much of British America. The cut at elk is an equally good figure of the moose.

The Beasts [of New England] be as followeth:
The Kingly Lion and the strong-arm'd Bear;
The large-limb'd Moosis with the tripping Deer;
Quill-darting Porcupines and Rackames be,
Castled in the hollow of an aged Tree.
S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 32.

moose-bird (mōs'bērd), n. The Canada jay or whisky-jack, Perisoreus canadensis: so called from its frequent association with the moose.

moose-call (mōs'kāl), n. A trumpet of birch-bark used by hunters in calling moose to an ambuscade or blind. Sportsman's Gazetteer. [U. S. and Canada.]

moose-deer (mōs'dēr), n. The moose.

moosewood (mōs'wūd), n. 1. The leatherwood, Dirca palustris.—2. The striped maple, Acer Pennsylvanicum. See *maple*¹.

moose-yard (mōs'yārd), n. A space or area in the woods occupied by a herd of moose in winter, shut in on all sides by deep snow. The snow where the animals herd together to browse upon moose-wood, moss, etc., being trampled down, a sort of inclosure is formed, which may be occupied by many individuals as long as the supply of food lasts. [U. S. and Canada.]

Mooslim, n. and a. Same as Moslem.

moost, a. A Middle English form of most.

moot¹ (mōt), n. [< ME. moot, mote, mot, imot, < AS. mōt (found only in comp.), usually gemōt, meeting, assembly (witena gemōt, assembly of counselors, parliament: see witena-gemot), = OS. mōt, muot = MLG. mote, mute, LG. mote = MHG. muoz = Icel. mōt = *Goth. gamōt (in deriv. gamōtjan, meet), a meeting (cf. Sw. mōte, Dan. mōde = E. meet, n.). Hence *moot*¹, v., and *meet*¹.] 1. A meeting; a formal assembly. In this sense obsolete, except as used, chiefly in the archaic (Middle English) form mote, in certain historical terms, as folk-moot or folk-mote, hall-mote, etc. See def. 3.

Alle the men in that mote maden much joye

To apere in his presense prestly that tyme.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 910.

The monke was going to London ward,
There to holde grete mote.

Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 88).

2. The place of such a meeting.—3. In early Eng. hist., a court formed by assembling the men of the village or tun, the hundred, or the kingdom, or their representatives. It exercised political and administrative functions with some judicial powers. Compare witena-gemot. See the quotation.

The four or ten villagers who followed the reeve of each township to the general muster of the hundred were held to represent the whole body of the township from whence they came. Their voice was its voice, their doing its doing, their pledge its pledge. The hundred-moot, a moot which was made by this gathering of the representatives of the townships that lay within its bounds, thus became at once a court of appeal from the moots of each separate village as well as of arbitration in dispute between township and township. The judgment of graver crimes, and of life or death, fell to its share; while it necessarily possessed the same right of law-making for the hundred that the village-moot possessed for each separate village. And as hundred-moot stood above town-moot, so above the hundred-moot stood the Folk-moot, the general muster of the people in arms, at once war-host and highest law-court, and general Parliament of the tribe. But whether in Folk-moot or hundred-moot, the principle of representation was preserved. In both the constitutional forms, the forms of deliberation and decision, were the same. In each the priests proclaimed silence, the ealdormen of higher blood spoke, groups of freemen from each township stood round, shaking their spears in assent, clashing shields in applause, settling matters in the end by loud shouts of "Aye" or "Nay."
J. R. Green, Hist. of Eng. People, l. i.

4. Dispute; debate; discussion; specifically, in law, an argument on a hypothetical case by way of practice.

The pleadynge used in courts and chauncery called motes, where . . . a case is appointed to be moted by certayne yonge men, contaynyng some doubtfull controverials.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, l. 14.

I hard that your Grace, in the disputes of all purposes quherwith, after the example of the wyse in former ages, you use to season your moot.

A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), Ded., p. 2.

Orators have their declamations: lawyers have their moots.
Bacon, Church of Eng.

Mark moot. See *mark*¹.—Swain moot or mote, in old Eng. law, a court of the forests, held periodically before the verderers, and having jurisdiction of poaching, etc. Sometimes written swan moot.—Wood moot or mote, in old Eng. forest law, an inferior court held every forty days, a sort of minor "regard" or inspection, in which presentments were made and attachments received.
Stubbs.

moot¹ (mōt), a. [As an adj., to be regarded as contracted from mooted. Otherwise moot point and moot case must be compounds, *< moot*¹, n., + point, *case*¹.] Relating to or connected with debatable questions; subject to discussion; discussed or debated; debatable; unsettled.

For it was a moot point in heaven whether he could alter fate or not; and indeed some passages in Virgil would make us suspect that he was of opinion Jupiter might defer fate, though he could not alter it.

Dryden, Epic Poetry.

Whether this young gentleman . . . combined with the miserly vice of an old one any of the open-handed vices of a young one was a moot point.
Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, II. 5.

-mor, -more², a. [Gael. and Ir. mor, great.] A Celtic adjective, meaning 'great,' used as a component in personal and place names: as, Canmore, 'great head,' Strathmore, 'great strath.'

mora¹ (mō'rā), n.; pl. moræ (-rē). [L., delay; hence ult. moration, demur.] 1. In anc. pros., the unit of time, equivalent to the ordinary or normal short; the semeion or primary time. See time.—2. In civil law, any unjustifiable delay in the fulfilment of an obligation, for which the party delaying is responsible. It may be either on the side of the debtor who refuses to fulfil or on that of the creditor who refuses to accept. In the first case it gives rise to an action for damages, in the latter case the debtor is discharged of liability for the loss of the thing.

mora² (mō'rā), n. [It., appar. a particular use of mora, delay, < L. mora, delay: see mora¹.] An old game still common in Italy, in which one of the players, after raising the right hand, suddenly lowers it, with one or more of the fingers extended, the other players trying to guess the number so extended.

mora³ (mō'rā), n. [Guiana name.] A majestic leguminous tree, Dimorphandra (Mora) excelsa, abounding in Guiana and Trinidad. Its hard tough wood is much esteemed for ship-building, and is also fitted for cabinet-work by its susceptibility of polish, its chestnut-brown color, and its sometimes figured grain.

Moradabad work. See work.

Moræa (mō-rē'ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1767), named after Johannes Moræus, father-in-law of Linnaeus.] A genus of plants of the order Iridæ, type of the tribe Morææ. It is distinguished by the petaloid winged branches of the style, and by the perianth being completely divided to its base. About 40 species are known, natives of tropical and southern Africa, Australia, and the Mascarene Islands. They are bulbous plants or grow from a short rootstock, with long narrow upright leaves, and several or many handsome fragrant flowers, blue, purple, yellow, or variously colored. Some species produce edible bulbs, and many from the Cape of Good Hope are cultivated for ornament, among them M. papilionacea, the butterfly-iris.

Morææ (mō-rē'ā), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1833), < Moræa + -æ.] A tribe of monocotyledonous plants of the order Iridæ, typified by the genus Moræa, and characterized by two or more flowers from one spathe, and by having branches of the style opposite the anthers and often closely applied to them. It contains about 188 species, in 12 genera; the best-known are Tigridia, Iris, and the South African Moræa and Marica.

morainal (mō-rā'nāl), a. Same as morainic.

moraine (mō-rā'n), n. and a. [< F. moraine; cf. It. mora, a heap of stones, < G. dial. (Bav.) mur, sand and broken stones, debris.] 1. n. The accumulations of rock and detrital material along the edges of a glacier. In mountains where the glaciers are bordered by cliffs, the materials of which these are composed, being loosened by frost, rain, and gravity, fall upon the ice beneath and are gradually conveyed downward, receiving additions as they move. A simple glacier has ordinarily two such lateral moraines, and when two glaciers meet and unite the two adjacent lateral moraines coalesce and form a medial moraine, and the same thing may be repeated again and again as various lateral glaciers unite themselves with the main ones. At the point where the glaciers end the detritus of the lateral and medial moraines is thrown upon the ground, and forms a more or less irregular pile of debris, called the terminal moraine.

II. a. Same as morainic.

morainic (mō-rā'nik), a. [< moraine + -ic.] 1. Connected with or formed by a moraine: as, morainic deposits; and a morainic barrier.—2. Forming or constituting a moraine: as, morainic matter.

moral (mor'al), a. and n. [Formerly also moral, morale; = D. moraal = G. Dan. Sw. moral, < F. moral = Sp. Pg. moral = It. morale, relating to ethics; as a noun, F. moral, moral condition, morale = Sp. Pg. moral = It. morale, morals; < L. moralis, relating to manners or morals (first used by Cicero, to translate Gr. ἠθικός, moral: see ethic), < mos (mor-), manner, custom, pl. *more*s, manners, customs, morals. From L. mos are also ult. E. morose and demure.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to rules of right conduct; concerning the distinction of right from wrong; ethical. In this sense moral is opposed to non-moral, which denotes the absence of ethical distinctions.

Thies bodily dedis ar tokyne and shewynge of moralle vertues, with-oute which a soule is not able forto werke gostely. Hampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 21.

The former properly relates to natural, and the latter to moral philosophy, or civil society.

Bacon, Physical Fables, III, Expi.

In Matters of Religion, Moral Difficulties are more to be regarded than Intellectual. Stillington, Sermons, III, vi.

Another sort of relation, which is the conformity or disagreement men's voluntary actions have to a rule to which they are referred, and by which they are judged of, . . . may be called moral relation.

Locke, Human Understanding, II, xxviii. 4.

We are bound to note the circumstance that the moral, which at one time coincides with the "ethical," at other times is co-extensive with the "voluntary."

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 520.

Even the feelings which we call moral, on account of their connection with will and desire, often have an indefinite part of them so combined with feelings located in the bodily organism, or so dependent on its functions for their quantity and quality, that a strict separation becomes impossible.

G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 507.

Kant says that the end of Self-love, our own happiness, cannot be an end for the Moral Reason; that the force of the reasonable Will, in which Virtue consists, is always exhibited in resistance to natural egoistic impulses.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 347.

When in his self-consciousness he [man] realized that through transgression he had become guilty, doubtless all things about him seemed different, because in his own soul there had been a moral revolution.

Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV, 645.

War is a moral teacher: opposition to external force is an aid to the highest civic virtues.

Woolsey, Introduct. to International Law, § 6.

2. In accord with, or controlled by, the rules of right conduct: opposed to immoral. In this sense moral is often used specifically of conduct in the sexual relation.

The wiser and more morale part of mankind were forced to set up laws and punishments, to keep the generality of mankind in some tolerable order.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 355.

Take a moral act. What is it that constitutes it moral? Its tendency, at least according to Shaftesbury's system, is to promote the general welfare or the good of mankind.

Fowler, Shaftesbury and Hutcheson, p. 94.

"What do you mean by a thoroughly moral man?" said I. "Oh, I suppose every one means the same by that," said Melissa, with a slight air of rebuke. "Sir Gavial is an excellent family man—quite blameless there; and so charitable round his place at Tiptop." . . . When a man whose business hours, the solid part of every day, are spent in an unscrupulous course of public or private action which has every calculable chance of causing widespread injury and misery, can be called moral because he comes home to dine with his wife and children and cherishes the happiness of his own hearth, the augury is not good for the use of high ethical and theological disputation.

George Eliot, Theophrastus Such, xvi.

3. In a special sense, relating to the private and social duties of men as distinct from civil responsibilities: specifically so used in the Hegelian philosophy.

"When St. Crispin steals leather to make shoes for the poor, that act is moral (moralisch) and wrong (unrechtlich)"—a remark which explains Hegel's use of moralisch better than much commentary.

D. G. Ritchie, Mind, XIII, 423.

4. Connected with the perception of right and wrong in conduct, especially when this is regarded as an innate power of the mind; connected with or pertaining to the conscience. See moral sense, moral law, below.

The development of a high moral sensibility can scarcely fail to bring suffering with it, as the mind recognises the meanness of actual attainment.

J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 156.

The problem of exercising the child's moral feelings is clearly connected with that of forming his moral character.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 568.

5. Capable of distinguishing between right and wrong; hence, bound to conform to what is right; subject to a principle of duty; accountable.

A moral agent is a being that is capable of those actions that have a moral quality, and which can properly be denominated good or evil in a moral sense, virtuous or vicious, commendable or faulty.

Edwards, Freedom of the Will, I, 5.

6. Depending upon considerations of what generally occurs; resting upon grounds of probability: opposed to demonstrative: as, moral evidence; moral arguments. See moral certainty, under certainty.

A moral universality is when the predicate agrees to the greatest part of the particulars which are contained under the subject.

Watts, Logic.

Physical and mathematical certainty may be styled infallible; and moral certainty may be properly styled indubitable.

Sp. Wilkins.

Be that my task, replies a gloomy clerk,
Sworn foe to mystery, yet divinely dark;
Whose pious hope aspires to see the day
When moral evidence shall quite decay,
And damns implicit faith, and holy lies,
Prompt to impose, and fond to dogmatize.

Pope, Dunciad, iv, 462.

7. Of or pertaining to morals.—8. Having a moral; emblematical; allegorical; symbolical.

By my troth, I have no moral meaning; I meant plain holy-thistle. Shak., Much Ado, III, 4. 80.

A thousand moral paintings I can show,
That shall demonstrate these quick blows of Fortune's
More pregnant than words. Shak., T. of A., I, 1. 90.

9. Pertaining to the mind; mental: opposed to physical.

Youth, thou bear'st thy father's face;
Frank nature, rather curious than in haste,
Hath well composed thee. Thy father's moral parts
Mayst thou inherit too! Shak., All's Well, I, 2. 21.

10. Pertaining to the will, or conative element of the soul, as distinguished from the intellect or cognitive part. This refers to the usual pre-Kantian division of the soul.—11. Moralizing. [Rare.]

France spreads his banners in our noiseless land, . . .
Whiles thou, a moral fool, sit'st still and criest,
"Alack, why does he so?" Shak., Lear, iv, 2. 58.

Moral cause, a person who incites another to do or not to do something.

Author here is said to be him who, proposing reasons, persuades the principal cause either to or from action; he is also called the moral cause.

Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

Moral certainty. See certainty.—Moral defeat. See moral victory.—Moral dependence, evidence, force. See the nouns.—Moral faculty. Same as moral sense.

—Moral good either virtue or a virtuous action, or a pleasure or pain coming from such an action.—Moral goodness. See goodness.—Moral inability. See inability, 2.—Moral insanity. See insanity.—Moral law.

(a) The law of conscience or duty; either a single central principle of right conduct, or the system of rules which should govern conduct. (b) See law.—Moral necessity. See necessity.—Moral philosophy. (a) The philosophy of mind; psychology. (b) Ethics; the science of morality.—Moral sense, a phrase used by Shaftesbury, but brought into greater prominence by Francis Hutcheson in 1725, to denote a determination of the mind to receive amiable or disagreeable ideas of actions, antecedent to any opinion of advantage or loss to redound from them; conscience.—Moral theology, morals viewed as a system of spiritual laws proceeding from a divine law-giver; theological ethics.—Moral victory, an actual defeat claimed as a virtual victory. This designation is often applied to a defeat which, as from the reduction of a former adverse majority in a vote, or from other concomitant circumstances, is regarded as having in it the elements of future victory, or at least as giving occasion for some measure of satisfaction.—Moral virtue, a virtue taught by natural ethics, without revelation: opposed to theological virtue, or faith, hope, charity.

II. n. 1. Morality; the doctrine or practice of the duties of life. [Rare.]

Their Moral and Economy
Most perfectly they made agree.

Prior, An Epitaph.

2. pl. (a) Conduct; behavior; course of life in regard to right and wrong; specifically, sexual conduct: as, a man of good morals.

Some, as corrupt in their morals as vice could make them, have yet been solicitous to have their children soberly, virtuously, and piously brought up.

South, Sermons. (Latham.)

I pray ye flog them upon all occasions;
It mends their morals; never mind the pain.

Byron, Don Juan, II, 1.

(b) Moral philosophy; ethics.—3. The doctrine inculcated by a fable, apologue, or fiction; the practical lesson which anything is designed to teach; hence, intent; meaning.

Wherof ensamples ben enowe
Of hem, that thiike merel drowe.

Gower, Conf. Amant, vii.

Beat. You have some moral in this Benedictus.

Marg. Moral! no, by my troth, I have no moral meaning.

Shak., Much Ado, III, 4. 78.

So, Lady Flora, take my lay,
And, if you find no moral there,
Go, look in any glass, and say
What moral is in being fair.

Tennyson, The Day-Dream, Moral.

4. An emblem, personification, or allegory; especially, an allegorical drama. See morality, 6.

The fox, the ape, and the humble-bee,
Were still at odds, being but three.

There's the moral. Now the envoy.

1 Fish. Such whales have I heard on o' the land, who never leave gaping till they've swallowed the whole parish—church, steeple, bells, and all.

Per. A pretty moral. Shak., Pericles, II, 1. 39.

In the middle of his play (be it pastoral or comedy, moral or tragedy).

Dekker, Gull's Hornet.

Lastly, Morals (or moralities) teach and illustrate the same religious truths, not by direct representation of Scriptural or legendary events and personages, but by allegorical means, abstract figures of virtues or qualities being personified in the characters appearing in these plays.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I, 23.

5. A certainty. [Slang].—6. An exact likeness; a counterpart. [Obsolete or colloq.]

He has got the trick of the eye and the tip of the nose of my uncle; . . . and as for the long chin, it is the very moral of the governor's.

Smollett, Humphrey Clinker, p. 385.

She's the very pictur—yes, the very moral of Dick Turpin's Bees.

D. Jerrold, St. Giles and St. James, p. 110. (Hoppe.)

=Syn. 2. See morality.—3. See inference.

moral¹ (mor'al), v. i. [< moral¹, a.] To moralize.

When I did hear

The motley fool thus moral on the time,
My lungs began to crow like chanticleer.

Shak., As you Like it, II, 7. 29.

morale (mō-rāl'), n. [Intended for F. moral, m., mental or moral condition, confused with morale, f., morality, good conduct, < moral, moral: see moral.] Moral or mental condition as regards courage, zeal, hope, confidence, and the like: used especially of a body of men engaged in a hazardous enterprise, as soldiers or sailors in time of war.

From a date much earlier than the day when Caesar, defeated at Dyrrachium, gained the empire of the world by so acting as to restore the morale of his army before the great contest at Pharsalia, it has been on this nice feeling of the moral pulse of armies that the skill of great commanders has chiefly depended. Encyc. Brit., XXIV, 343.

moralist (mor'al-ēr), n. [< moral, v., + -er.] A moralizer; a moralist.

Come, you are too severe a moralist.
Shak., Othello, II. 3. 301.

moralisation, moralise, etc. See moralization, etc.

moralism (mor'al-izm), n. [< moral + -ism.] 1. A moral maxim or saying; moral counsel or advice; moral sermonizing; inculcation of morality. [Rare.]

Accustomed as he was to the somewhat droning moralisms of his "congenial friends." Farrar, Julian Home, xx.
2. The practice of morality as distinct from religion; the absorption of religion in mere morality.

The first thing that disclosed to Dr. Chalmers the futility of the moralism which was all the religion he had when he began his pastorate at Kilmany was the discovery that it could not bear the scrutiny of the sick-bed.
A. Phelps, My Study, p. 301.

moralist (mor'al-ist), n. [= F. moraliste = Sp. Pg. It. moralista; as moral + -ist.] 1. One who teaches morals; a writer or lecturer on ethics; one who inculcates moral duties.

Nature surely (if she will be studied) is the best moralist, and hath much good counsel hidden in her bosom.
Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiae, p. 77.

The advice given by a great moralist to his friend was that he should compose his passions.
Addison.

The Rational Moralists (Cudworth, Wollaston, Clarke, Price) give no account of the final end of morality.
A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 257.

2. One who practises moral as distinguished from religious duties; a merely moral as distinguished from a religious person. [Rare.]

Another is carnal, and a mere moralist.
South, Sermons, VII. 236.

Sweet moralist! adrift on life's rough sea,
The Christian has an art unknown to thee.
Cowper, A Reflection on Horace, book II., ode 10.

moralistic (mor'al-ist'ik), a. [< moralist + -ic.] Inculcating morality; didactic: as, moralistic poets.

morality (mō-rāl'i-ti), n.; pl. moralities (-tiz). [< ME. moralitee = D. moraliteit = G. moralität = Sw. Dan. moralitet, < OF. moralite, F. moralité = Sp. moralidad = Pg. moralidade = It. moralità, morality, morals, < LL. moralitas (-s), manner, characteristic, character, < L. moralis, of manners or morals, moral: see moral.] 1. The doctrine or system of duties; morals; ethics.

The end of morality is to procure the affections to obey reason, and not to invade it.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

Moral philosophy, morality, ethics, casuistry, natural law, mean all the same thing, namely, that science which teaches men their duty and the reasons of it.
Paley, Moral Philos., I. 1.

The attempt to exhibit morality as a body of scientific truth fell into discredit, and the disposition to dwell on the emotional side of the moral consciousness became prevalent.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 91.

2. The character of being moral; accord with the rules of right conduct; moral quality; virtuousness: often used in a restricted sense to denote sexual purity.

The morality of an action is founded on the freedom of that principle by virtue of which it is in the agent's power, having all things ready and requisite to the performance of an action, either to perform or not perform it.
South, Sermons.

Until we have altered our dictionaries, and have found some other word than morality to stand in popular use for the duties of man to man, let us refuse to accept as moral the contractor who enriches himself by using large machinery to make pasteboard soles pass as leather for the feet of unhappy conscripts.
George Eliot, Theophrastus Such, xvi.

3. Moral conduct; the practice of the duties inculcated by the moral rules that are recognized as valid; in a general and collective sense, those forms of human conduct which are the subject of moral judgments.

Morality (in Shaftesbury's theory) is only Beauty in one of its higher stages.
Foster, Shaftesbury and Hutcheson, p. 126.

Our theory has been that the development of morality is founded on the action in man of an idea of true or absolute good, consisting in the full realization of the capabilities of the human soul.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 286.

In point of fact, however, morality means nothing more nor less than that state of natural neutrality or indifference to good and evil, to heaven and hell, which distinguishes man from all other existence, and endows him alone with selfhood or freedom.
H. James, Suba. and Shad., p. 4.

Hence—4. The practice of moral duties regarded as apart from and as not based upon vital religious principle.

All others, they [the Jews] thought, served God only with their own inventions, or placed their Religion in dull morality.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. viii.

Morality, thou deadly bane,
Thy tens of thousands thou hast slain!
Vain is his hope whose stay and trust is
In moral mercy, truth, and justice!
Burns, Dedication to Gavin Hamilton.

5. A moral inference or reflection; a moralization; intent; meaning; moral.

But ye that holden this tale a folye,
As of a fox, or of a cock and hen,
Taket the morality thereof, good men.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 620.

A genial optimist, who daily drew
From what he saw his quaint morality.
Bryant, The Old Man's Counsel.

6. A kind of drama which succeeded the miracle-plays or mysteries, and in which the persons of the play were abstractions, or allegorical representations of virtues, vices, and mental powers and faculties. A popular feature of the morality was the introduction of the Devil and a Vice who under many names attended him, and who was finally merged in the fool of the later drama.

A morality may be defined as a play enforcing a moral truth or lesson by means of the speech and action of characters which are personified abstractions—figures representing virtues and vices, qualities of the human mind, or abstract conceptions in general.
A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I. 55.

= Syn. 1-3. Morality, Morals, Manners, Virtue, Ethics. Morality (or morals) and manners stand over against each other as respectively conforming to right or propriety in the great duties and in the minor forms of action and intercourse. Morality is often popularly applied to conformity to right in that particular in which right conduct is most felt to be important, as chastity or honesty. Virtue is morality of the fullest type and regarded as a part of personal character. Ethics is the technical, as morals is the popular, name for the science of virtue.

moralization (mor'al-i-zā'shōn), n. [< F. moralisation = Sp. moralizacōn = Pg. moralizaçāo = It. moralizzazione, < ML. moralizatio (-n), moralizatio (-n), < moralizare, moralize: see moralize.] 1. The act of moralizing or reflecting upon morals; a moral reflection.—2. The act of giving a moral meaning or effect to something; explanation in a moral sense.

It is more commendable, and also commodious, if the players have red the moralization of the cheese, and when they playe do thynke vpon it.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, l. 26.

Annexed to the fable is a moralization of twice the length in the octave stanza.
T. Watson, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III. 417.

John de Vigney wrote a book which he called "The Moralization of Chess," wherein he assures us that this game was invented by a philosopher named Xerxes in the reign of Evil Merodach, king of Babylon, and was made known to that monarch in order to engage his attention and correct his manners. "There are three reasons," says de Vigney, "which induced the philosopher to institute this new pastime: the first, to reclaim a wicked king; the second, to prevent idleness; and the third, practically to demonstrate the nature and necessity of nobleness."
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 408.

3. The act of rendering moral; subjection to moral rules; the process of giving a moral character to something.

The elimination of ethics, then, as a system of precepts, involves no intrinsic difficulties other than those involved in the admission of a natural science that can account for the moralization of man.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 8.

The highest type of moralization lies in acquiring such an abstract basis of principle as makes a man a spontaneous and independent fountain of justice and goodness, not a mere channel through which runs a public and common beneficence.
W. Wallace, Mind, XIII. 425.

Also spelled moralisation.

moralize (mor'al-iz), v.; pret. and pp. moralized, ppr. moralizing. [= D. moraliseren = G. moralisieren = Sw. moralisera = Dan. moralisere, < F. moraliser = Sp. Pg. moralizar = It. moralizzare, < ML. moralizare, moralize, < L. moralis, moral: see moral and -ize.] I. trans. 1. To apply to a moral purpose, or to explain in a moral sense; draw a moral from; found moral reflections on.

But what said Jaques?
Did he not moralize this spectacle?
Shak., As you Like it, II. 1. 44.

2. To supply with a moral or practical lesson; furnish with edifying examples.

Fierce warres and faithful loves shall moralize my song.
Spenser, F. Q., Prol.

High as their Trumpets Tune his Lyre he strung,
And with his Prince's Arms he moraliz'd his Song.
Prior, Ode to the Queen, st. 1.

While chastening thoughts of sweetest use, bestowed
By wisdom, moralize his pensive road.
Wordsworth.

3. To exemplify the moral of: as, to moralize a fable. [Rare.]

That which is said of the elephant, that being guilty of his deformity he cannot abide to look on his own face in the water (but seeks for troubled and muddy channels), we see well moralized in men of evil conscience, who know their souls are so filthy that they dare not so much as view them.
Ep. Hall, Meditations and Vows, II. § 4.

This fable is moralized in a common proverb.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

4. To render moral; give a moral character to. It had a large share in moralizing the poor white people of the country.
G. Ramsay.

'Tis yours with Breeding to refine the Age,
To chasten Wit, and Moralize the Stage.
Steele, Conscious Lovers, Prol.

As a rule, it will only be to a man already pretty thoroughly moralized by the best social influences that it will occur to reproach himself with having unworthy motives even in irreproachable conduct.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 300.

5. To affect strongly the moral or religious sense of; bring into a state of intense moral or religious feeling. [Rare.]

The negroes and many of the poor whites were, for a week or two, not exactly "demoralized" [by an earthquake], but intensely moralized, giving themselves to religious exercises of a highly emotional character.
Science, IX. 491.

II. intrans. 1. To make moral reflections; draw practical lessons from the facts of life.

Thou hear'st me moralize,
Applying this to that, and so to so,
For love can comment upon every woe.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 712.

I know you come abroad only to moralize and make observations.
Steele, Tatler, No. 170.

Peter of Blois moralizing "de praestigis fortunae," on the magic tricks of Fortune exemplified in the career of his royal patron. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 147.

2. To have an influence, especially a beneficial influence, on morals.

It is not so much that a social life passed in peaceful occupation is positively moralizing as that a social life passed in war is positively demoralizing.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 575.

Also spelled moralise.

moralizer (mor'al-i-zēr), n. 1. One who moralizes or makes moral reflections; an instructor in morals.

My uncle was a moralizer who mistook his apophthegms for principles.
T. Hook, Sayings and Doings.

In fact there is scarcely any point upon which moralizers have dwelt with more emphasis than this, that man's forecast of pleasure is continually erroneous.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 121.

2t. One who has a habit of finding an allegory or hidden meaning in passages.

Moralizers, you that wrest a never meant meaning out of everything, applying all things to the present time, keep your attention for the common stage.
Nash, Samner's Last Will and Testament.

Also spelled moraliser.

moralizing (mor'al-i-zing), n. [Verbal n. of moralize, v.] A moral reflection; a moralization. Also spelled moralising.

It will be seen by these edifying moralizings how eminently Scriptural was the course of Sam's mind.
H. B. Stone, Oldtown, p. 359.

morally (mor'al-i), adv. 1. From a moral point of view; with reference to the moral law; in a moral or ethical sense; ethically.

By good, morally so called, bonum honestum ought chiefly to be understood.
South, Sermons.

The essential thing morally is the man's direction of himself to the realization of a conceived or imagined object, whether circumstances allow of its issuing in outward action, action that affects the senses of other people, or no.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 144.

2. In accordance with moral law; rightly; virtuously; uprightly.

To take away rewards and punishments is only pleasing to a man who resolves not to live morally.
Dryden.

3. Virtually; practically; to all intents and purposes.

It is morally impossible for a hypocrite to keep himself long on his guard.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

MORASS (mō-rās'), n. [= G. morast = Sw. moras = Dan. morads, < D. moeras, MD. moerasch, moorasch, maerasch = LG. MLG. moras, a marsh, fen; prob. orig. adj., MD. moerisch* (= E. moorish), belonging to a moor, confused appar. with F. marais, > ME. marais, etc., a marsh: see marish.] A tract of low, soft, wet ground the drainage of which is insufficient either from its depressed situation or from its uniform flatness; a marsh; a swamp; a bog; a fen.

We know its [the forest's] walls of thorny vines,
Its glades of reedy grass,
Its safe and silent islands
Within the dark morass.

Bryant, Song of Marion's Men.

Morass ore, bog-iron ore. = Syn. Swamp, etc. See marsh.

The sides and top are covered with morassy earth.

Pennant.

morat (mō-rat), n. [< It. morato, mulberry-colored, < moro, < L. morum, a mulberry: see more.] A beverage composed of honey flavored with mulberry-juice.

There was grace after meat with a fist on the board,
And down went the morat, and out flew the sword.

Sir H. Taylor, Edwin the Fair, ll. 6.

moratet, a. [< L. moratus, mannered, < mos (mor-), manner: see moral.] Mannered.

To see a man well morate so seldom is applauded.

Gaule, Magastromancer, p. 133. (Encyc. Dict.)

moration (mō-rā'shon), n. [< L. moratio(n)], delay, < morari, pp. moratus, delay, tarry, < mora, delay: see moral.] The act of staying, delaying, or lingering; delay.

For therein [in the northern hemisphere, and in the apogee] his moration is slower, and so his heat respectively unto those habitations as of duration, so also of more effect.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 10.

Moravian (mō-rā'vi-an), a. and n. [< Moravia (see def.) + -an.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to Moravia or the Moravians.—2. Pertaining to the religious denomination of the Moravians.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Moravia, a crownland of the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary, lying southeast of Bohemia. The Moravians are Slavs in race and language, closely allied to the Czechs.—2. A member of the Christian denomination entitled the Unitas Fratrum or United Brethren, which traces its origin to John Huss. Its members were expelled from Bohemia and from Moravia in 1627, but in 1722 a remnant settled in Herrnhut, Saxony (hence the brethren are sometimes, in Germany, called Herrnhuter). The organization at present has three home provinces (German, British, and American—each of which has its own government by synod) and several mission provinces. All these together form a whole, represented by a general synod, which meets every ten years in Herrnhut. The ministers are bishops (not diocesan), presbyters, and deacons. The worship is liturgical. The members of the denomination believe in the Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice, and maintain the doctrines of the total depravity of human nature, the love of God the Father, the actual humanity and godhead of Jesus Christ, the atonement, the work of the Holy Spirit, good works as the fruit of the Spirit, the second coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead. The Moravians are especially noted for their energy and success in missionary work.

Moravianism (mō-rā'vi-an-izm), n. [< Moravian + -ism.] The religious doctrines and church polity of the Moravians, or United Brethren.

moray (mō-rā), n. [Also maray, muray, murry; origin uncertain.] One of many apodal eel-like fishes of the family Muraenidae, and especially of the genus Muraena, of which there are several subdivisions, as Sidera. The spotted moray is M. (Sidera) muringa, of the tropical Atlantic, everywhere with innumerable small dark spots in a fine network of the whitish ground-color. Several other morays occur on the southern Atlantic coast of the United States, and M. mordax is a Californian moray attaining a length of 5 feet.

Spotted Moray (Sidera muringa).

morbid (mōr'bid), a. [< F. morbide = Sp. morbido = Pg. It. morbido, < L. morbidus, sickly, < morbus, disease: see morbus.] 1. Diseased; sickly; not sound and healthful. As applied to mental conditions, it commonly implies an over-sensitive state, involving depression of spirits, in which matters affecting the emotions assume an exaggerated significance.

A vicious ingenuity, a morbid quickness to perceive resemblances and analogies between things apparently heterogeneous.

Macaulay, Dryden.

The morbid asceticism that culminates in the life of the Buddhist saint, eating his food with loathing from the alms-bowl that he carries, as though it held medicine.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 98.

2. Proceeding from or characteristic of disease or a diseased condition.

Whilst the distempers of a relaxed fibre prognosticate and prepare all the morbid force of convulsion in the body of the state.

Burke, A Regicide Peace, I.

3. Relating to disease: as, morbid or pathological anatomy.—Morbid concretions. See concretion. = Syn. 1. Diseased, etc. See sick.

morbidezza (mōr-bi-det'zā), n. [< It. (> Sp. Pg. morbidez = F. morbidesse), sickliness, delicacy, < morbido, sickly: see morbid.] That quality of flesh-painting which simulates the suppleness, elastic firmness, and soft delicacy of natural flesh.

Nature has been closely consulted, and has revealed to the master a few delicate touches which serve to accentuate the movement, and to give to the flesh that morbidezza which is the illusion of the softness and palpitancy of life.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 248.

morbidity (mōr-bid'i-ti), n. [< F. morbidity; as morbid + -ity.] 1. A morbid condition or state; morbidity.

Unable from some defect or morbidity.

Kingley.

There are no women to chaff with, and to rub your mind out of its morbidity.

S. Bowles, in Merriam, I. 369.

2. The proportion of diseased persons in a community; the sick-rate. [Recent.]

This term, which is of recent introduction, is employed to denote the amount of disease or illness existing in a given community; and, as "mortality" expresses the death-rate, so morbidity indicates the sick-rate, whether the disease be fatal or not.

Quain, Med. Dict., p. 998.

morbidity (mōr'bid-li), adv. In a morbid or diseased manner; in a way that indicates a diseased or morbid condition. See morbid, 1.

The actions of men amply prove that the faculty which gives birth to those arts is morbidity active.

Macaulay, Dryden.

morbidity (mōr'bid-nes), n. The state of being morbid, diseased, sickly, or unsound; morbidity.

morbiferous (mōr-bif'e-ras), a. [As morbiferous + -al.] Bringing or inducing disease.

morbific (mōr-bif'ik), a. [= F. morbifique = Sp. morbifico = Pg. It. morbifico, < L. as if "morbificus" (> LL. morificare, produce disease), < morbus, disease, + facere, make.] Causing disease; inducing disease.

Nothing but the removal of the feverish and morbific matter within can carry off the distemper.

South, Sermons, VI. 811.

Morbific agent. See agent.
morbifical (mōr-bif'i-kal), a. [< morbific + -al.] Same as morbific.

morbifically (mōr-bif'i-kal-i), adv. In a morbific manner; so as to cause or generate disease.

morbilli (mōr-bil'i), n. [ML., dim. of L. morbus, disease: see morbus.] Same as measles, 1.
morbilloform (mōr-bil'i-fōrm), a. [< ML. morbilli, measles, + L. forma, form.] In pathol., resembling measles.

morbillos (mōr-bil'us), a. [= F. morbillus = It. morbillos, < NL. as if "morbillosus", < ML. morbilli, measles: see morbilli.] Pertaining to the measles; partaking of the nature of measles, or resembling the eruptions of that disease.

morboset (mōr-bōs'), a. [= F. morbeux = Sp. Pg. It. morbozo, < L. morbosus, sickly, diseased, < morbus, disease: see morbus.] Proceeding from disease; morbid; unhealthy.

Seignor Malpighi, in his Treatise of Galls, under which name he comprehends all preternatural and morboset tumors and excrescences of plants.

Ray, Works of Creation, I.

morbosity (mōr-bos'i-ti), n. [< LL. morbositas], sickliness, < L. morbosus, sickly: see morbose.] The state of being morbose; a diseased state.

If we take the intention of nature in every species, and except the casual impediments or morbosities in individuals.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 18.

morbus (mōr'bus), n. [L.] Disease.—Cholera morbus. See cholera.—Morbus coxarius. See hip-joint disease, under disease.—Morbus Gallicus, syphilis.—Morbus maculosus, purpura hemorrhagica.

morceau (mōr-sō'), n.; pl. morceaux (sōz'). [F.: see morsel.] A bit; a morsel; a small piece. (a) A short piece or a passage of a literary composition. (b) In music: (1) A short composition, usually of simple character. (2) An excerpt or extract.

Morchella (mōr-kel'ē), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1719), < G. morchel, a mushroom: see morel.] A genus of edible fungi of the division Hymenomycetes, having a fistular stalk and roundish or conical pitted pileus. It includes M. esculenta, the morel. Other species of the genus are eaten. See morel.²

mordacious (mōr-dā'shus), a. [= OF. mordace = Sp. Pg. mordaz = It. mordace, < L. mordax (mordac-), biting, < mordere, bite: see mordant.] 1. Biting; given to biting.—2. Acrid; violent in action.

Many of these [composts] are not only sensibly hot, but mordacious and burning.

Evelyn, Terra.

3. Sarcastic.
mordaciously (mōr-dā'shus-li), adv. In a mordacious or biting manner; sarcastically.

Buchanan, a learned though violent Scot, has mordaciously taunted this tradition.

Waterhouse, On Fortescue, p. 201.

mordacity (mōr-das'i-ti), n. [< F. mordacité = Sp. mordacidad = Pg. mordacidade = It. mordacità, < L. mordacita(t)-s, bitingness, < mordax (mordac-), biting: see mordacious.] The property of being mordacious; bitingness.

Such things as have very thin parts, yet notwithstanding are without all acrimony or mordacity, are very good sallets.

Bacon, Hist. Life and Death, § 25.

The facility of doggerel merely of itself could not have yielded the exuberance of his [Skelton's] humour and the mordacity of his satire. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 318.

mordant (mōr'dant), a. and n. [< ME. mordant (def. II., 1), < OF. mordant, F. mordant = Sp. mordiente = Pg. mordente = It. mordente (> E. mordent), < L. morden(t)-s, pp. of mordere (> It. mordere = *Sp. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxx. 10.

2. Having the property of fixing colors.

II. n. 1. A metal chape covering one end of a strap or belt, especially if so arranged as to hook into a clasp on the other end to facilitate securing the belt round the person. The mordant often forms with the belt-plate a single design, the decorated front being either as large as the plate or of such shape as to combine with it to form a circular or other regular figure. Also mourant.

Rychesse a girdelle hadde upon,
The bokesle of it was of a stoon,
The mourdaunt, wrought in noble wise,
Was of a stoon fulle precious.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 1094.

2. In the fine arts: (a) Any corrosive liquid, such as aqua fortis, which will eat into a metallic or other surface when applied to it in the process of etching. See etching. (b) A glutinous size used as a ground for gilding; a gold-mordant; an adhesive mixture for attaching gold-leaf to an indented dotted pattern as a picture-background.—3. In dyeing, a substance used to fix colors; a substance which has an affinity for, or which can at least penetrate, the tissue to be colored, and which possesses also the property of combining with the coloring matter employed, and of forming with it an insoluble compound within or about the fibers. Albumin, gluten, casein, gelatin, tannin, certain oils, certain acids, certain resins, alumina, soda, and lead salts, pure or in compounds, are used as mordants. A mordant is also termed a basis or base.

Opposite is the best mordant to fix the color of your thought in the general belief.

O. W. Holmes, Med. Essays, p. 272.

mordant (mōr'dant), v. t. [< mordant, n.] To imbue or treat with a mordant.

Before dyeing, cotton must therefore be mordanted; i. e. it must be charged with some substance or substances which cause it to take up the colour.

Benedikt, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 46.

The cloth may be sumaced and mordanted as usual with tin, and then dyed.

Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 33.

mordantly (mōr'dant-li), adv. In a mordant manner.

Mordella (mōr-del'ē), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), < L. mordere, bite: see mordant.] An a, larva; b, pupa; c, beetle, outline side view of female; d, dorsal view of same; e, antenna, magnified; f, serrated tarsal claw, highly magnified. (Lines show natural sizes.)

important genus of beetles, typical of the family Mordellidae, characterized by the moderate subequilateral scutellum. These beetles are of small or medium size, usually shining-black in color, and inhabit fungi or twigs. There are more than 100 species, most of which inhabit Europe or North and South America, 17 being recorded as North American, as M. 8-punctata.

Mordellidae (môr-del'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Mordella + -idae.] A family of heteromericous Coleoptera, typified by the genus Mordella. They have the anterior coxal cavities open behind, the head strongly constricted at the base and suddenly narrowed behind, the lateral suture distinct, the base as wide as the elytra, the antennae filiform, and the hind coxae laminiform. These insects resemble the Rhipiphoridae, but the antennae are filiform, and the thorax has a lateral suture; they are of small size, pubescent, and glistening-black. They are abundantly found on flowers, particularly on certain Compositae. The larvae have short legs, the joints of which are indistinct; they live in fungi and twigs. The family was established by Stephens in 1832.

mordenite (môr-den-î), n. [< Morden (see def.) + -ite.] A zeolitic mineral occurring in small hemispherical forms with a fibrous structure, whitish color, and silky luster. It is a hydrous silicate of aluminum, calcium, and sodium, and is found near Morden in Nova Scotia.

mordent (môr'dent), n. [< It. mordente, in music, a beat, a turn, a passing shake, < mordente, biting, pungent: see mordant.] In music: (a) A melodic embellishment, not so frequent now as formerly, consisting of a rapid alternation of a principal tone with a tone a half-step below it. It is single or short when the by-tone is used but once; otherwise double or long. The signs for the single and double mordents are \sim and $\sim\sim$ respectively. When the supplementary tone needs to be chromatically altered, a \sharp , \flat , or \natural is added below the sign.

(b) Same as acciaccatura or passing trill (German Pralltriller), the latter of which is also called an inverted mordent.

mordente (môr-den'te), n. [It.: see mordent.] Same as mordent.

mordet, n. and v. An obsolete form of murder.

mordicancy (môr-di-kan-si), n. [< mordican(t) + -cy.] A biting quality; corrosiveness.

The mordicancy thus allay'd, be sure to make the mortar very clean, after having beaten Indian capicum, before you stamp any thing in it else. Evelyn, Acetaria, § 47.

mordicant (môr-di-kant), a. [= F. mordicant = Sp. Pg. It. mordicante, < LL. mordican(t)-s, pp. of mordicare, bite, sting, < mordicus, biting, < L. mordere, bite: see mordant.] Biting; acrid.

He presumes that the mordicant quality of bodies must proceed from a fiery ingredient. Boyle.

mordication (môr-di-kā'shon), n. [= F. mordication = Sp. mordicacion = Pg. mordicação = It. mordicazione, < LL. mordicatio(n)-s, a gripping, lit. biting, < mordicare, pp. mordicatus, bite: see mordicant.] The act of biting or corroding; corrosion.

Wise physicians should with all diligence inquire what simples nature yieldeth that have extreme subtille parts, without any mordication or acrimony. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 602.

mordicative (môr-di-kā-tiv), a. [= Sp. It. mordicativo; as mordicatio(n) + -ive.] Same as mordicant. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 774.

mordret, n. and v. An obsolete form of murder.

more¹ (môr), a. and n. [Also dial. II. n. 1. A greater quantity, amount, or number.

The children of Israel did so, and gathered, some more, some less.

Ex. xvi. 17.

I heard thy anxious Coach-man say,
It costs thee more in Whips than Hay.

Prior, Epigram.

When our attention passes from a shorter line to a longer, from a smaller spot to a larger, from a feebler light to a stronger, from a paler blue to a richer, from a march tune to a gallop, the transition is accompanied in the synthetic field of consciousness by a peculiar feeling of difference, which is what we call the sensation of more,—more length, more expanse, more light, more blue, more motion.

W. James, Mind, XII. 15.

2. Something superior or further or in addition: corresponding to I., 2, with partitive genitive merged.

'Tis not in mortals to command success;
But we'll do more, Sempronius; we'll deserve it.

Addison, Cato, l. 2.

Who does the best his circumstance allows Does well, acts nobly; angels could no more.

Howell, Letters, ll. 53.

Thicker than arguments, temptations throng,
At best more watchful this, but that more strong.

Pope, Essay on Man, ll. 76.

[In this sense more is regularly used to modify an adjective or adverb and form a comparative phrase, having the same force and effect as the comparative degree made by the termination -er: as, more wise (wisser), more wisely; more illustrious, more illustriously; more contemptible; more durable. It may be used before any adjective or adverb which admits of comparison, and is generally used with words of more than two syllables, in which the use of the suffix -er would be awkward: as, more curious, more eminent, etc.; formations like curiouse, virtuouse, etc., being avoided, though occasionally used in older writers. Formerly more was very often used superfluously in the comparative: as, more better, braver, flatter, mightier, etc.]

2. Further; to a greater distance.

And yet we ascendd mor and came to the place wher ower Savyor Crist sayng and be holdyng the Citle of Jherusalem ypon Palme of Sonnday wepte.

Morinda (mō-rin'dā), n. [NL. (Vaillant, 1722), so called from the shape and color of its fruit, and its locality; irreg. < L. morus, the mulberry, + Indicus, Indian.] A genus of rubiaceous plants, type of the tribe Morindeae, distinguished by its small heads of many confluent flowers. About 40 species are known, all tropical, mainly in Asia and Oceania, a few in Africa and America. They are shrubs or trees, with white flowers in axillary or terminal clusters, and opposite leaves. M. citrifolia and M. tinctoria, and sometimes all species of the genus, are called Indian mulberry. These and other species yield important dyes. See *ack*², ack-root, al-root. M. Royce of the West Indies has the name yau-weed. Seven fossil species have been described, all from the Tertiary of Europe.

Morindeae (mō-rin'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1830), < Morinda + -ae.] A tribe of plants of the order Rubiaceae. It is characterized by an ovary of from two to four cells, each with one ovule attached to the partition, and contains 10 genera and about 60 species, all tropical trees or shrubs.

morinel (mō-rī-nel), n. [< F. morinelle, dim., < L. morus, < Gr. μωρος, silly.] The dotterel, Endromias morinellus: so called from its apparent stupidity. See cut under dotterel.

Moringa (mō-ring'gā), n. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1789); from its native name in Malabar.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous trees, forming the order Moringaceae, and characterized by a disk investing the tube of the calyx, ten stamens, five one-celled anthers, and an ovary of one cell with three parietal placentae and many ovules. Three species are known, natives of northern Africa, western Asia, and the East Indies. They have white or red flowers in axillary panicles, long pods, and twice- or thrice-pinnate alternate leaves. One species, perhaps two, are important, for which see ben-nut, ben-oil, horseradish-tree, and nephritic wood (under wood).

Moringaceae (mō-ring-gā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1846), < Moringa + -aceae.] A synonym for Moringae.

Moringae (mō-rin'jē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (R. Brown, 1826), < Moringa + -ae.] An anomalous order of plants, polypetalous, but allied to the Gamopetalae, consisting of the single genus Moringa.

Moringua (mō-ring'gū-ā), n. [NL.] A genus of murenoid fishes founded by Sir John Richardson in 1845, type of the family Moringuidae. M. lumbricoides is of worm-like appearance, the vertical fins being reduced to a fold around the end of the tail.

Moringuidae (mō-ring-gū-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Moringua + -idae.] A family of murenoid apodal fishes represented by the genus Moringua. They are of eel-like form, with specially elongated abdominal region; the heart is situated far behind the gills, and the pterygopallatine arch and opercular apparatus are imperfect. The several species inhabit Oriental seas. Also Ptyobranchina.

Morin's apparatus. [After the French inventor A. J. Morin (1795-1880).] An apparatus designed to illustrate the laws of falling bodies. It consists of a light wooden cylinder covered with paper, made to rotate uniformly about a vertical axis, in front of which falls a small weight, guided by two light wires. A pencil attached to the falling weight traces out on the paper of the rotating cylinder a line which, so long as the effect of the air-resistance is negligible, is found to be a parabolic curve. The distance fallen through is thus shown to vary according to the square of the time, in accordance with the theoretical law.

Morio (mō'ri-ō), n. [NL., < L. morio, a fool, a monster.] 1. In entom., a genus of caraboid beetles, containing such as M. monilicornis of the southern United States. The genus pertains to the scaritid section of Carabidae, and is sometimes made type of a family Morionidae. It is of wide distribution, but has only about 25 species. These are mainly South American, but some are found in Africa, the East Indies, and Australia, and 2 in Europe. One occurs in the United States. Latreille, 1810.

2. A genus of mollusks. Montfort, 1810.

They trim it with paint after the morisco manner. Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 129.

A piece of as good Morisco work as any I had yet seen. H. Swinburne, Travels through Spain, xxxi.

II. n. 1. In Span. hist., a person of the Moorish race; a Moor. The name was applied to the Moors after their conquest by the Spaniards; they were expelled from Spain in 1609.

These two circumstances leave no reasonable doubt that the writer of the poem was one of the many Moriscos who . . . had forgotten their native language and adopted that of their conquerors. Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 86.

2. The language of the Moors of Spain.

He, leaping in front of all, set hand to his falchion, and said, in morisco, let none of you that are here stir. . . . The Moors, hearing their master say so, were marvelously amazed. Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, iv. 14. (Latham.)

3. The Moorish dance known also as moris-dance.—4. A dancer of the morris-dance.

I have seen Him caper upright like a wild Morisco, Shaking the bloody darts as he his bella. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., III. 1. 365.

5. A dance performed by one person, differing from the morris-dance. See the last quotation.

Your wit skips a morisco. Marston, What you Will, iv. 1.

To this purpose were taken up at Rome these foraine exercises of vaulting and dancing the Moriske. Hakewill, Apology, p. 365.

The Morisco or Moor dance is exceedingly different from the morris-dance, . . . being performed by the castanets, or rattles, at the end of the fingers, and not with bells attached to various parts of the dress. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 309.

6. The style of architecture or ornamentation commonly called Moorish.

morish (mō'r-ish), a. [*< morel*¹ + *-ish*¹.] 1. Such that more is needed; insufficient. [Prov. Eng.]

Lady S. How do you like this tea, Colonel?

Col. Well enough, Madam, but methinks it is a little morish.

Lady S. Oh, Colonel, I understand you; Betty, bring the cannister. Scit/2, Polite Conversation, I.

2. Such that more is desired; nice. [Colloq.] Morisk, Moriskot, a. and n. Obsolete forms of Morisco.

Morisonian (mor-i-sō'ni-an), a. and n. [< Morison (see def. of Morisonianism) + -ian.] 1. a. Pertaining to Morisonianism.

II. n. A member of the Evangelical Union. See Morisonianism.

Morisonianism (mor-i-sō'ni-an-izm), n. [< Morisonian + -ism.] The system of doctrines professed by one of the religious denominations of Scotland, the Evangelical Union (which see, under evangelical). (The terms Morisonian and Morisonianism, derived from the name of James Morison, one of the originators of the body, are now very little used.) morkin¹ (mōr'kin), n. [For morkin*, < OF. mortekine, mortecine, morticine = Olt. morticino, "any dead carrion" (Florio) (Ir. murtchenn = W. burgyn), < ML. morticinum, a beast that has died of disease, neut. of L. morticinus, that has died (as an animal), dead, hence carrion, < mor(t)-s, death: see *mort*¹. Cf. mortling.] A beast that has died by sickness or mischance, or (according to Halliwell) that is the product of an abortive birth.

Could he not sacrifice Some sorry morkin that unbidden dies? Bp. Hall, Satires, III. iv. 4.

morl (mōrl), n. [Appar. a native name.] An Asiatic deer, Cervus wallichi.

morland¹, n. An obsolete form of moorland.

morling, mortling (mōr'-, mōrt'ling), n. [*< mort*² + *-ling*¹. Cf. morkin.] 1. A sheep or other animal dead by disease.

A wretched, withered mortling, and a piece Of carrion, wrapt up in a golden fleece. Fasciculus Florum, p. 35. (Nares.)

2. Wool from a dead sheep. Blount.

morlop (mōr'lop), n. [Origin obscure.] A variety of jasper pebble found in New South Wales. See the quotation.

Amongst the jasper pebbles are some of pale mottled tints of yellow, pink, drab, brown, bluish gray, &c. These are termed morlopes by the miners, and are regarded by them with much favor, as they say that they never find one in the dish without diamonds accompanying it. U. S. Cons. Report (1886), No. 70, p. 319.

normaer (mōr'mär), n. [< Gael. normhaor, high steward, < mor, great, + maor, steward. Cf. maormor.] Same as maormor.

normaership (mōr'mär-ship), n. [< normaer + -ship.] The office of a normaer or maormor.

From these normaerships, which correspond with the ancient mor tuatha, came most, if not all, the ancient Scottish earldoms. Encyc. Brit., X. 800.

normal¹ (mōr'mäl), n. [< ME. normal, mormal, mormal, mormal, marmole, mormal, < OF. mortmal, mormal, F. mort mal, OF. also malmort, < ML. malum mortuum, an old sore, an evil: malum, neut. of malus, bad, evil; mortuum, neut. of mortuus, dead: see *mort*¹.] A cancer or gangrene; an old sore.

Gret harm was it, as it thought me, That on his schyne a normal hadde he. Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., I. 386.

Luxuria ys a lyther normale. Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 218.

They will give him a quantity of the quintessence shall serve him to cure kibes or the normal o' the shin. B. Jonson, Mercury Vindicated.

mormeluchet, n. [< Gr. μορμολύκη, μορμολύκειον, μορμολύκειον, μορμολύκειον, a bugbear, hobgoblin, < μορμολύττωσθαι, also μόρμωσσεσθαι, frighten, scare, be scared, < μορμω, a bugbear.] A hobgoblin; a bugbear.

They hear and see many times, devils, bugbears, and mormeluches. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 659.

mormo (mōr'mō), n. [NL. in sense 2, < Gr. μορμω, also μορμωδν, a hideous she-monster, a bugbear.] 1. A bugbear; false terror.

One would think by this play the devils were mere mormos and bugbears, fit only to fright children and fools. Jeremy Collier, English Stage, p. 192. (Halliwell.)

The mormos and bugbears of a frightened rabble.

Warburton, Prodigies, p. 80.

2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of noctuid moths of the subfamily Amphipyrrinae, erected by Hübner in 1816, having the tufted abdomen extended beyond the hind wings. The only species, M. maura, is distributed throughout Europe.

Mormon¹ (mōr'mon), n. [NL., < Gr. μορμωδν, a bugbear: see mormo.] In zool., the name, generic or specific, of several animals. (a) In mammal.: (1) [l. c.] The specific name of the mandrill, a baboon, Cynocephalus mormon. See mandrill. (2) A genus of such baboons founded by Lesson, 1840. M. leucophaeus is the drill. See Cynocephalus. (b) In ornith., a genus of puffins of the family Alcidae, founded by Illiger, 1811: now more frequently called Fratercula. M. arcticus is a current name of the common puffin; M. cirratus, of the tufted puffin. See Fratercula, Lunda, and cut under puffin.

Mormon² (mōr'mon), n. [Prop. attrib. use (the Mormon Church, Bible, etc.) of Mormon, one of the characters of the "Book of Mormon," from whom it derives that name.] An adherent of a religious body in the United States, which calls itself "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." This denomination was founded in 1830 by Joseph Smith, a native of Sharon, Vermont. The government of the church is a hierarchy consisting of two orders of priesthood, an order of Melchizedek (the higher) and an Aaronic or lesser order. The former is presided

KEY TO PRONUNCIATION.

a as in fat, man, pang.
 æ as in fate, mane, dale.
 ʌ as in far, father, guard.
 ʌ as in fall, talk, naught.
 ʌ as in ask, fast, ant.
 ʌ as in fare, hair, bear.
 e as in met, pen, bless.
 e as in mete, meet, meat.
 e as in her, fern, heard.
 i as in pin, it, biscuit.
 i as in pine, fight, file.
 o as in not, on, frog.
 o as in note, poke, floor.
 o as in move, spoon, room.
 u as in nor, song, off.
 u as in tub, son, blood.
 ʊ as in mute, acute, few (also new, tube, duty: see Preface, pp. ix, x).
 ʊ as in pull, book, could.

ü German ü, French u.
 oi as in oil, joint, boy.
 ou as in pound, proud, now.

A single dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates its abbreviation and lightening, without absolute loss of its distinctive quality. See Preface, p. xi. Thus:

§ as in prelate, courage, captain.
 § as in ablegate, episcopal.
 § as in abrogate, eulogy, democrat.
 § as in singular, education.

A double dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates that, even in the mouths of the best speakers, its sound is variable to, and in ordinary utterance actually becomes, the short u-sound (of but, pun, etc.). See Preface, p. xi. Thus:

§ as in errant, republican.
 § as in prudent, difference.
 i as in charity, density.
 o as in valor, actor, idiot.
 e as in Persia, peninsula.
 e as in the book.
 u as in nature, feature.

A mark (˘) under the consonants t, d, s, z indicates that they in like manner are variable to ch, j, zh, zh. Thus:

t as in nature, adventure.
 t as in arduous, education.
 s as in leisure.
 s as in seizure.

th as in thin.
 th as in then.
 ch as in German ach, Scotch loch.
 n French nasalizing n, as in ton, en.

ly (In French words) French liquid (mou-llé) l.
 ' denotes a primary, " a secondary accent.
 (A secondary accent is not marked if at its regular interval of two syllables from the primary, or from another secondary.)
